[Here Mr. VANDERPOEL rose, and inquired if the Administration had not a majority of the aggregate votes in New Jersey at the late election.]

Mr. RANDOLPH said, the Government paper says so, and lest one statement should not be believed, it has given them all, all of which are fallacious and false, and based upon a comparison of the majorities, carefully concealing the actual votes, of this year with those of the last, when, in every county except one or two, where the Administration have increased their majority, or decreased that of their opponents, it has been done with fewer votes than they polled last year; and the aggregate vote was near 10,000, or almost one-fifth short of last year. In the counties having large majorities either way, no effort was made. Sussex only polled about 1,000 votes, and yet it can give 1,500 Administration majority; the contest was for doubtful counties, and the Legislature; we carried all the former, including the counties which embrace South Amboy and Millville, decreasing the majorities in both of these townships; the Legislature, and the whole power of the State we carried by an increased majority; the Administration vote is near 5,000 short of last year.

But, Mr. Clerk, I would ask you, sir, why have you received my commission, and enrolled my name, and rejected the names and the fac simile commissions of my colleagues? Why have you thus distinguished me? You have put upon me too much honor, for which I thank you not; and my constituents and my country will not thank you. Sir, the people, kind as they have been to me—much above my merits, I confess—never intended thus to distinguish me above my colleagues; I came here but their compeer; have always so considered myself; and when they proposed to their competitors to resign, and let the people try this contest, I too craved the honor to be equal with them in that also, and was only prevented from joining in the proposition by the advice of friends who had a right to influence my acts. Why have you, then, drawn the envious distinction? Why been so unkindly kind? Why receive my commission, and reject theirs? Was it the Secretary's certificate? That, sir, is no legal evidence; the Governor himself, and not the Secretary, is the certifying officer of the acts of the Governor and Privy Council; and yet this high functionary has undertaken to certify—what? That this paper is a copy of an original on file in his office? No; but that he, James D. Westcott, the high and potent Secretary, has examined the papers which he says the Governor and Council examined, and he, forsooth, has come to a very different conclusion from what they did; and therefore certifies the result of his calculations, and he adds to it the votes of the two rejected townships, which he certifies the Governor told him to file; from all which he very modestly informs the House that the Governor and Council were all wrong, and that Messrs. Dickerson and Co. and not Messrs. Ayerigg and Co. were elected; and this, too, in the face of his own official signature to the commissions of my colleagues, and his very polite letters, informing myself and colleagues that he transmits our "commission as a Representative of New Jersey in the House of Representatives of the United States of the Twenty-sixth Congress." Was there ever such official insolence! Was there ever such a Secretary of a Privy Council! Was there ever such strange evidence! Why, sir, this certificate would not be evidence in the lowest court of New Jersey. The certified copies from the county clerks would be evidence as far as they go, but they would disclose the fact that their townships were rejected for illegality and fraud; but, by the certificate of this very accommodating Secretary, that matter is concealed. Yet this is to be the evidence to overrule the decision of the highest constituted authority in the State, authenticated in the highest manner known to the law, and that, too, before any House is organized to try the matter! Sir, your course was a plain one. If no returns were filed, then you would place on the roll the names of such as, by universal consent, were admitted to be elected. If returns were filed, then it was your duty to ascertain which of them were made according to law; if neither were so made, you might perhaps either do as the Clerk did in the case of Letcher vs. Moore, take the best return as the prima facie evidence, or do as you have done now, refuse to recognise either, and state the fact to the House; but if either of the returns or commissions was according to usage and requirements of law, as you have recognised those of my colleagues to be by receiving mine, then, sir, you had no discretion—you were bound by law, common sense, and universal practice, to place the names of my colleagues on the roll. But you say that it is a delicate question, and not for you to decide. Sir, under this plea of false delicacy, you have decided the matter—you have rejected the commissions of my colleagues—the highest evidence known to the law—the exclusive evidence—till after the House is organized. Your have reversed the judgment of the Governor and Council before the appeal is filed. And gentlemen who would confirm your decision would settle the whole matter before a jury is sworn to try the cause; and this, too, upon evidence only, such, too, as I have shown it to be, which should be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Sir, where will you decision lead you? Any member's seat on this floor may be contested; and if the individual contesting only files with you an affidavit or a mere certificate from any unauthorised source that he claims the seat by virtue of a majority, sir, according to your logic, you must disregard the legal return, and place neither member on the roll; and how many or how few you would place there, time and the exigencies of Government might determine. Sir, the Government would always desire a majority in this House, and your principle would always give it to them. File with you, sir, affidavits or certificates for contests of the seats of five, ten, or twenty members, according to the requirements of Government, and, sir, you leave off so many names from the roll of members, and place the Government at all times in a majority of those that are left, who are not only to organize the House, appoint you or some other person Clerk, who may at the commencement of the next Congress, and so ad infinitum, play over the same game, but who are also to be the judges of the contested seats. And thus, sir, you first create a majority, and then, sir, they have the power to perpetuate that majority, your own office, and the power of the General Government. Saying nothing of your motives, your decision presents the strongest coalition to perpetuate office and power that the wit of man ever devised, and desperate, indeed, must be the affairs of the Government that requires to be sustained by such measures. Sir, if I may use a figure without profanity, (and no one who knows me will accuse me of that,) I would say that the entrance to this House was like the way to Heaven; there is but one road to either, there is no breaking into either, no leaping over the battlements or scaling the walls; all must go through the straight gate, or go not at all.

Sir, of what effect is this certificate of the Secretary? No gentleman has pretended that it can givet seats to the persons holding it, and by your setting it up in opposition to the regular commission of my colleagues it is only claimed to have the effect to deprive New Jersey of five-sixths of her representation, and you thereby place your friends in the unenviable attitude of the dog in the manger. There is a case in point—the decision of Solomon respecting the dead and the living child. We say, destroy not the representation, vacate not the seats; give it to my colleagues, if their commissions entitle them to it; if not, give it to their competitors—let the representation be full. But this, sir, is said to be a very peculiar case, and therefore, as the argument would seem to say, the ordinary rules of practice and common sense are not applicable to it. Why, say honorable members, the commission of the Governor and Council is on one side, and the alleged majority of the people on the other; and was there ever a case of contested election, in which the parties did not stand in that position? Is not that the very ground of contest? Can gentlemen imagine a case in which the party claiming a seat alleges he has fewer votes than he who has the certificate?

In the case of Turner, jr. vs. Baylies, a large number of votes were given for Turner without the Jr. and, not being counted by the returning officer, Baylies got the certificate, took his seat, and held it for a long time, till it was finally awarded to Turner on petition. So in the cases of Wright, jr. vs. Fischer; Williams, jr. vs. Smith; Huguenin, jr. vs. Ten Eyck; and Guion, jr. vs Sage. In the latter, Sage, though he held the certificate, never came forward or claimed his seat; and, by writing under his signature, acknowledged Guion's majority and right, yet Guion had to petition, and did not get his seat in six weeks. If ever there was a case where a man claiming a seat might walk into the Hall and take it at once, that was one; but no such case has been cited or can be found any where. The universal practice has been for the person claiming to petition the House after it is organized; a contrary course would lead to confusion and revolution. In the case of Root vs. Adams, the former was elected by near three hundred majority; yet, because his name had been spelled Rott on a large number of tickets, he lost the certificate and was compelled to petition for his seat. And so in the case of Spaulding vs. Mead, formerly referred to; the Governor of Georgia receives the returns from the counties as the Governor of New Jersey does, but, in consequence of a violent storm, the returns from three counties did not reach him in time; the commission was accordingly given to Mead. Though Spaulding had the decided majority, yet he did not come in and take his seat, but petitioned the House for it, and there being no fraud or illegal votes, it was awarded to him. It will be borne in mind, too, that these and all the New Jersey cases are where the majority has been set aside for mere informality or irregularity: how much stronger then is this case, where there are not only informality and illegality, but fraud, and a sufficient number of illegal votes to change that majority? Why, then, sir, have you made the distinction between this and all other cases? Sir, the country will hold you and your friends responsible for every evil that may result from your extraordinary course. I know that your seat is to be filled, and that other seat beyond and above you is still vacant, and that another individual desires to plunge his arm deeply into the Treasury. But, sir, what are these—what to us is the election of a Speaker, on which your friends seem to place the very continuance of their power—what is the momentary triumph of a party, compared with the great principles you would sacrifice? Is it for this you would degrade my State—destroy the validity of her records—tear from her her broad seal, and wrest from her her sovereignty? And who are to do this? Is it the chivalrous sons of Carolina, who erected the Palmetto flag in defence of State sovereignty? Or is it the sons of old Virginia, where the principles of State Rights originated? Is New Jersey to be thus struck at and disgraced, and deprived of that which I, as the acknowledged Representative of the whole people, ask not as a boon, but demand as a right? I trust not—I trust not.

REMAKS OF MR. SLADE, OF VERMONT.

In the House of Representatives, Tuesday, December 10, 1839—The question pending being, who should be allowed to vote from the State of New Jersey on a motion to lay on the table a resolution involving the right of claimants from that State to seats in the House—

Mr. SLADE rose and said that the question before the House bore such a relation to the general question touching the organization of the House, which had, in various forms, been agitated during the last seven days, that he felt justified in asking the indulgence of the House to a few general remarks.

I have (said Mr. S.) sat here seven days, patiently waiting for the moving of the waters. I ought, perhaps, to say, rather, watching the moving of the waters, for they have, indeed, moved, and moved in every possible direction. Instead of approximating, in the arduous labors of a week, to any practical conclusion, we seem to have been constantly receding from it—plunging ourselves into new difficulties, and becoming entangled in the web of unanticipated perplexities.

It may be useful to pause for a moment in the midst of the wild uproar that reigns in this Hall, and review the history of our proceedings, and survey the position to which we have arrived.

We assembled here nine days ago for the purpose of organizing the Twenty-sixth Congress. The CLERK, having prepared a roll of the reputed members elect, proceeded, according to usage, to call it, for the purpose of ascertaining the presence of a quorum, necessary to be assembled for the purpose of organization. Having arrived at the the State of New Jersey, and called one of its Representatives, he stated that, as to the five remaining seats to which that State was entitled, there were ten gentlemen present claiming to hold the appropriate evidence of title to them; and that he was unable to determine which five of the ten ought to be enrolled as members of the House; and thereupon submitted the matter to the decision of the gentlemen present. Seventy-nine Representatives, only, had been called, being forty-two less than a quorum. The commissions of five of the claimants were thereupon read, when it was moved that the credentials under which the remaining five claimed seats, together with the election law of New Jersey, should be also read. Hereupon the question arose, whether any evidence of a right to membership should be submitted in behalf of any body, inasmuch as there did not appear to be a quorum present to which any question touching such right could be put for decision.

Thus the progress of the call was impeded by a discussion of motions growing out of the conflicting claims to seats, while it most effectually arrested by the impossibility of putting questions on those motions, for want of a quorum competent to decide them.

I need not recapitulate the history of the four days, during which the meeting (it could not then be called a House of Representatives) struggled ineffectually to relieve itself from this extraordinary and unprecedented embarrassment. The wisdom of the wisest was tasked to devise the means of extrication. Proposition followed proposition, and resolution was piled on resolution. But it was all to no purpose, so long as there was no quorum competent to act. Such quorum could not be ascertained by a call, without either calling the Representatives from New Jersey in the usual order, or omitting that State, to proceed to the call of the remaining States. The former was prevented by the alleged inability of the CLERK to decide who ought to be called from the State of New Jersey; the latter, by his declining to take the responsibility of passing New Jersey, and calling the remaining States, without a direction which, there being no ascertained quorum present, it was impossible should be given.

I thought then, and still think, that the CLERK should have placed upon the roll, and called, the names of the five gentlemen from New Jersey holding commissions from the Governor of that State. In not doing it I think he greatly erred, because I regard those commissions, admitted, as they are, to bear the genuine signature of the Governor, and seal of the State of New Jersey, to be the only legal "returns" of Representatives from that State. His error consisted in regarding the certificate of the Secretary of State, produced by the opposing claimants to seats, as a "return" which should place the individuals in whose favor it was given upon the footing of an equal claim to seats with those holding the commissions. The certificate seemed to conflict with the commission, when, in fact, regarded in the light of a "return" within the meaning of the Constitution—in which light only should the CLERK have considered it—it did not thus conflict. But the CLERK, holding the certificate of the Secretary of State to be a "return," and exercising, as he must of necessity do, his own judgment, however erroneous, in deciding which of the claimants, under what he deemed conflicting returns, should be called, came to the conclusion that he could not decide, and therefore called neither.

Thus were we placed in the predicament of being able of our own will to move neither forward nor backward. A knot had been tied by the CLERK which it seemed impossible to untie. For this I do not, however, censure him so much as do some gentlemen, however much I may be censured for declaring it. It is my duty, as it is my inclination in this, as in all other cases, to award the merit of purity of intention until I have the clearest evidence to the contrary.

The knot thus tied by a most unprecedented concurrence of circumstances, the CLERK might have cut by taking the responsibility of going forward with the call until all the States, with the exception of New Jersey, should have been completed. I told him, here in my place, some days ago, that he should do this, and get us out of the difficulty by the ascertainment of a quorum which should be competent to act on the questions then pressing upon us. I thought he should either do this, or place on his roll the names of one or the other set of claimants. To do neither left us in the condition of a mighty, shapeless, unorganized mass, containing, in fact, the elements of power, but yet, to all practical purposes, as powerless and motionless as the marble pillars by which we were surrounded.

Thus situated, there seemed but one mode of extrication left us. It was to assume that there was a quorum present, and proceed to act accordingly. It was to cut the knot which we had been long laboring in vain to untie. This you did when you rose and addressed the assembly as "fellow-citizens and members elect of the twenty-sixth Congress," and proposed a resolution for its action. What you thus begun was completed by the vote which carried you to that chair, and gave us an officer to preside over our deliberations.

When you, sir, ascended to that seat, we fondly hoped, in the ecstacy of our joy in having escaped from the toils in which we had been for four days entangled, that full and complete deliverance was immediately before us. But a little experience convinced us of our error. We soon found that we had cut one knot only to tie another. Formerly, the great difficulty that met us at every turn was, that no question could be put; now, the difficulty was soon found to be, that no question could be decided; and that is the difficulty which now presses upon us, and seems destined indefinitely to embarrass our proceedings.

The great questions directly before us are, shall the names of the gentlemen holding the commissions of the Governor of New Jersey be called and they be enrolled as members of the House of Representatives? Or shall the roll, in the first instance, be made up of undisputed members from other States, leaving the question of the right of the gentlemen from New Jersey to membership to be afterwards decided?

Now, sir, the difficulty is, that, instead of meeting these questions directly, we are perpetually drawn off upon the collateral question, who shall vote upon these questions? Thus, for example, upon the question on the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] that the CLERK be directed to call those gentlemen from New Jersey holding the Governor's commissions, the question arises, shall they be permitted to vote? The CHAIR, on the question being propounded to him by the tellers, decides that they may vote. From this decision an appeal is taken; and, upon the question whether the decision of the CHAIR shall stand as the judgment of this House, the question again arises, shall the gentlemen from New Jersey be permitted to vote? Now, supposing that the CHAIR again decides that they may vote, or if he reverses his former decision, and decides that they may not vote, in either case there may again be an appeal. And thus it is easy to see we shall be driven on from decision to appeal, and from appeal to decision, ad infinitum, while the great question, who shall be called and enrolled from the State of New Jersey, is left at an almost sightless distance behind us!

The CHAIR has been complained of with, as I think, a very captious and unreasonable severity by the gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] for undertaking to decide who should be counted. It has been termed with much harshness an act of gross usurpation; but who called upon the CHAIR to make a decision in this case? Who but the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. DROMGOOLE,] who uniformly votes and acts with those who have denounced you as an usurper? Would the gentleman from New York have thus censured you if you had decided that the votes of the New Jersey gentlemen should not be counted? And yet he might as well call that an act of usurpation as the one he has so liberally denounced.

But, sir, what would have been the difference, as to the result, between your deciding whose votes should or should not be counted, and declining, as I think it would have been most prudent for you to have done, to make any decision? In the latter case, if, on the count by tellers, it should be ascertained that the gentlemen from New Jersey had voted, the question might immediately arise, shall their votes be counted? and, on that question, the question would again rise, shall the votes of the gentlemen from New Jersey be counted? If you should again decline to decide, and, on counting, it should be again found that the gentlemen from New Jersey had voted, then might the question again be started, shall their votes be counted? And thus we might be again driven on from the giving of disputed votes to the question whether they should be counted, and from that to the giving again of disputed votes, ad infinitum. Thus, sir, take it which way we will, we are perpetually moving in a circle—going forward in a process that is, from its nature, never ending; while the great question is left undecided.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what shall be done? How shall we escape from the net in which we are thus entangled? How come directly to action on the great question, who shall be called and enrolled as members from the State of New Jersey? There are, it seems to me, but two ways in which this may be accomplished. The most direct and ready of these is, for the New Jersey members, whose seats are contested, to decline voting on any question affecting their right to seats here. The endless process which I have described would be thus arrested, and we might be brought to a direct vote upon the question whether their names shall be called, and they admitted to take their seats on this floor.

Now, sir, I am not the conscience-keeper of these gentlemen, and do not think it becomes me to volunteer any advice to them in regard to this matter. If the case were my own, I should not be long in deciding what it became me to do. It is for them, however, to say what they will do on this occasion.

If the question is to perpetually recur, whether they may rightfully vote, then is the great question, in its direct form, perpetually thrust from before us, and we tread an endless round in the pursuit of that which will forever elude our grasp.

But is there no other remedy? Must we remain in our present position? Is "confusion worse confounded" to maintain perpetual empire in this Hall? Mr. Chairman, was there ever a deliberative body in a worse condition than this? Here, sir, are we, like a ship in a storm, without sails, rigging, masts, compass, chart, or helm, rolling and tossing among the angry billows; sometimes one end foremost, and sometimes the other; now trembling on the summit of the mountain wave, and now plunging as if to ocean's fathomless depths. One moment we are struck by a sea on one side, and at the next we meet in the recoil a heavier sea on the other. The wind—of which surely we have enough! blows in all directions; and, what is not a little extraordinary, often at the same moment!

There seemed, indeed, about a week ago, to be at one time a little hope of reaching a safe harbor. It was when the gentleman from Virginia before me [Mr. WISE] offered a resolution proposing that the CLERK should be directed "to call the names of gentlemen whose rights to seats are not contested;" and that, on the appearance of a quorum, it should, before proceeding to the choice of a Speaker, "hear and decide upon all credentials, certificates, or commissions or persons claiming seats" on this floor. When I witnessed the manner in which the annunciation of this resolution was received on all sides of the House, I thought we were upon the point of entering port, and congratulated myself that I should soon be permitted to place my feet once more upon terra firma. But, sir, I was doomed to disappointment, for, a contrary wind at that moment springing up, there soon blew a gale from the northwest, which drove us again into the open sea. The gentleman from Virginia finally yielded, and withdrew his resolution; and, from that time to this, "neither sun nor stars in many days appearing," have we been rocked by the whirlwinds, and lashed by the surges of this tempestuous sea.

Now, sir, I again ask, what shall be done? Is there no deliverance—no escape from the perils of our present condition?

Sir, if the gentlemen from New Jersey feel it due to themselves and their State not to decline voting,* so that we shall continue to find ourselves obstructed by the recurrence of the question, who shall vote? we may well despair of ever getting what may properly be called a roll of the House by the ordinary process, and shall, therefore, hope in vain to arrive at an organization in the usual way. What we want is a HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES that can act. That is the great desideratum. Now, though, from necessity, assuming to act as a House, we are, in truth, not a House. We are a mere informal meeting of supposed members elect of the Twenty-sixth Congress, there being, as yet, nothing placed on record—for there is yet no recorded roll—by which evidence is furnished that we have recognised each other as members. In this condition, the constitutional right of one-fifth of the members present to demand the yeas and nays cannot attach to us, for without a roll the yeas and nays cannot be called. None of our votes can, therefore, be recorded, and none of us are, or in our present condition can be, sworn.

*They subsequently declined. The House was brought to a vote on the main question, and the roll called.

Now, sir, how shall we get a House? We have been trying in vain these many days to get one by calling a roll. But is the calling of a roll essential to the formation of a House? Nearly a week ago, before you were placed in that chair, I suggested to the CLERK that he might extricate us from our embarrassment by ascertaining, without a call, who of the members elect were actually present; and thereupon, if a quorum of undisputed members was found to be here, to announce the fact, record their names, and declare his readiness to put to them any question that might be proposed for their decision.

This course you may now take as a last resort, directing the Clerk to record the names of members ascertained by you to be present, whose right to seats is uncontested. It would be again cutting the knot; but, if there is a knot that must be cut, that you are the man who will not shrink from the responsibility of performing the operation, especially in such an emergency as this, we have a sufficient pledge in the fearlessness with which you rose in your place, on a late emergency, and said, "fellow citizens and members elect of the Twenty-sixth Congress of the United States, I address myself to you, and not to the CLERK in the chair, under a painful sense of my own duty."

If the course I have suggested is unprecedented, so is the occasion which demands it. And, sir, if the members elect from New Jersey, whose right to seats is contested, are not to vote on the question of that right—as it is evident they cannot do if it is ever to be decided—what difference will it make to them that a House of Representatives is formed in the manner I have suggested, provided the question of their title to seats shall be determined, as it should, and doubtless will be, before order shall be taken by the House on another business?

Having been thus enrolled and announced as members elect of the 26th Congress, present at the time and place appointed by law for its meeting, let the oath or affirmation be thereupon administered, as provided in the Constitution. Without the taking of such oath or affirmation, by which the Constitution (art. 5th) declares that Senators and Representatives "shall be bound," it seems to me that we cannot rightfully proceed a single step in the performance of our duties.

I am aware that the law of 1789, referred to the other day by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] provides that the Speaker shall, immediately upon his election, administer the oath or affirmation to the members. But does it, therefore, follow that it cannot be administered before such election? By what authority is the oath, prescribed in the same clause of the Constitution, administered to the President by the Chief Justice of the United States? By some, except the general authority of that functionary to administer, in virtue of his judicial office, all oaths provided for by the Constitution of the United States. The law of 1789 provides for the swearing of the members after the election of a Speaker, but who does not see, who, indeed, does not now know, that the House of Representatives may be called on to exercise some of its most important and responsible functions before the election of a Speaker?

Let, then, the Chief Justice of this District, who has authority to administer all lawful oaths within its limits, be invited to take his stand at that table and administer the oath to support the Constitution of the United States to the members whose names shall have thus been enrolled. Then, sir, shall we be a House, competent to act in the execution of the high trust which the people and the Constitution have committed to us.

But what shall we then have a right to do, touching the question which has agitated this body for the last eight days? Sir, we shall have a right "to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications" of the members chosen or supposed to be chosen, to represent the people on this floor. That right we shall have derived from the Constitution of the United States, which declares that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." "Each House." What is a "House," within the meaning of this clause of the Constitution? Let the Constitution itself answer. The second section declares that the "House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States." It has been said on this floor that there cannot be a House competent to make any decision on a question involving a judgment as to the right of members to seats, until it shall have been organized by the election of Speaker and Clerk. But such is not the language of the Constitution. A Speaker and Clerk are not essential elements in the composition of a "House," for the Constitution declares that it shall be composed of members chosen by the people. When the Representatives elected, or a quorum of them, have come together at the place appointed by law, and recognised each other as members, then is there a House of Representatives, organized and competent, having taken the oath, "to judge of elections, returns, and qualifications." A presiding officer, of some name, and a Clerk, are indeed necessary for its efficient action; the one to receive and propound questions, and the other to record the proceedings on them. But they are not necessary to make a House of Representatives. They do not give it its power, but are themselves the creatures of that power; for the Constitution declares that "the House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers;" manifestly implying that it is a House of Representatives before such choice is made.

And, sir, it is not only a House of Representatives before the choice of its Speaker and Clerk, but it is organized, in the most important and essential meaning of that term. To organize, is, according to the best lexicographers, "to construct [bring together] so that one part may co-operate with another." Thus the Representatives of the people do not, before they assemble, constitute a House of Representatives, organized in any sense, for they are but the scattered elements of which it is to be "composed." But as soon as they are brought together, at the time and place provided by law for their assembling, and have recognised each other in the character of Representatives, then may all the parts "co-operate." They become an organized body, capable of concentrated action, and may proceed, being sworn, to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of those whose rights to seats shall be contested.

But it has been said by the gentleman from Georgia before me, [Mr. COOPER,] that the Constitution authorizes the House to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications only of its "own members," and therefore that it cannot judge in the case of the New Jersey members elect, until they shall have taken their seats as members of the House. His language was: "Without being in his seat, exercising his rights, the member elect is no member;" from which he drew the conclusion that, inasmuch as the House could "judge" only in the case of its own members, the gentlemen returned from New Jersey must, in the first place, be admitted to seats as members before the House could act upon the question of their right to be members.

Now, sir, if this reasoning proves any thing, it seems to me it proves too much. Does it not bring us to the conclusion that the question whether a seat shall be taken by a claimant to it can never be considered by the body of which he seeks to become a member, until he has actually taken his seat, and thus precluded the possibility of action on the question whether it shall be taken? This is the inevitable conclusion from that construction of the Constitution which makes a man a member de facto, in order to give the House jurisdiction of his case. And can any thing be more preposterous and absurd than this?

With great respect for the logical acumen of the gentleman from Georgia, as well as for himself, I must be permitted to say that he has carried his favorite doctrine of strict construction to the extent of a rigid adherence to the mere letter, in opposition to the manifest meaning of the Constitution. Thus he gave emphasis to the word "own" in the expression "each House shall be the judge of the elections, &c. of its own members," when it is manifest that that word was introduced, not to give emphasis to the supposed idea of actual membership, but as a natural and necessary expletive, in speaking of the membership—in whatever sense that word might have been used—of one House, in distinction from that of the other.

In common parlance, those who are elected as Representatives are denominated members of Congress; yet nobody understands that they are any thing more than members elect until admitted to seats on this floor. In strictness, they can, until admitted to seats, be denominated only Representatives to represent the people in the Congress of the United States, and cannot be called members, since membership necessarily implies organization, which cannot take place until the Representatives elect are brought together and embodied so as to form a House.

The evident meaning of the Constitution is, that the House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members elect. Indeed, the gentleman from Georgia seems himself, after all, to regard membership in such a light as to give countenance to this construction, and overturn the whole argument he had based upon the assumption that there must be actual membership; that is, "being in his seat, exercising his rights," in order to enable the House to judge; for he afterwards says, "they (the New Jersey claimants under the Governor's commission) were members before you or I assembled here." Now, sir, if, according to the gentleman's declaration, a person elected as a Representative is a member before the assembling of the Representatives, and, of course, before he shall have taken his seat, may not the House, according to his own reasoning, judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of such member before he takes his seat? He makes the power of the House to judge depend upon the fact of membership, and then declares that such membership exists before the Representatives assemble. Plainly, then, the limitation of the judicial power of the House to the case of "its own members" does not, as the gentleman contends, make actual membership a condition precedent to the exercise of the power.

But it is said that the House has no power to entertain the question whether the gentlemen bringing commissions from the Governor of New Jersey shall take seats on this floor, because the State of New Jersey has herself adjudged upon this question, and the returns of the Governor of that State, in the form of commissions, are conclusive evidence of that judgment. But to what conclusion will this lead us? If there is any force in this suggestion, who shall limit its application? Does it not apply with equal force to the general power of the House of Representatives to judge of the elections of its members? May it not be said, at any stage of the proceedings, that the State has adjudged upon the question of the right of the claimants holding its commission? And is not, in effect, all power over this subject thus taken from the House of Representatives?

If, as I think I have shown, a quorum of undisputed members of the Twenty-sixth Congress, being sworn, will have power, before the election of a Speaker, to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of those who shall not have been admitted to seats, the question will next arise—To what extent should the power be then exercised? Obviously, it seems to me, only to the extent of judging of the "returns" of the members. To go behind them, at that stage of its organization, would in most cases, and certainly in the present case, involve a delay in the permanent organization of the House which would be ruinous to the public interests. Who is willing to keep the wheels of Government at a dead stand until the whole merits of the New Jersey election shall have been investigated and decided? Who does not see that an entire month will not suffice for that investigation, reaching, as it will, the ballot boxes, and inquiring, as it may, into the validity of perhaps two or three hundred votes deposited in them?

A judgment upon the "returns" only will involve an inquiry of a comparatively short duration; but, whether shorter or longer, we are clearly bound to enter upon it, and come to a decision before any permanent organization shall be made, or any other bussiness done. While I would not give to a Governor's commission the conclusive effect for which some have contended, I would give to it, emanating as it does from the highest and most directly responsible of the State authorities, the effect of placing a member in his seat, and enabling him to hold it, until the most searching and thorough scrutiny into the whole process that preceded its execution, beginning at the ballot boxes, should have clearly demonstrated that it did not embody the expressed will of the people by whose agent, constituted by that people for that very purpose, it had been executed.

I have said that the House should, before proceeding to any other business, judge of the returns of the members. But what are returns of members? Is the certificate of the Secretary of the State of New Jersey, which has been read at the CLERK's table, a return? By what law was it made such? How is it invested with an official character, in which character alone it can have force and effect any where? If it is sought to establish facts supposed to be pertinent to this case by the declaration of the Secretary of the State of New Jersey, let them be put into the form of a deposition, and let the oath be administered to him that they are the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. But would this constitute a "return?" Clearly not.

But what, I again ask, is the return of a member? It is that by which his election is certified to us by the authority constituted for that purpose by the State from which he comes. This is the return, and the only return contemplated in the clause of the Constitution now in question. It is true that, in the process of ascertaining who is elected, there are used the returns of votes by the judges of the election to the county clerk, and the return of the county clerk to the Governor. But neither of these, in this case, is a return of the member supposed to be elected. The language of the grant of power to the House is, "Shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." It is the return of the member, then, of which, under that part of the grant having reference to "returns," the House is to judge, and not the returns of votes by the judges of election to the county clerk, or the returns of those returns, summed up, by the county clerk to the Governor. These are not a return of the member or the election of the member. Such a return can only be made to this House by that functionary which the State law appoints for that purpose; and it is of such a return only that we are authorized to judge under the authority given us to judge of "returns." When we come to judge of the "election," the whole case is then opened, and we may judge of every thing touching the qualifications of voters, or the reception and returns of their votes by the officers appointed for those purposes. But this would be a very different thing from judging of the returns of members.

In judging of the return of a member, we are to judge, in the first place, whether it is genuine and authentic; and, in the next place, whether the functionary by whom it purports to have been made was authorized by the laws of the State to make it.

But I shall be asked, may we not also inquire into the grounds on which it has been made? If there have been fraudulent returns, or omissions of returns of votes to the Governor, may not these frauds be inquired into? Certainly they may. But when? Whenever it is proper to go behind the return in our investigations. But when that is done, when we go beyond the point of deciding upon the genuineness of the return, and the authority of the functionary who makes it, who shall stop us, who ought to stop us, till we get to the very bottom of the ballot boxes? If we are to go into the question of fraud, what fraud touching the election shall we leave unprobed? None. Justice, and honor, and fairness, cry out—None!

The gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] says, let us have the voice of the ballot boxes. So say I. The voice of the ballot boxes! They have already spoken to us through the only organ appointed by the laws of New Jersey to speak to us; and we are bound to hear and regard that voice, until there shall come up from the deepest recesses of the ballot boxes a voice that shall tell us whether fraud and falsehood have found a lurking place within those sacred repositories of the evidence of the people's will.

The gentleman from New York affects to regard the illegal returns of certain judges of elections as the voice of the ballot boxes. But, sir, the voice of the ballot boxes is, to all the purposes of determining who shall take seats as members of this body, that expression from them, and that alone, which the people of New Jersey have by their laws determined. The ballot box has no power of itself to speak; it can utter no voice but through those who have its custody, and are appointed by law to certify its contents. If a judge or inspector of elections has been illegally or fraudulently appointed, and that, perhaps, for the very purpose of admitting illegal votes, or making false returns, shall his certificate be taken as the voice of the ballot box? Is he competent to speak in its name? No, sir. If you would get the voice of the ballot box in that case, you must get it by testimony which shall carry you back of all returns. But the taking of this testimony is not proposed by the gentleman from New York; it is, evidently, what he does not want. I understand the gentlemen holding the Governor's commissions as desiring to take this testimony, and thus go to the bottom of the whole matter. But the appropriate time for doing so, we all know, has not arrived. Such an investigation, at this stage of the proceedings, is utterly impracticable; and yet it, obviously, must be gone into, if we go back of the return which the people of New Jersey have determined by their election law shall be made to the House of Representatives of the United States. To stop in this backward process till we get quite beyond the judges and inspectors of election into the ballot box, every body can see would be improper, and might work great injustice. Indeed, if there is any reason why we should go back of the Governor's return, for the purpose of examining the grounds on which it has been made, that reason operates with equal, if not greater, force, to carry us back of the judges' and inspectors' returns, to examine the true grounds on which they were made. The gentleman from New York would carry us at once back of the Governor's return to the illegal returns, but there he would stop! Though no law of the people of New Jersey has authorized the judges and inspectors of election to speak to us on this subject, yet we are to take their unofficial statements (unofficial, because not made according to the law of New Jersey (as conclusive against the right of the returned members to take their seats on this floor. If the statements of the judges and inspectors of election are to be used at all here, they must be verified by oath—we cannot regard them as official returns. The judges and inspectors of the townships in question in this case, have never made any legal returns to any body; and if we are to take their affidavits in proof that the Governor's return is not what it ought to be, then must we take testimony touching the question whether the pretended returns of the judges and inspectors were what they ought to have been. In other words, we must go into the whole case, which we all know to be impracticable now; and, what is more, which those here who are contending against the right of the returned members, do not want to go into now. They want we should go half the way, and there stop. The bottom of the ballot boxes is what, if I can understand their movements, they dread to see.

I have thus, Mr. Chairman, adverted to the extraordinary embarrassment in which we are placed, and suggested what appeared to me the only modes of escape. I have considered what would be the constitutional power of a recognised quorum of the members elect of the Twenty-sixth Congress, present in this place, without a Speaker; maintaining that it extends to the full measure of the grant of power to the House of Representatives to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members, though practically limited, from the necessity of the case, at the opening of Congress, to a judgment on the "returns" only. I have spoken of the nature of the "returns" which seem to me to be specially intended in the clause of the Constitution which gives the House of Representatives the power of judging; while I have expressed my sense of the clear and undoubted claim which the returns, or commissions from the Governor of New Jersey, give the gentlemen who bear them, to seats on this floor.

But, sir, undoubted as I regard the right of these gentlemen to seats here, it is equally clear to me that the question of the validity of that right is subject to the judgment of the House of Representatives, from the moment it becomes a House, by the presence of a quorum of undisputed members; and that its power of judging extends as well to the claim to take seats, as to that of retaining them after they are taken. It seems to me a great error to assume that gentlemen bearing returns, even of the most unquestionable validity, may take their seats at all events, without submitting their returns to the judgment of the body to which the Constitution has expressly given the power of judging of the returns of its members. If the House cannot judge of the right to take a seat under a return from a State authority, with what propriety can it judge of the right to retain a seat after it is taken? If the exercise of the power of the House to judge in the first case conflicts with "State rights," does it not equally so in the latter? If "consolidation" is connected with one, is it not equally with the other? If one is liable to abuse, is not the other also? If the Executive, as has been suggested, can influence a subservient House to deny to a Representative the seat he is justly entitled to take, may he not, through the same influence, thrust him from a seat which he is justly entitled to hold? Does it follow, from the possible, or probable, or even certain, abuse of power, that it does not exist? What power has been more grossly abused than the Executive power of removal? And yet, who denies its existence? Is it possible for the Executive to thrust his influence into the House of Representatives more directly and flagrantly in the case of a contested election than he has in controlling its action in the exercise of its admitted powers of legislation, either by his direct influence on its members, or by the control he has exercised, through his official dependants, upon the elections? If the non-existence of power is to be inferred from its possible or actual abuse, of what power supposed to be conferred on Congress or the Executive may they not stripped, until they become a mere shadow? Sir, the question of power in no branch of this Government is subject to such a loose, sliding rule of construction as this.

Mr. Chairman, if the doctrine be correct that the House of Representatives has no power, under the Constitution, to judge of the right of an individual to become one of its constituent parts, then is the whole question resolved into the law of force. Like every other case where there is no tribunal to decide, the law of physical strength must govern. The doctrine against which I am contending gives to the States a complete and unqualified independence in regard to this matter, and leaves the whole question as to who shall take seats in Congress to be decided by negotiation!

But let me not be misunderstood. The States have the right, as we all know, under the Constitution, to prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding elections; though Congress may, at pleasure, "make or alter such regulations." Congress has never legislated on this subject; and therefore the whole matter of the elections of Representatives to Congress is left to State regulation. The qualifications of the electors—the mode of voting—the custody of the ballot boxes or the poll books—the supervision of the elections—the return of votes to the officer or officers appointed to count them, and the manner in which the result of the election shall be certified, are all prescribed by the laws of the several States. The House of Representatives of the United States are to take all these regulations as they find them; and, instead of undertaking to repeal or modify them, are to make them the rule of judging of the elections and returns of members.

Thus, for example, in the case before us, the law of the State of New Jersey provides that the Governor, with the assistance of the Privy Council, shall cast up the whole number of votes received from the several counties for each candidate, and determine the six persons who have received the greatest number of votes from the whole State for Representatives in Congress; of all which the Governor is made the certifying officer. To this law the House of Representatives are to give full effect; but yet they must "judge" what is its full effect. This is their province. They may misjudge, but yet they must judge—right or wrong. Thus, in the case before us, there is a question of fact and a question of law for the House to decide: of fact, namely, whether the signature and the seal attached to the returns or commissions are genuine; and of law, whether they are made in the form, and certified by the officer, and verified by the seal, prescribed by the laws of the State of New Jersey. If the genuineness and legality are shown or admitted, then do they become evidence to the House of Representatives of the fact that the persons named in them have been elected by the people of the State of New Jersey to represent that State in the Congress of the United States; and the evidence, too, which the State of New Jersey has determined shall be the verification, here, of their right to take their seats as Representatives of the people of that State. The House has no right to say that this shall not be evidence. The State of New Jersey has decided that it shall be, and the House is to receive it as evidence, and "judge" accordingly. New Jersey has determined what shall be done to furnish to the House of Representatives evidence of the election of members, but the House must judge whether it has been done as the State has, by law, provided.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, are the rights of the States fully recognised, while the indispensable power of the House of Representatives to judge remains unimpaired.

I need hardly add, for I have already sufficiently indicated, my full conviction that the returns by the Governor of New Jersey of Mr. ARCHER and his associates as members elect of the Twenty-sixth Congress are in accordance with the laws enacted by the authority of the people of that State; and that the House of Representatives, when formed, will be bound so to adjudge, and to admit them accordingly—leaving the questions of the legality of the returns of the judges of election, of the proceedings at the polls, and of the votes deposited in the ballot boxes, to be afterwards decided, as such questions have been heretofore uniformly decided, upon a discussion of the case, as it shall be reported, after investigation by a standing committee of the House.

While I think that a decision by the House, that the gentlemen bearing the Governor's commissions are not entitled to take seats on this floor, would be no infringement of State rights, I am equally clear that to refuse them seats would be gross injustice to them, and a flagrant disregard of the laws of the State whose people they claim to represent.

Of their right finally to retain the seats to which they are now entitled, I do not intend, as, of course, it does not become me, now to speak. That question is to be settled when the appropriate time arrives for going behind the "returns," or commissions, from the Governor of New Jersey. Whenever that shall be done, there is no place where I would stop, until the bottom of the ballot boxes should be reached, and the will of the legal voters of the State of New Jersey fully disclosed.

Mr. EDITOR: I perceive that I am liable to be misunderstood in the last paragrah but one of my speech, published in your paper of yesterday. It does not clearly express what I intended.

There may seem to be a contradiction between saying that a decision by the House that the gentlemen bearing the Governor's commissions are not entitled to take seats would be no infringement of State rights, and saying, as at the close of the same paragraph, that to refuse them seats would be a flagrant disregard of the laws of New Jersey. What I meant was, that it would be no usurpation of power for the House thus to adjudge and decide. Deeming such judgment to be within its competency, the errors of that judgment, whatever they might be, would, in strictness, be no infringement of State rights, though, in exercising its power of judging, the House might disregard, or not give sufficient weight to, the laws of New Jersey.

Respectfully, W. SLADE.
December 18, 1839.

REMARKS OF MR. SALTONSTALL,
OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In the House of Representatives, December 13, 1839—The question being on Mr. PROFFIT'S motion to reconsider the motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maine, to go at this time into the election of Speaker—

Mr. SALTONSTALL (it being late in the evening) assured gentlemen that it was no part of his object to "speak against time," but as one opportunity was yet afforded him, he must, before the final vote should be taken, occupy a few minutes in bearing his solemn testimony against what he feared was about to be perpetrated against the constitutional rights of the State of New Jersey. I do not (said Mr. S.) say this with any view to fan the flame of party excitement in this House—far from it; on the contrary, I sincerely wish I could allay that fell spirit, which should never enter this hall of legislation. It is deeply to be regretted that party names and appeals to party should ever have been introduced here, as though we were assembled as representatives of political parties, and not of the whole people. I should consider that man a great benefactor to his country, who should cause to be established and enforced a rule which should put an end to this practice. It lessens the dignity of debate, leads to personalities, and tends to excite passions inconsistent with the correct discharge of our duty.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman who moved the reconsideration. The question before us is one of the most important which has arisen under this Constitution. It is not a question which concerns merely the five members from New Jersey, or that State alone. It is a question of vital importance to all the States in this Union—to the people of the whole country.

I repeat, sir, my chief object in rising is to bear my TESTIMONY against the exclusion of the returned members from New Jersey. I believe their right to seats upon this floor to be as good as ours. I believe that they come with as high authority—that the evidence of their right is perfect, and that their rejection by us will be against all precedent—all usage—all authority—all constitutional law and order. This is strong language, sir; but we profess still to live in a free Republic. This is the House of the people's Representatives, and I feel it to be my duty to speak the truth with plainness.

From some remarks of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] and the views he expressed, I am persuded that this subject is not yet fully or correctly understood by all members; and I think that his construction of the Constitution, by which he would have this House, before its organization, go behind the returns, and, in effect, decide upon the election, admits of a satisfactory answer in a few words. I shall endeavor to make it, in the course of my remarks, and should have replied more fully, had I been able to obtain the floor at the time.

One word, sir, about the delay of which we now hear so much. It is very true—too true—that we have been here eight or ten days without effecting an organization of this body, and that the whole country is looking in this direction under great anxiety and excitement. But who caused this delay? I acknowledge no responsibility for myself or my friends. We have not produced nor sanctioned the existing state of things. We have opposed no obstruction to the organization of the House in the usual mode. Those are responsible, and those only, who have leagued and gone together against unbroken usage, against plain principles of justice, and against the settled course of proceeding, from the earliest period of this Government.

It is not necessary for me to go at large into the consideration of questions which have been so long under debate: but I hold that there are some few principles, well settled, and some facts not disputed, which lead irresistibly to the conclusion that those gentlemen who have been regularly returned according to the laws of New Jersey have a constitutional right to their seats here, and this notwithstanding this proposition has not been maintained by a vote of the majority. I know not whether the New Jersey members are now in this hall; I trust they are. Had I been so returned—and I now address the members of this House, and entreat them to divest themselves of party feeling and prejudice, and say whether I do not express their own feelings—had I been so returned, and had come up to this place bearing in my hand the commission of my State, under its great seal, I should feel bound, notwithstanding the vote you have passed, or any vote you may pass, not to recede from the House; but when the other gentleman, admitted to be a Representative from my State, upon a commission precisely similar, should be called up to be qualified, I should go forward and demand to be sworn. I would hold up my commission, refer to the Constitution of the Union and the laws of my State, and I should say to this body, assembled upon no higher or better authority than mine, "This Constitution authorizes the States to legislate on the subject of elections, to determine how they shall be holden, and how the result shall be returned, unless superseded by the legislation of Congress. My State has legislated—she has prescribed the time, place, and manner of holding elections of Representatives, how the votes shall be returned and examined, and how her Representatives shall be commissioned. Her laws have not been altered by Congress. I have been duly commissioned, according to law. Here are my credentials—I am ready to be sworn. I claim a right which has never been denied to my predecessors, holding similar returns, from the beginning of this Government—nay, from the beginning of the old Confederation of the thirteen States, whose efforts and sacrifices won our independence." To such a demand what answer could be given? Could he who shall fill that chair—could this House reject me? No. No man has ever come into this House before, bearing such a document, to whom it has been said, "stand aside!" Let us, then, pause, before we take the final, I may almost say the fatal, step.

Mr. Chairman, I have said there are some principles and some facts in this case, which may be considered as settled. I will state them to the House, because, to my mind, it follows from them, as clearly as a conclusion ever follows from established premises, that the returned members from New Jersey are members of this House of Representatives. It is settled by the Constitution itself (section 4) that, until Congress shall establish regulations on the subject, each State has a right to prescribe her own mode of holding elections for Representatives, of determining the result, and of the credentials to be given to the persons elected; and the elections must be held, and the subsequent proceedings had, according to such laws. New Jersey has done this—her law has never been altered by Congress; and it has been shown, by a reference to her statutes, how the returns of her elections are to be made; how, and by what authority, they are to be examined, and the result determined; and how the commissions of her Representatives are to be given. All this is not denied. It cannot be. The commissions of the five (I will not yet say rejected) members, have been spread upon your table—they have been read again and again, and no man has questioned their genuineness, or pretended to deny that they are in exact conformity with the laws of New Jersey. Some other things are very clear. It is not denied to have been a settled principle in this Government, founded on invariable usage, that persons coming here with regular returns from their States were entitled thereon to take their seats in this hall, and to act as Representatives, until, upon full examination, it shall appear that they had not been duly elected. This has been admitted and practised upon from the beginning

Never, until now, has any one, with such a commission in his hand, been rejected; on the contrary, such persons have always been qualified and taken their seats, although at the time it was perfectly well known that there were claimants who would insist before the House that they, and not the commissioned individuals, had been legally elected, and ought to have been returned. Let an instance be produced to the contrary. There never was one. Among all the cases of contested elections no exception is to be found. No one ever moved that persons holding returns should be recognised as members; they were admitted of course. Why, then, this new proceeding? Here is no conflict between returns. Who pretends that the claimants hold credentials according to the laws of New Jersey? I call upon their friends to show their commissions. They cannot be produced. They do not exist; and although the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] making it the duty of this House to decide who are entitled to seats, is still in force, no one will now rise in his place and say that they ought to be admitted. No one moves it. Why not? Because they are not regularly returned. They have no legal evidence of their right to seats. Although gentlemen have marched up to the point of rejecting men who hold the regular legal returns, there they stop; they cannot bring themselves to take the one step further, and admit persons who have no returns to show. Still we have seen these claimants coming into this hall, (the first time the attempt was ever made) We have seen them come within this bar, put their names upon seats in this House, and occupy them during the debate. Nay, we have seen them go forward and vote! Yes, we have seen ten or eleven persons vote as Representatives from a State entitled, under the Constitution, to but six! This is in violation of all usage; and if it is hereafter to be followed as a precedent, we have seen enough to satisfy us that it must produce the utmost embarrassment and confusion.

Mr. Chairman, I contend that it clearly follows, from the principles and the facts I have stated, that the gentlemen who present themselves here with commissions from the Executive authorities of New Jersey, issued in pursuance of the laws of the State, are, at this moment, members of this House Representatives. Their commissions are not now merely prima facie evidence; they are conclusive as to their present right to seats. I ask, then, by what authority can we reject them? I know it has been said that there is a circumstance which differs this case from others, but I have not been able to see it. What is it? Why, forsooth, that the evidence in favor of those contesting the seats has been handed to the Clerk of this House; whereas, in preceding cases, tha was never done. And why not? Because it is a settled principle of parliamentary law, that a claimant who disputes the right of a returned member must come here by petition. He must come, as a gentleman from Pennsylvania, who had taken a seat on this floor, but who has been dismissed very unceremoniously, will come. There is no dispute as to the practice. The rule of this House is founded upon it. What is the meaning of this rule? Let us see it: "It shall be the duty of the Committee of Elections to examine and report upon the certificates of election or other credentials of the members returned to serve in this House, and to take into their consideration all such petitions and other matters touching elections and returns as shall or may be presented or come into question and be referred to them by the House." This rule is the law of the House on this subject. It is made the duty of the committee, appointed after the House is organized, to examine and report upon petitions touching elections and returns.

This rule, and the practice under it, account for the loose manner in which the roll has been made out—from newspapers, private letters, or personal information. There being but one regular return from a district, and contested elections being examined by committees upon petitions from the claimants, no confusion will ordinarily arise.

The invariable usage as to contested elections is the only correct, indeed, the only practicable mode of proceeding. I believe the House is now satisfied of this.

The expediency of the usual course has never been questioned. No attempt to alter the rule was ever made. Then, if certain gentlemen hold the official returns, with the usual attestation of the State authorities, I hold that their right to be qualified as members is perfect. I go with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] in his doctrine that legal commissions from a sovereign State confer a title to seats in the first instance. If this is State Rights doctrine, I am a State Rights man. It is sound constitutional doctrine. What! when the Constitution has settled the number of Representatives to which each State is entitled; when it has conceded to them the power of legislating on their own elections and returns, can it contended, for one moment, and that, too, by State Rights men, that persons producing legal returns shall not be recognised as her Representatives? A few days ago, I should have said this was impossible. But we have seen commissions under the great seal of a State, embodying all the authority of a State, held up to ridicule! We have heard it asserted, in this debate, that a subordinate officer, wholly unauthorized by law, may furnish a certificate, under his own seal, entitled to as much, and in this case to more, respect than that of the Chief Magistrate, who, and who alone, is empowered by law to grant commissions to Representatives. All this—these returns with the formalities of law, the highest evidence known to the law, are said to be mere technicalities—forms of law! The gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] rejoices that we have cast aside these trammels of the law. He calls them technicalities—special pleading! Sir, if such doctrine is to be sanctioned by our decision, I shall consider it as one of the most melancholy events in the legislative history of this country. I say it more in sorrow than in anger. I solemnly believe that nothing has occurred since the adoption of the Constitution which inflicts so deep a wound on all precedent, on the authority of constitutional law and usage, and on the rights of the States and the people, as will be inflicted if we deprive New Jersey of her representation in Congress. I rejoice, therefore, that the question has been brought again under consideration, and I would fain hope that gentlemen will consent to adjourn, and take a sober thought before they consummate that act on which they appear to have resolved. The intervention of one night more before the final decision can surely make no great difference; yet it will allow space, I will not say for repentance, but for reflection. And I believe that, when we shall have left this scene of excitement, and shall be in the quiet of retirement—when we shall look back upon the history of our proceedings, none of us will regret this night's delay.

So strong is my conviction of the right of the returned members to seats, that I cannot believe that there is a constitutional lawyer of any reputation in the country who could have hesitated in coming to an opinion in their favor, unless his mind had been pre-occupied by some deep, controlling party prejudice. Yet the gentleman from New York congratulates the House and the country on the failure of the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, (although it was not lost by the vote of a majority, but by a tie vote.) "The people have obtained their rights—we have thrown off the fetters of technicality and the forms of law!" Let me ask that honorable gentleman what he means by the forms of law? Throw off the forms of law! Why, sir, are not the forms of law the great security of our rights? Are they not safeguards, set around us to protect all that is dear to us? By way of illustration, let me refer that gentleman to the 4th article of the amendments to the Constitution:

"The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or thing to be seized."

First the principle, then the forms of law provided to render it effectual. Here is our security—the forms of law provided in this article, which the people deemed important enough to add to the Constitution. Sir, under these forms of law we rest securely. No man can touch our persons, or seize a thing belonging to us, or enter our dwellings, unless upon a warrant made in conformity with these forms. What is to save us, in times of high party excitement and commotion—times which may come upon us, as they have upon other nations—what, in such times, is to save us from such outrages as were committed every day and every hour amidst the bloody scenes of the French Revolution, but a sacred regard to settled forms and usages, which are indeed the settled principles of law? Would the gentleman congratulate the country on having the article I have read struck from the Constitution—cast off as mere technicality—special pleading? Sir, forms of law, legal evidence of the highest character under which the members from New Jersey demand their rights to-day, may be the only security of yourself, of myself, or the gentleman from New York, to-morrow.

I might go on and illustrate the enormity of his position, by referring to other parts of the Constitution and to our laws; but I will not take up the time of the House in establishing or illustrating what is so plain and obvious.

I might refer to civil processes—these are all forms of law. A deed also. Why should such effect be given by law to a private seal? Why must a contract for real estate be in writing to be valid? Why must a will, to operate on real estate, be attested by three witnesses? These are all forms—mere forms! But I will not enlarge. The gentleman quite sneered, also, at any reference to precedents. He talked of "mere precedents"—"the usage of this House." They were also "forms of law." Mr. Chairman, what are precedents? That question was admirably answered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.] "They are the very definitions of the law." What are usages? Are they not the foundation of almost all our law; nay, of our Constitution itself? The British Constitution, too. Where will he go to show me that celebrated system of Government? He will admit, I suppose, that there is such a thing as an English Constitution, and that it is well understood and defined; but where will he find it set forth in terms? Nowhere. It rests on usage alone. We boast that we have a written Constitution; but if, for mere temporary or party purposes, we go on changing usage after usage, the British Constitution, though unwritten, will, ere long, be more certain and better understood than our own.

Let me ask gentlemen from New York (for I understand he is a lawyer) what is the common law but a venerable succession of usages? What is it, I ask, but a series of precedents, which have become settled principles? And yet our fathers considered it of some value. They claimed it as their birth right. They rose as one man in its defence. What right is held more sacred than the trial by jury? But what is it? Where is it defined? Where do you find of how many a jury shall consist, or what shall be a valid verdict? Not in the Constitution or the Statute Book. You go to the records of judicial decisions; in other words, to usage—to precedents.

And where do you find our own Constitution, as practically understood and administered? In this little book? No. A very small part only is here? It is to be found in judicial decisions, legislative proceedings, and, unfortunately, of late, in Executive constructions—constructions sometimes given without much regard to decisions, either legislative or judicial. To illustrate in one instance: The power of removal, that tremendous power, which has rendered this Government one great Executive unit—which has thrown the Executive chain around the entire Confederacy—where do you find that power? Not here. Is it not expressly granted in this instrument. Is it found only (if at all) in the construction given to the appointing power—a construction, the correctness of which is not admitted by many of our most eminent statesmen. If the gentlemen will throw away usage, and trample on precedents, he will find it difficult to maintain the favorite power of him who was recently his favorite Chief Magistrate. No; forms and usages are not to be disregarded, sneered at, as mere technicalities. They are substantial things. And, in contending that the usages of this House, in the process of its organization, ought to be observed—that we are bound to respect that evidence of membership which has never been questioned, we are contending for rights, the dearest and most sacred rights of the sovereign States of this Union, both now and for all time to come.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] says that, as the Constitution provides that each House shall be the judge of the returns of its own members, we may now look at the papers on the Clerk's table, and, without any further hearing or examination, decide who are entitled to the returns, and admit them at once. His position is, that those who received a majority of votes were entitled to be returned to this House, and that we may set aside the returns made, and admit them. Now, on that principle, if we are to disregard returns made in returns made in pursuance of the laws of the States, I ask why he does not offer a resolution that the five claimants who, he is satisfied, received a majority of the votes, are entitled to seats in this House? What is the difficulty? The difficulty is here: we cannot, in our unorganized state, set aside regular, formal returns. We cannot make valid returns. There is no mode pointed out by law for doing it. Difficulties have met us at every step since we departed from the good old way. We cannot go on. It is impracticable.

But there is a greater difficulty. We have no legal right to reject persons holding such returns. We ought not to look beyond commissions which conform to the laws of the State; but as an opinion has been given that they were erroneously issued, without the slightest disrespect I would ask that gentleman whether he has examined the laws of New Jersey on this subject? And I ask whether he listened attentively to the evidence, as it is called, which was read, not as evidence, but as part of a speech? Had he done so—had he examined the laws of New Jersey and those papers, I am very sure he would have adhered to his first opinion. As a State Rights politician, he would have stood by the laws of the State. As a lawyer, he would have come to the conclusion that the Governor of New Jersey, who has been stigmatized here as a corrupt tyrant who has been carrying on a war against the people for miserable party purposes, has done his duty, has done precisely what he ought to have done—neither more nor less. He has obeyed the will of the people as embodied in their laws. He and his Council have made the return they were bound by law to make. They had no option. They could not have done otherwise without a flagrant violation of duty. This may be called strong language; but I trust it will yet be the language of this House. The ground I take is, that the Executive authorities of the State of New Jersey were bound to examine the returns ("lists") legally made to them, and to give credentials to those who appeared by them to be legally chosen. They could not go beyond them. They could not resort to evidence not provided for by law. One would think there could be no doubt upon this subject. I might appeal to the experience of members, for I suppose the practice is the same in every State in the Union. Let me refer to my friend and colleague, [Mr. LINCOLN,] who honored the gubernatorial chair of our own State for nine successive years. Ask that honorable member whether he and his Council did not always proceed in the same manner the Governor and Council of New Jersey have done?—whether in deciding who were entitled to returns to this House they ever looked beyond the returns made according to the laws of the State? Who ever heard of such a thing? What a door would it open to fraud? And yet we have been called upon to revise and reverse the course taken by the Executive of New Jersey! What, sir, has it come to this? Is this Government so consolidated—I ask the gentleman from South Carolina—has it become so consolidated that this House, now, before its organization, can overleap the laws of New Jersey, and throw aside her official returns, sealed with her seal, to which full faith and credit are to be given by the very terms of the Constitution, and inquire and decide to whom commissions ought to have been given? There is not, I will venture to say, a State in the Union where the practice has been different from that in New Jersey since the foundation of the Government. How is it, sir, I ask again, in old Massachusetts? There the law requires that the votes shall be sorted, counted, &c. and that a return shall be signed by the selectmen, and sealed up, in open town meeting. There never yet was a time in that State, sir—(we know not how soon it may come if this new doctrine is to prevail)—but there never yet was a time when returns not conforming to the requisitions of the law would be counted. Suppose a case should happen in which no return is made, (and there have been many such,) what, I ask, would be thought of the Governor, should he put off expresses to procure affidavits, ex parte or otherwise, to prove that a town meeting was holden, and how many votes were given to each candidate, and should add them to the regular returns? Would it be tolerated? Would it be attempted? I trust not—I trust not, sir, in our State. If such things are to be done—and it has been contended that they ought to be done—what, I ask, are our State laws worth? What is to become of the liberties of this young, this glorious Republic? How long will they stand, in times of high party excitement? If an Executive can pass over the law of his own State, and, instead of examining only the returns duly made, can determine in such manner as he may think expedient the result of elections of which no returns have been made, on what can we rest as settled or secure?

The law of New Jersey points out every step the Governor is to take, and if he takes any other, it is illegal, and invalid. I did not intend to take up your time in reading it but it may be well to do it. Let me stir up your minds by way of remembrance on this subject.

The 4th section prescribes the manner in which the votes in the townships shall be certified, sealed up, and transmitted to the clerk of the county, "who shall attend at the court-house of the county on the Saturday next after the day of election, for the purpose of receiving the same; which list shall be delivered to him before five o'clock in the afternoon of said day; which said clerk shall then proceed, in a public manner, to make one general list of all the candidates voted for as aforesaid, together with the number of the votes received for each of them, and shall transmit the same, at the expense of the State, to the Governor, or person administering the Government, within seven days thereafter."

Sec. 5. "The Governor shall, within five days after receiving the said list, lay the same before a Privy Council, to be by him summoned for that purpose, and after casting up the whole number of votes from the several counties for each candidate, the said Governor and Privy Council shall determine the six persons who have the greatest number of votes from the whole State for Representatives in Congress of the United States from this State; which six persons the Governor, or person administering the Government, shall forthwith commission, under the great seal of the State, to represent this State in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States."

Now, with this law in his hand, how can any man for one instant hold it to have been the duty of the Governor to send off and hunt up the votes of Millville and South Amboy? He did precisely his official duty. He gave the same construction to the law his predecessors had given, and among them one of the claimants, [Mr. DICKERSON.] How can any other construction be given to it? In quiet times it would not have occurred to any man—much less would it have been maintained on this floor.

This, then, is, after all, the ordinary case of a contested election. It is not to be distinguished. Certain persons come here with regular credentials; let them be received, and let the case be hereafter carefully examined on the applications of the claimants. But let not the commissioned member petition. No; if we drive them from their seats—if we expel them from this hall—I trust they never will come again and knock at our door, and ask our leave to go before our committee with their commissions in their hands to satisfy them that they are entitled to seats here. Let New Jersey rather remain unrepresented in this House.

In that law the Governor's duty is prescribed. He has no discretionary power. I carefully listened to the protest offered to the Council of New Jersey on the part of the claimants, and in my judgment the reply by the committee of the Council, upon this question, was complete, conclusive.

But the gentleman from South Carolina says that the Governor mistook his duty—that he ought to have looked beyond the lists; and it has been said that the regulations provided by law are cobwebs—mere cobwebs! And this, although the law of New Jersey (Congress not having legislated on the subject) has all the force, and is entitled to the same respect here, as if a statute had been enacted by Congress containing the same provisions. Legal provisions are mere cobwebs! I believe they are with some, when they stand in the way of favorite purposes.

But the gentleman denies that the Governor and Council had a right to reject votes because they were illegal, and argued as though they had done this. Who that has attended to this subject ever contended for such a power, or has suggested that any votes returned in the lists were rejected? There is no pretence for it; it is a mistake of the fact. And yet it has been asserted here and elsewhere, and not always from ignorance, or without design; and I fear that false impressions have been spread abroad upon this subject. The Governor of New Jersey never did any such thing. He never instituted any inquiry as to the legality of any votes returned. All he did was to receive the returns legally made; to compare them with the laws which he was bound to administer, and "determine the six persons who had the greatest number of votes." This he did, and it was determined, in the language of the law, that the six gentlemen who hold commissions under the great seal of the State were duly elected to represent that State in this House of Representatives. Why, then, are they not entitled to take and to hold seats until they shall be vacated, if at all, according to the usual course of proceeding under the established rules of this House?

Who ever heard of an instance in any State Legislature in which one regularly returned has been excluded, or his right questioned, until after the organization of the House? I appeal to the experience of members, most of whom have, no doubt, holden seats in their legislative assemblies. No; it has been the law of all representative bodies from time immemorial. It had its origin in the necessity of some such regulation, and has been continued because its convenience has received the test of experience.

The Constitution authorizes this House to judge of the returns of its members, and it has been contended that this authorizes the House now to consider and determine who are entitled to returns. We may adjudicate by way of appeal from the decision of the Executive of New Jersey, and reverse it and admit at once those who are not returned. Is not this going behind the returns? Will it not be examining into the elections, and deciding now who were duly elected? The true construction of this clause appears to me to be simple and obvious. This House may judge of the returns—that is, they may examine them, and see whether they are formal and according to the laws of the States. We cannot go a step further, without going into the elections. If we go beyond the commissions and inquire who were entitled to them, we must go back to the polls, and inquire who were duly elected. This will lead to the whole subject of illegal votes, and upon the whole case of the contested elections. Is this House prepared to delay its organization until this can be done? The intention, if it was ever entertained, is abandoned.

Mr. Chairman, I have, I perceive, occupied much more time than I expected, though much less than I might have done at an earlier stage of the debate. Other views of this important subject occur to me; but I will not proceed. If gentlemen are exhausted, I am not less so. I again repeat, my object has not been merely to consume time, that the question might be brought up to-morrow under more favorable circumstances. The subject is one of the utmost importance, and I was desirous of expressing my views and feelings. I have arrived, sir, at a period of life when my interest in questions involving constitutional rights arises much more from consideration for my children, those who are to come after me, and for the future destinies of my country, than for myself or the present time. I was born before the adoption of this Constitution; and when I hear gentlemen speak as they have in this debate of long settled usages, and a train of precedents extending back to the beginning of this Government—nay, to the beginning of any deliberative body—when I hear them talk of breaking the fetters of mere technicalities, and the forms provided by law to secure the purity and freedom of our elections, I confess to you, sir, I tremble for the future! I consider it as the first step in a course which may lead to our ruin. We do, indeed, live in an age of experiment. With some politicians, experiment, nothing but experiment, deserves attention. The history of the past is nothing. All the experience of all nations, for all ages, is nothing—it weighs not a feather. No. We are to begin anew, and to new model and rebuild the structure of society, from its very foundation. Sir, it will be a fearful experiment; and nothing but the blessing of that good Providence which has thus far so often and so wonderfully interposed for our preservation, can rescue us from that fate which we seem ready, for the purposes of a day, with rash and guilty hands, to pluck down upon the heads of ourselves and our children. Oh! let us adhere to constitutional usages—let us preserve inviolate our glorious Constitution. I trust in God that better days are in reserve for us and our children, when these poor contests for the triumphs of party shall have passed away—triumphs always transitory—triumphs in which the victor is as much a loser as the vanquished—triumphs purchased at too dear a price, when, to secure them, the Constitution must be sacrificed.

REMARKS OF MR. BYNUM, OF NORTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, December 24, 1839.—On the resolution of Mr. DAWSON of Georgia to suspend the order of the House to go into an election of Printer to the House of Representatives for the Twenty-sixth Congress.

Mr. BYNUM said, if the House would go into an election of Printer at this time, he would forbear making any remarks. If not, he would go on and say what he was about to say. [Cries of "Go on."] Sir, said Mr. B. if the American people could have been assembled in this hall, and could have witnessed the proceedings of this House for the last three weeks, they, with the change of a single name, would have exclaimed, in the language of the Roman orator, "Quousque tandem abutere, Catilina, patientia nostra? quamdiu etiam furor iste tuus nos eludet?" &c. He said it had been twenty years since he read this, and he might have erred in the quotation, but it was applicable to the occasion. This was the language of Cicero, when speaking of the Catalinean conspiracy. If the American people had been present in our galleries since the commencement of our session, they might vary this quotation, and say, how long, O! Whig men, will you continue to abuse our patience? How long shall your madness outbrave our justice, and continue to insult our understandings, and procrastinate this idle debate, at an expense of hundreds of thousands of dollars to the Government; at the sacrifice of every interest that is near and dear to us as American freemen. Why, sir, I would be willing to stake all I have in this world, ay, sir, I would be willing to stake my salvation, that there has been more money spent by the party which professes to desire a retrenchment in the expenses of the public printing, in idle, unnecessary debate, and in motions after motions to delay, procrastinate, and embarrass the business of this House this session, than the whole profits of the printing of Congress will be in the next five years. These debates have already cost the people of this country more than $100,000, if not $500,000. We are here in the fourth week of the session of the Twenty-sixth Congress, and there has not yet been the first step taken towards proceeding to the discharge of the high duties for which we assembled. The House has as yet been but partially organized. We have not yet elected a Printer, and the standing committees have not yet been appointed; and, sir, whose fault is it that this has not been done? What party in this House has prevented the action and organization of the body? What is it that has been struggling, day after day, to stave off the action of this House upon the matters which the majority desired to decide? And who is it that has introduced propositions time and again, which the House had previously decided, and called upon the House again to decide these questions? These questions will all be examined into by the people, and they will be able to point to the party which has occasioned all this delay and embarrassment to the business of the nation. Do gentlemen suppose that the people are to be duped and misled? Do they suppose that the freemen of this country are too ignorant to discover who it is that has piled motion upon motion in this House, in order and out of order, and consumed week after week in useless debate, when the business of the country was left untouched, and the public service suffering? Do gentlemen suppose that by their superior talents they can dupe and impose upon the people of this country by their cry of retrenchment, while they are thus squandering the public money in worse than useless debate, and leaving the public business untouched? Does the gentleman from Ohio, the gentleman from the Chillicothe district, I mean Mr. BOND, suppose that the people of this country are so easily imposed upon? Sir, even the people of that unfortunate district cannot be imposed upon by that gentleman longer, for the Administration is fast gaining ground even there; and if the people of that district cannot be longer imposed upon, how can the gentleman expect to deceive the people at large? No gentleman of understanding can take a serious view of this whole transaction, and compare it with what has heretofore taken place, without pronouncing it one of the most farcical and ludicrous exhibitions ever attempted to be played off on the American people. I am not here permitted to speak of the motives of gentlemen, because it is not in order; but if it was, I might say that we would hear none of this cry of retrenchment, if the election of this officer was to benefit a certain press, owned by a monster Bank, which is owned, in a great degree, by foreign capitalists, and which has always been hostile to the interests and rights of the people of this country. The course of honorable gentlemen might be very different on this occasion, if we are to judge from what has transpired on a previous occasion of a similar nature. It has been again and again decided by the American people, that this British Bank was of the most deadly hostility to the rights and the liberties of the people of this country; and the people have elected a majority of Representatives to this House at every session for many years, who were opposed to this Bank; yet, for the last two years, that Bank has had the benefit of the public printing of this House, through its agents, Messrs. Gales and Seaton. In fact, strange as it may appear, the Bank of the United States was the Printer of this House for the last two years; and no man could deny this assertion, so far as its emoluments are concerned.

Sir, the people have been humbugged too much on this subject—to borrow a favorite expression from the Opposition—and it is time that they knew the whole truth in relation to this matter. When the election of a public Printer was about to take place two years ago, the United States Bank was not strong enough to obtain the work without other aid, and a combination was entered into here to secure to it the benefit of this election. In the first place, a resolution was submitted by a gentleman, whose name I will not mention, as my relations with that gentleman are of a delicate character, showing the combination on its face. The resolution was as follows:

"Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ the editors of the Intelligencer, and the editor of the Madisonian, equally, to execute the printing of the House upon the joint resolution of 1819, until the first Monday in December next."*

This was a direct proposition, but it could not be carried, because some gentlemen were afraid they might be called to account by their constituents for voting for such a proposition; yet precisely the same proposition was carried by a secret agreement between these parties, as every body thought at the time. The Whigs and Conservatives, at that time, in consequence of this agreement, united upon one Thomas Allen, and he was elected, nominally, public Printer for that Congress. I stated to this House then, that it would require an outlay of some thirty or forty thousand dollars to prepare a printing establishment to do the printing of this House; and I stated further, that Mr. Allen, being a young man just commencing business, was unable to purchase an establishment to do this printing, and it was a ridiculous proposition to elect him principal Printer for the House. He, however, was elected, and the people were deceived. The people understood that a certain Thomas Allen was elected, and was to do the printing of Congress. Well, did he do it? No, sir: he never did the first page of printing for this House, virtually. It was all done by Messrs. Gales and Seaton, with an establishment notoriously belonging to the United States Bank. These gentlemen could not be elected, because certain gentlemen could not vote for them and represent the wishes of their constituents; yet by an agreement, or, as the old story is, by whipping the devil around the stump, they enjoyed the benefit of the printing of the last Congress; while the people were induced to believe that Mr. Allen alone enjoyed the benefits and profits arising from the printing of that Congress. Yes, sir, the whole history of that transaction is without a parallel in the proceedings of any legislative body in this nation, if not in the world. A bargain, proposed, consummated, and executed here in this body, to effect the grossest imposition on the American people that had ever been attempted before to be perpetrated in this country; by which means the Bank of the United States was made virtually the Printer to the American Congress, with all its foreign affinities and hostilities to the free institutions of our country; and it is, too, done by a party who have the boldness, I had like to have said effrontery, to stand up here now, and speak of corruption.

Are gentlemen so deluded as to think for a moment that these things are incomprehensible to the people, or that the great mass of the people have not mind enough to retain a just recollection of the history of these transactions? And is it to act over this disreputable transaction to elect the Bank of the United States printer of this Congress, that this most extraordinary course has been resorted to by the Opposition to embarrass and delay the indispensable business of this country.

I shall now read a few extracts from the journals of the proceedings of the House in relation to that election, for the benefit of the gentleman from Ohio, and some other gentlemen on this floor. If I understand the motion now before the House correctly, it is a motion of the honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DAWSON] to suspend the election of a public Printer at the present time, for the purpose of instituting an inquiry in relation to the prices of printing; and I intend to show what that gentleman's course was at the last session, when a similar motion was made. On the second day of the extra session of Congress, two years ago, "Mr. PATTON of Virginia moved a resolution that the House proceed to the election of a public Printer for the Twenty-sixth Congress, which was agreed to. The House then proceeded to ballot, and after five or six ballots were taken, it was found that there was no election. The House then adjourned to the next day, (Wednesday,) when Mr. BRONSON, a gentleman whose Democracy had never been doubted in this House, moved the following resolution:

'That the further balloting under the resolution of the preceding day should be suspended until the third Monday in December, and that the Clerk be directed to employ some person or persons to do the necessary printing of the House on the same terms it had been done at former sessions."

A motion was made by Mr. GRENNELL to lay Mr. BRONSON'S resolution on the table, and very fortunately the yeas and nays happen to be recorded on that subject; and how do they stand? Why, sir, we find recorded, in favor of laying this resolution on the table, [Mr. B. reading from the journal,] the names of Messrs. ADAMS, ALLEN, AYCRIGG, BOND, HOFFMAN, MASON of Ohio, DAWSON, &c. It went through the whole Whig alphabet, from JOHN QUINCY ADAMS to THOMAS JONES YORKE. Now, sir, (said Mr. B.) the resolution that I have just read, introduced by Mr. BRONSON, a member from New York, was in substance identically such a resolution as is now proposed by the honorable member from Georgia, [Mr. DAWSON,] whose patriotism has been so inflamed upon this occasion, and which has been advocated with so much warmth by his honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. B ND,] against which stands recorded the names, for all time to come, of these two most honorable and consistent gentlemen. But, sir, why should they alone be rebuked, when their names are accompanied with nine-tenths of their party?

Yes, sir, the resolution of Mr. BRONSON, identically the same in substance as Mr DAWSON'S, was voted down by a unanimous Whig vote; but Mr. DAWSON'S is now, by the same party, to be voted up, under similar, if not precisely the same, circumstances; displaying an inconsistency, the inevible result of all parties that act without the least regard to principle. These things should not be. No party can or should long endure, that would thus attempt to practise on the credulity of mankind.

At that time, the Whig and Conservative parties in this House were thirsting for some of the spoils, as they now call it, and voted to get rid of every resolution or proposition to suspend the election of a public Printer for any period. Now, however, the times are changed, and gentlemen necessarily change their action with them. If these gentlemen had the same prospect, by any combination, of electing their Printer, which they had at the last Congress, they would be the last men to postpone or thwart an election of public Printer; but now that there was a probability that another Printer would be elected, they used every means within their power to stave off the question by distracting and embarrassing the business of the House by every means that ingenuity could invent. But, sir, there was another favorite proposition of these gentlemen, submitted at the time Mr. BRONSON'S resolution was under consideration. Mr. PICKENS at that time moved an amendment, "that the printing of the House be given out by contract," and on this proposition the names of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS] and of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOFFMAN,] were recorded in the negative, and others, now of the Opposition.

[Mr. HOFFMAN explained that he had voted against this amendment because he believed then as he now believed, that the House could not give out their printing by contract until the resolution of 1819 was repealed]

Mr. BYNUM. The gentleman's explanation is perfectly satisfactory; but how was it with regard to some ten or a dozen of his friends who voted in the same way with Mr. JOHN C. CLARK at their head? I admit that a majority of the Administration party voted with these gentlemen, and they did so because they believed it impracticable to enter into an investigation of so important a matter, while they were in the act of balloting for a Printer, and when the important business for which they had been called together was pressing upon them. This was a matter which required time and careful scrutiny, and the House was then unprepared to go into it, as it is now unprepared to do so. It was impossible for the House now after, it had spent a month of the session in idle, useless debate, to go into this matter and put off the important business of the country for another month; and if gentlemen are serious in regard to this matter, let them wait until the House is organized in the regular and usual way, and the elections gone through with, and then introduce this matter in the shape of a resolution or bill direct. It is a question which requires time for investigation and reflection. I myself am not now prepared to say how I should vote on this question when it is properly brought up. Several years ago, I voted for Mr. PICKENS'S resolution. I offered a similar one the other day, and I did it as a kind of peace offering. I would now, after the election is gone into, and carried out, renew that resolution honestly and in good faith. As at present impressed, I think I should vote for a separation of the Government from the political press; but I have not examined the matter sufficiently in detail to enable me to speak positively on the subject. But I want a cool, deliberate, and honest investigation of the subject; and if it can be discovered that good will result from a separation of the Government from the political press, I will go for it. But, sir, I do not desire to intermix trifling with serious matters, because, not having the talents of some gentlemen on this floor, I am unable effectually to mystify these questions before the public and the world; and if I was to attempt to do so, I should be exposed, as I ought to be, to the indignant frowns of an honest people. Sir, my constituents are too honest and discerning to tolerate for a moment such an attempt.

I shall now say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BOND] with regard to the petition of Francis P. Blair. On that subject, too, if I am not egregiously mistaken, I think I shall be able to show the most reckless want of all regard for consistency, I will not say principle, by that honorable member and his consistency loving party. I will show that the latter part of the resolution, now proposed by the honorable member from Georgia, was then entertained, growing out of the petition of Mr. Blair, and a motion for a select committee, for a reference of the whole matter, was resisted almost unanimously by the self same party; and I think that the journals will show that these same gentlemen then resisted the reference of this identical proposition to a select committee of this House. He would read the resolution as it was finally referred:

"Resolved, That so much of the memorial of Francis P. Blair, as invites scrutiny of all his accounts for work executed for Congress and the public offices, be referred to a select committee, with instructions to inquire into the manner in which the public printing for Congress and the Executive Departments has been executed; whether the same has been done conformably to law, and whether any, and what, change can be made for the public good."

That subject came before this House, not in a questionable shape, as the gentleman from Ohio would have it, but in the shape of a petition; and the humblest American free citizen, he trusted, would ever have the right to petition this body for a redress of grievances, and to ask for such measures of legislation as would do them justice if they were wronged. And would the gentleman from Ohio spurn the right of petition on this floor, in the capitol of this free Republic, and in defence of oneself for personal wrongs? But to the votes upon the presentation of this memorial of Mr. Blair. A motion was made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. MCKAY] to refer this memorial, together with a resolution to go into an examination of the whole matter of public printing, and although the yeas and nays were not called on that question, all gentlemen on this floor that were here then, knew that the Whigs voted against this reference. The question was afterwards taken by yeas and nays directly on the reference of this petition to a select committee: we find the Democratic members voting for the reference, and the Whig members against it. Yes, sir, we find recorded in the negative on this question, [Mr. B. here read from the journals] the names of "Messrs. ADAMS, ALLEN, BOND, DAWSON," &c. This was the course of these gentlemen at the last session, who are now so anxious for an examination into the subject of the printing of the House, and so desirous to have it given out by contract. Oh, consistency, "what a jewel!"

With regard to this matter of giving out the printing by contract, I beg gentlemen to recollect this one fact, that there are but two establishments in this city at present which could possibly do the printing of this House. It required, as he had been informed, an expenditure of some thirty or forty thousand dollars to prepare a printing establishment to do the printing of the House, and no establishment can do the printing for th House but one of the two estensive establishments in this city; either it must be done by Messrs. Blair and Rives, or by Messrs. Gales and Seaton, and he hoped in God the Bank of the United States would not again have the benefit of the printing of this House. It was idle to talk in good faith of electing others at this time, whatever might be our feelings of friendship towards them.

If gentlemen were disposed to go into this investigation in good faith, after the House was organized, he was willing to go with them; but when he found them turning and twisting about as they had been, he was unwilling to trust them. Their course has been so refractory and impracticable, not to say factious, that I cannot now think of acting with them. Their efforts all seem to have been to resist the majority of the House, and set at nought the well established principle in this country that the majority shall rule. The principle that the majority shall rule is a well established principle in this country; and I warn gentlemen not to carry too far their violent resistance to this principle. Sir, if gentlemen carry out their resistance to this principle too far, they will find that the people will rise in their strength, and resist them. The people will not, and cannot much longer bear this resistance of the express will of the majority of the nation, as we have daily witnessed. But why this struggle for the existence of the United States Bank? Does the party with which it is identified depend upon this election of Printer of the House of Representatives to sustain their dying, sinking fortunes. No, no, gentlemen, this would avail you but little; your doom is fixed.

Sir, there is another matter which I desire to notice. An appeal has been made to a party in this House, called the Nullifiers. The Whigs are now under the necessity of appealing to that party, and their cry is, "help us, Cassius, or we sink." Sir, I make no appeal to any high minded and honorable men, as I know the members of this party of Nullifiers to be, for I know they will treat with scorn and contempt all such appeals to them. I know them to be a high minded and honorable set of men, and all these appeals are but insults to their understanding. I know the character of the constituents that they represent, and their feelings would revolt at the idea of giving countenance to such appeals; they know their duty, and will dare do it. The gentleman from Ohio has said that the petition of Mr. Blair came into this House in a very questionable shape. In reply to this, I may say that this proposition of the Opposition has come into this House in a very questionable shape. Let us, sir, go into a history of this thing What has been the history of this country for the last two years? Have we not heard it proclaimed in every quarter of this Union, that the party denominated the Whig party, have been anticipating a triumphant victory? Sir, have we not seen, that for several years that party had a triumphant majority in the Senate of the United States; yet during all that time they never brought forward any of those measures of retrenchment and reform in this department just now attacked by the party here. Sir, why did they not support these measures two years ago, when they were brought to to the notice of this House? Why, they did not support them, because they all knew that, by a union of the Whigs and Conservatives, their party would have a majority in this House, and they could elect their favorite public Printer. If there was now the same chance of electing the United States Bank, through its agents, Messrs. Gales and Seaton, Printer of this House, you would not hear, doubtless, the first whisper from them of retrenchment and reform in this department, if we are to judge from their conduct for the last two years. If there was a chance, by any combination that they could effect, to elect their candidates, all this loud vociferation would be hushed up, and you would hear no more from them of retrenchment in the expenditures with regard to the public printing. I judge so, sir, from what has taken place here, before our eyes, within the last two years.

Sir, I call the attention of the American people to the condition of this Congress and to the proceedings which have taken place here during the present session. Let the people examine for themselves, and see who it is that has delayed the business of Congress by a thousand little motions to stave off the public business. Let the people examine, and see who it is that has made motion after motion for adjournment, and repeated motions that had been again and again decided, and kept the House until the fourth week of the session without being organized. Let them scrutinize the journals of the present session up to this time; let them see that nineteen-twentieths of such motions have been made by these economical, time-saving gentlemen.

My friend from Georgia [Mr. DAWSON] had made this motion to postpone the election of a Printer, for the purpose of going into an investigation in regard to a retrenchment in the expenses of printing. My friend was a member of the last Congress, and was silent as the tomb upon this subject then. Now, I am not disposed to impeach his motives; but the world might say that he was silent last year because his friends were receiving the benefits of this printing, and he comes forward for retrenchment this year, because his friends were not likely to obtain it. I hope such are not the facts, but they will look so to all impartial men.

Sir, why do gentlemen endeavor thus to procrastinate debate, and stave off the business of the country? Have they not yet been sufficiently rebuked; and that, too, by their own friends, for such a wanton course? Have not honorable and high minded men of their own party become disgusted with their course, and declared on the floor that they would not act with them, if they endeavored longer thus to stave off questions? Did not the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. CRABB,] and the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. ALFORD,] rise in their places and tell their party, that they would no longer act with them if they did not come to an election of a Speaker? Has not the gentleman from Georgia made a similar declaration at a subsequent period? And are gentlemen waiting for another rebuke of this kind, from their own friends, before they proceed to the election of a Printer? They have been told that they were not sent here to act as a faction, and, I believe, by one of their own party; and will they, in the face of the disgust of their own party, continue such a course? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOND] has referred to the character of the memorial again sent in by Mr. Blair; but he had very judiciously kept out of sight the most important item of that memorial. Messrs. Blair and Rives had paid every dollar of the money in which Mr. Blair was held as security for Mr. Crockett, the Kentucky postmaster, and the memorial prayed for an examination into the matter, with a view of adjusting it. The memorialist did not ask that the money which had been paid should be paid back by the Government to him; but as there were certain funds coming to this postmaster from the Government, in the shape of a pension, the memorialist desired that this money should be retained, as an offset to the money which he had paid, if it could be done consistently with law.

[Here Mr. BOND rose to explain.]

If gentlemen were disposed to debate this proposition, and would fix a day for proceeding to the business of the country, we would meet them in an argument of the question. But I hope they will agree to let us proceed with the business of the country as speedily as possible. Let the House come, I intreat it, to a vote on this question, and let somebody be elected Printer of the House. If the United States Bank was the strongest candidate, let it be elected; if not, let it be given to Messrs. Blair and Rives; but I hope the country will never be duped, as it was duped at the last election, by the election of a man who never did and never could do the public printing. In every part of the country, sir, we learn that the public business is suffering for the want of the action of this House.

Sir, gentlemen, in my humble apprehension, mistake themselves, if they think they can effect any thing more, by keeping up this game of confusion, disorder, and procrastination, than a most unprofitable consumption of the time of this House, and an enormous waste of the treasures of the people. If there is any doubting character in this House that the party is after, I should like to know him; better that he were not here. I hope there is none such in the party to which I have the honor to belong, and I know of none in the other. No, sir, there are none amongst them; they keep their party too well drilled for that. Or can it be with a hope of some new combinations being formed, that this election is thus fought off with such pertinacity? It is time, sir, that every eye in this nation should be called to the proceedings of this House, that have transpired within the last four weeks, to judge how far they have been disreputable to the character of our Government, and how far they have been calculated to impair the confidence of mankind in the excellency of the free form of our Republican institutions. Sir, no intelligent patriot can contemplate such scenes, without alarming apprehensions for the downward course of this glorious and mighty Republic.

Gentlemen, in this hurricane of excitement, cannot be aware of what they are and have been doing, in their continued efforts on this floor to resist the sovereign will of this great people, as expressed through their Representatives here. I implore gentlemen to reflect, that when we refuse obedience to the sovereign will of a majority of the freemen of this country, the next step to be taken, is to decide our controversies by the strength and supremacy of arms, to which their course here is continually inviting us. Are they prepared for this, in this early state of the Republic? Have they lost, so early in the history of our country, all confidence in the decisions of a majority of our people, or does their thirst for power blind them to the train of calamities that would await us? Are they willing to return, or to force others to fly to that arbiter of violence and arms, to adjust a mere difference of opinion in relation to political principles, a thing that the wisdom of our fathers was so studious to avoid, on any and every occasion? Do honorable gentlemen here believe for a moment that the free people of this country are so benighted as to tolerate such a course, or that they have art and talents enough to conceal their conduct on these subjects here, from them on their return amongst them? Will there not be those amongst them, the people, who will point to the journals of this Congress for the last four weeks to show the number of motions to adjourn made by one party of this House, besides others of equal, if not of a more, frivolous nature? And are they ignorant how a just, not a factious, people will appreciate such conduct? Sir, I would say to them, in this wild, maddened career, it is time, if they have not given up all future hopes, to pause in the further prosecution of this reckless course, and respect more the just understanding of their countrymen.

As often as they have deceived themselves in undervaluing the intelligence of the people, it does seem that the lessons taught them within a few years and months since, should induce them to heed a language that has been so often spoken to them by whole States of this Union; or is it that voice, in the day of their political mania, that they are mostly disposed to treat with disdain and contempt? Sir, I would invoke gentlemen once more to discard these idle dreams of embarrassing the business of the country here for political effect abroad, and let us go to work and discharge the duties we owe as Representatives—that we owe to our constituents, ourselves, and the country; every department of the Government requires it—the necessities of the nation demand it.

SPEECH OF MR. BARNARD, OF NEW YORK,

In the House of Representatives, December 18, 1839—

Mr. BARNARD having the floor, asked for the reading of the resolution now under the consideration of the House, and it was read by the Clerk, as follows;

"Resolved, That Messrs. John B. Aycrigg, William Halsted, J. P. B. Maxwell, Jharles C. Stratton, and Thos Jones Yorke, are not entitled to be sworn as members of this House from the State of New Jersey."

Mr. BARNARD then proceeded as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: The question which the resolution just read proposes for the consideration of the House is, in itself, one of exceeding simplicity. It is, whether the members from New Jersey, appearing here upon their regular and legal returns, and now actually in their seats, by virtue of these returns, shall or shall not be admitted with ourselves, to the oath prescribed by the Constitution, it being understood that their seats on this floor are, or are to be, contested. This is the plain question for the House to pass upon. Simple, however, Mr. Speaker, as this question is in its terms and in its primary import, it involves, nevertheless, many and serious and weighty considerations; affecting not merely the success or triumph of party here or elsewhere—not merely the due organization of this House of Representatives—but affecting the integrity of the Constitution itself, and touching, it may be, in the end, the very existence of the Government under which we live.

Sir, a few days ago, I had the honor to offer a few remarks to my fellow members of the Twenty-sixth Congress upon the novel and interesting questions growing out of the contest for places in this House from the State of New Jersey, and I then presented and discussed two general propositions. One was, that no question whatever was presented for our consideration, or to be passed upon by us, supposing we had the power to do this, in regard to the returns of the members who were in their seats from New Jersey. That as returns they were complete in every particular; they were in strict conformity to law, and were wholly unimpeached by any body in the House or out of it. The other was, that the question of ultimate right between the return members from New Jersey and those who claimed their places was a question which was referred by the Constitution, in clear and explicit terms, to the judgment of the House of Representatives, when that House should be fully organized by the election of a Speaker, and when, all the members appearing and entitled to seats having assumed the prescribed and necessary oath, it should become a legal and constitutional tribunal, competent to act in a high judicial capacity. And I insisted that the body of Representatives then assembled without a Speaker, and without oath, had no power to entertain that question, and could only do so by an assumption of authority, which would make the proceeding, if attempted, essentially revolutionary.

These positions, sir, I believed then to have been sound. And I have the more reason to think them sound now, since, after ten days' continued discussion in the House, on the same general subject, I think I may be allowed to say without arrogance or vanity, that they remain, if not unassailed, at least unshaken.

Now the views which I propose to present to the House this morning, by its indulgence, in the somewhat altered state of this body, will be found to bear a strict relation and analogy to those formerly offered by me, built, indeed, to some extent, upon the points just referred to, and, at any rate, strengthened and supported by them.

The case of the New Jersey members is now presented to us as a body partially composed and organized in a constitutional way. We have now, at least, a constitutional head—we have a Speaker elected, and sworn by a member, and the members themselves, in turn, are in process of being sworn by the Speaker, as directed by law. Having all taken the oath except the return members from the State of New Jersey, those members, rising from their seats on this floor, which they occupy of strict right, present themselves, and demand that, like us and with us, they be sworn, as the Constitution requires, by the Speaker. Upon this it is moved by resolution that they be not sworn.

On this resolution I offer to the consideration of the House two distinct propositions:

First. That the only point which either the Speaker or the House has any right now to co sider on this demand of the members from New Jersey to be sworn is the fact, whether, like us, they are here upon their regular and legal returns; and, on this point, no question has been and none can be made.

Second. That the question of ultimate right between the return members and the claimants, or petitioners, who may contest the right, is one resting wholly on proofs out of and beyond the returns; and that, without those proofs—the whole of them—the House, even when fully composed and organized, cannot rightfully or legally judge and determine either the whole case or any part of it.

For myself, Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that much of the error which seems to prevail in various quarters on the matter before us, arises from the failure to mark the distinction which exists, and which is preserved in the Constitution, between the "returns" of members and their "elections." "Each House," says the Constitution, "shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." What are returns, as the term is here employed? The word is one of legal and parliamentary import, bearing a distinct meaning, which it acquired, as I suppose, from its use in the parliamentary practice and proceedings of England. In that country, according to my understanding of the matter, when elections to Parliament are to be held, writs are issued out of the principal court of the kingdom, directed to the sheriffs of counties, each of whom, in person, or by his bailiff, under authority of the King's precept, holds and conducts the election as the presiding officer and judge, ascertains the result, which he certifies in due form of law, and which, together with the writ, is returned, and becomes matter of record in the court from which the precept issued. The officer holding the election is the returning officer; his official certificate of the result, as he has ascertained it, is the return; and the person thus declared to have been elected is the member returned to Parliament. Once returned as elected, the person chosen is in office, and entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the office. "Every man must," says the Lex Parliamentaria, "at his peril, take notice who are members of either House, returned of record." Upon the meeting of the Commons, the return member takes his place in that body, not by the leave of his fellow members, but as a matter of right, by virtue of his election and return. No man, and no number of men, not the whole power of the kingdom, can rightfully prevent him.

Strictly analogous to all this, with some necessary changes in the forms of proceeding, are the legal provisions in this country for holding the elections for Representatives in Congress, and ascertaining and certifying the result. Each State, by the express direction of the Constitution, until Congress shall see fit to perform this duty itself, prescribes the times, places, and manner of holding its elections. The elections are held by or before certain officers designated and appointed for that purpose. The duty of "holding" elections naturally involves the duty of administering, for the occasion, the law by which the qualifications of the electors are determined and ascertained; and it also involves the duty, in some proper mode, of ascertaining and certifying the result. And such is believed to be the general scope of the legal provisions on the subject in every State of this Union. Such, at any rate, are the legal provisions on the subject in the State of New Jersey. The elections are held according to law; the votes of the electors are received in the several towns and precincts; the count is made in each case, and properly verified before some legally constituted returning officer or board, whose duty it is to ascertain and declare the general and final result. This result, thus ascertained and declared, becomes the "return" of the member elected, according to the Constitution; it is the instrument, be it in the form of a certificate or a commission, by which the fact of his election is verified according to law, and it is the record or paper evidence of his title to office. Armed with this "return," he is in office from the moment when his constitutional term commences, against all the world; and so to remain until the decision of the returning officer or officers shall be reversed by the only tribunal competent to review it—the organized House of which he is a member. Armed with this "return," he may claim, peremptorily, all the personal privileges and immunities belonging to his office; and, when the proper time comes, he may walk boldly into this hall, asking no man's leave, and here, the equal of equals, demand, in the name of the Constitution and the law, that all his rights, both personal and representative, shall be acknowledged and respected. For himself, the "return" is the legal paper evidence of the franchise which he possesses of his office, and the property he has in it; while to the House, of which he is a member, it is the mandatory precept of the law, which the House is bound to obey, in the first instance, without questioning, by a full recognition of all his rights and privileges.

But the Constitution, in a very proper manner, makes this House the judge of the "returns" as well as of the "elections" of its members. Yet it will not, I trust, be impertinent to the business in hand to remark that, so far in the history of parliamentary proceedings, whether in England or in this country, experience goes to show that it must be rare indeed that any question should arise, at least that any serious embarrassment should arise upon questions in regard to these returns, as such. I have not looked for precedents on this point, because I did not expect to find them; but other gentlemen have looked for them, and have presented precedents, with some pomp and circumstance, as if they were cases really to the purpose, and proved something. Sir, they prove nothing, except, indeed, when understood, they are, every one of them, authorities directly against every position which they were cited to sustain.

A little reflection will enable us to see at a glance that when members appear and claim to enter on their official duties by virtue of their returns, their fellow-members can seldom, perhaps never, be seriously embarrassed with doubts or difficulties—and this, whether before or after the election of Speaker and the due organization of the House. There is not much danger in the first place, that they will be troubled with questions of personal identity, or with questions in regard to the genuineness of the return. It is possible, certainly, in the progress of corruption and politics, that such impudent frauds may be attempted as the claiming of a seat temporarily on this floor, by means of a forged return, or a personification of the true member; but cases of this sort, it must be confessed, are not very likely to occur. The regularity of the return; its due conformity to the requisitions of the law, which, after all, is simply a question of fact—a question of return or no return—is a point on which doubts may arise; but this point—this question of fact—has never yet, so far as I know or have heard, occasioned—no, not in one solitary instance—any serious difference of opinion in any body of representatives whatever.

In the case of Moore and Letcher, so often referred to in the course of this debate, both parties claimed, but neither party had the regular and complete returns, as prescribed by the laws of Kentucky; nor can I discover that either party, or any friend of either party, personal or political, in the House or out of it, pretended any such thing. Neither gentleman was a return member of Congress, and neither, therefore, was in office of right, and by virtue of a return. The whole embarrassment in the case, and the whole debate—I mean as the case was first presented—grew out of an attempt to make the House prematurely entertain a question on the "election," when the only question was the mere matter of fact, whether there was, or was not, in the case, a legal and valid return. Take the long list of cases, too, so elaborately quoted yesterday by an honorable and learned member from Virginia, [Mr. DROMGOOLE] quoted, indeed, for another purpose, mainly, to which I shall take the liberty to advert very soon. In none of these cases was a question made upon the return of any member, or on the right of any member, having a valid return, to take his seat upon it, notwithstanding a contest raised in the mean time in regard to the election. Mr. Lanman's case, occurring in the Senate, and so strongly insisted on by the gentleman from Virginia, presented nothing else, as I believe, than the sole question whether the Governor of Connecticut, under the circumstances, had the constitutional authority to appoint a Senator to Congress.

Sir, it is a little remarkable that the very first case, so far as I know or believe, whether here or in Great Britain, where a question strictly upon a return, as such, ever came actually to a vote, has occurred in this body, and since we came together to form the House of Representatives of the Twenty-sixth Congress; a case which shows that, though as yet bold, open, and gross attempts at high-handed frauds in popular and representative rights are not likely to be successful, still the time has already come when such attempts are and may be expected to be made. We had associated with us on this floor a member from Pennsylvania [Mr. NAYLOR] who, like ourselves, was here upon a regular and legal return. And, at the same time, there appeared here an individual [Mr. INGERSOLL] who professed to challenge the right of Mr. NAYLOR to his seat. This individual had been beaten in the canvass before the people by a majority of six or seven hundred votes; but, at some twelve months, I think, after the election, and after his competitor had received from the proper authority the official documentary evidence of his having been chosen, this person, as it seems, succeeded in obtaining from a pliant Governor, not in office at the period of the election, and having no power by law in the case, but who was induced, ignorantly I hope, to prostitute his high station to this unhallowed use—he obtained a formal recognition or return, as if he had been actually elected a Representative in Congress. With this document from the Governor in his hand, this individual dared to come here, to offer himself to our notice as an elected Representative of the people from the State of Pennsylvania; to violate the sacredness of this legislative hall with his presence on this floor, and insult and degrade, as far as in him lay, the dignity of the representative character by mingling with this body, by attempting to take the floor in debate, and by actually voting upon a division of the House! Sir, I know not how it may strike others, but, to my mind, this was the highest and most indecent outrage ever offered by any one person to the Government and institutions of the country. And it is not the least odious or alarming feature in the case, that his monstrous pretensions were tolerated, and even countenanced, for several days together, by members of this body. But the question upon his pretensions was finally brought to a vote, when not one was found—no, sir, not one—even of those who had given him the right hand of faith and fellowship—not one was found to interpose a negative to the common and united voice with which he was pronounced a usurper and intruder, without even the shadow or the color of right to justify or excuse him. Sir, it was, in my opinion, a great error, and a precedent of pernicious example, that a vote should have been taken at all in the case. It was a case of unwarrantable intrusion and disturbance, and was fit only to be handled by a Sergeant at-Arms. The intrusion of persons on this floor from the State of New Jersey, not having regular returns, was as little to be justified by precedent or principle as that of Mr. INGERSOLL; though this is to be said of their case, that it was one in which it was possible for men of honest and fair, but ardent minds, to fall into unintentional error.

Mr. Speaker, I have referred to these cases, and others occurring in parliamentary history, in order to show that, if we could bring our minds to believe that an unformed and unsworn House of Representatives was, or could be, clothed with any portion whatever of judicial power, such as is indicated by the Constitution when it declares that the House shall be the judge of the "returns" of its members, yet that, in point of fact, no case has arisen, and none is likely to arise, of any the least difficulty, calling for the exercise of any such power by such an unformed House. My own impression certainly is, and has been from the beginning, that the whole of this power of judgment committed to the House of Representatives over the returns of members, as well as over their elections and qualifications, belongs exclusively, by the very nature and necessity of things, to the House when fully formed, organized, and sworn. When a new Congress meets, and a new House of Representatives is to be formed, the duty of members, meeting for that purpose, towards each other is plain and simple. They meet as equals; every one of them is in office by virtue of a regular return, if he have such return, and all are bound to respect the personal privilege and representative character of all. "Every man," says the established law of Parliament, "must, at his peril, take notice who are members returned of record;" and this obligation is no less strong upon members themselves in regard to each other than upon the world beside. The return is a title, a title to office, a title to a franchise, to a property in actual possession, and is good against all the world till the right is disproved, and the possessor, upon proof, and by a regular trial and judgment, is ousted. An assembly of men, standing in such a relation to each other, and meeting to form themselves into a House of Representatives, can never, I feel sure, find any the least difficulty, if only they meet disposed, one and all, to obey and follow the simple injunctions of the Constitution and the law.

And, Mr. Speaker, is this body now, in its present state, and before all, each and every one, appearing simultaneously with the rest, and bearing the legal authority and evidence of membership, shall be admitted to the oath—is this body now in any better condition to enter into a judicial investigation touching the returns of members? It seems to me that still nothing is offered, or can be for the consideration either of the Speaker or the House, but simply the fact, whether these gentlemen from New Jersey are here upon their legal returns. If they have such returns, a fact which nobody questions, then their right is equal to ours, or to yours, sir. The House of Representatives cannot be composed without them, according to the Constitution. You are bound to take notice that they are members, and to administer to them the oath which they demand to take.

But, sir, the position assumed by that portion of this body which opposes the admitting of the members from New Jersey to the oath, so far as I can learn or understand it, is this: that now, if not before, we have a House of Representatives capable of entering on any business assigned to such House by the Constitution and the law; that they understand and believe that the right of these members from New Jersey is impeached by persons standing ready to contest their seats; and that, until that contest shall be decided in the legal and regular way, neither the return members nor their competitors ought to be, or shall be, admitted to seats on this floor. This is the position of one portion of this body; and I propose to examine this point, and to show, as I believe I can, to these gentlemen themselves, who stand on this ground, that they are acting in a great error—a great error; and one which, when exposed, should, if it do not, frighten them from this dangerous position.

Supposing, for the sake of the argument only, that now, though with a portion of its return members on the spot, and necessary to its composition, not yet qualified to act with us, as they demand to be—suppose the House is competent to take the whole case of the New Jersey members into consideration, and adjudge upon it—admitting this, let us see what it is that is proposed to be done under the resolution now before us.

The question of right in regard to the alleged contest for seats from the State of New Jersey is one which rests of course on proofs. It is a case for judicial investigation and trial; and it is essential to a judicial proceeding that the judges should hear and consider, as well as determine and adjudge; and it would seem to me to comport at least with decency, if not with common justice, that the whole case should be heard and considered before either the whole case, or any part of it, should be decided. Now what I desire to say, and what I charge in the most distinct and explicit manner in this case, is this: that, by passing this resolution in the affirmative, the House will give a solemn decision on one highly important feature of the case, making an essential part of that final judgment which the House may pronounce after a full hearing, but which cannot, and no part of which can, with either sense or decency, be anticipated in such a manner. It will be literally a judgment first, and a proposed hearing afterwards.

Sir, let gentlemen consider for a moment what will be the process of hearing and judgment on the merits of the New Jersey question. A committee must be appointed in the usual way, who will take the case into consideration, and hear all the proofs and allegations of the respective parties. First, we may suppose, will appear the members holding the Governor's commission—that is to say, the returns; and this will be enough for their purposes, in the first instance. Then will come the claimants, with their proofs to establish the fact, if it be so, as they are understood to allege, that, when the poll lists are all examined, and a correct count is made, the majority of votes actually cast will be found to have been given to them; and here they will rest their case. The burden is then again upon the commissioned members, and they will proceed to present their proofs to show, as they allege they can, that the poll lists must be purged of so many fraudulent and illegal votes given against them as to turn the scale of legitimate numbers once more in their favor, and give them the election. On this latter point, undoubtedly, the whole case must eventually turn; for nobody, I suppose, doubts, after all that the country has heard on the subject, that a large number of persons, chiefly foreigners, voted at this election in New Jersey, by direct and dishonest procurement, who were no more entitled to a voice in the election than would have been the maimed skeletons of all the Hessian mercenaries slain on the soil of that tried and suffering State in the conflict of the Revolution, if the trump of party could have been sounded loud and deep enough to bring up the those skeletons for this purpose from their dishonorable graves.

The proofs being closed, and the parties having been heard before the committee, the next thing in order would be the report of the committee; and with this in possession of the House, the case would stand for judgment. Now it must be remembered that no suggestion whatever is made, nor is it pretended in any quarter, that a choice was not actually effected in the New Jersey election. Five gentlemen, besides the one now in his place from that State, were elected, of the one party or the other; and the judgment of the House must be finally entered accordingly. That judgment, then, will be—supposing one entire set or the other to be found to have been chosen—in substance, either that Mr. Aycrigg and his associates are entitled to their seats, and that Mr. Dickerson and his associates are not; or, that Mr. Dickerson and his associates are entitled to their seats, and that Mr. Aycrigg and his associates are not. It is the latter alternative, out of all doubt, on which it is expected by those who oppose the present admission of the return members, that the decision of the House will finally rest. Suppose it shall be so; I then ask, and I put the question solemnly home to gentlemen, how much of the judgment of this House, implied in the resolution that Mr. Dickerson and his associates are entitled to seats on this floor, and that Mr. Aycrigg and his associates are not—how much of this judgment are you ready and willing now to pronounce? How much of it dare you anticipate without any hearing or proofs whatever, by a present decision? Sir, it is in terms precisely one equal half of this judgment that gentlemen are now about to anticipate and declare by their present refusal to admit Mr. Aycrigg and others to the oath. Once pass such a resolution, and you have given a direct decree against these gentlemen of exclusion from their seats. It is in vain to say that it is a mere refusal to admit them to their seats, and that for a limited time. It is not in your power to admit them. They are in office, and in their seats, without your aid, and in spite of you. If you refuse them the oath, they cannot act, because they must be sworn before they can act, by the direction of the Constitution and the law; and this is equivalent to an ejectment. You turn them out, you expel them, by a direct substantive act, and you could do no more after a full hearing of the case. The hearing had, and the conclusion I have supposed found, you may pass your fiat for the admission of Mr. Dickerson and others; but the excluding of Mr. Aycrigg and his fellows from the House will have been done already, and nothing will remain to you in regard to them but to confirm a judgment solemnly rendered by you before the trial commenced!

But this is not all. It will be something more than half the judgment in the case which will be rendered before trial; it will lack little in substance and fact of being the entire judgment which will thus be rendered beforehand. Upon what ground is it that you can try, or inquire at all into the right of the return members to their seats? Is it not merely upon the claim set up by their competitors? Could you, if parliamentary usage were observed in the case, ever hear of an impeachment of their right but through the petition of the claimants? You dispense with the petition, and you receive the claim—and what is that claim? Why, that they, the claimants, have a better title to the offices in question than the incumbents have. The latter have possession, and the others are trying to get possession; one party is in, and the other is endeavoring to get in. What is the settled and universal rule in such cases? Why, that the party who is out and seeking to come in must show a better title before possession shall be disturbed. It is only because of that better title, first shown affirmatively, that the incumbent can be dispossessed. He is removed, not upon the weakness of his own title, but solely to make room for another who establishes a good title. What, then, is the act of dispossessing the incumbent but a distinct recognition of the better title of the claimant? How far short does this come of a judgment to that effect?

It is no new or extraordinary thing that the legal right to an office should be litigated between a claimant and the incumbent; and there is nothing in this tribunal which should change the common principles of justice applicable to such cases. Was it ever heard, in any court, that a claim being set up, the incumbent was first dispossessed, and the right of the claimant heard and determined afterwards? A man is in peaceable possession of his estate, his dwelling, or his farm; and one claiming to have a better title brings his action of ejectment to recover the possession; it would a little astonish, not lawyers merely, but all men, I think, to hear that the first order of the court should be to turn out the occupant, and leave the premises vacant, to await the judgment of the court on the right of the claimant when a hearing and trial should be had. And yet this is precisely what is proposed to be done in the case before us. You would not entertain a question in the case but upon the claim of those who profess to set up a better title, and, upon a full hearing, you could not legitimately determine and adjudge that the party who is in must go out, but by finding that the party who is out is entitled to come in; and this you are now about to do, not after a full hearing, or after any hearing, but without hearing, or proofs, or trial, or any pretence of any such thing. You are about to decide and adjudge, in substance, upon the whole case, on its merits; you, constituting the grandest judicial inquest and tribunal in the nation, you are about to do this before trial and without trial; and you then propose to go on afterwards with the solemn mockery of a hearing, with nothing left for you to do at the end, if the case turns out as you hope and believe it will, but simply to adopt some mere formal recognition of your own foregone and recorded judgment.

Honorable gentlemen, with a show of great moderation and candor, have been free to confess that, in their opinion, these claimants of seats ought not themselves to be admitted until they have made out their case upon the trial. Really! But, in the mean time, you think it perfectly just and proper to begin the process with turning out the return members. Now, do you not see that you do not, and cannot, take such a course, upon the supposed weakness of their title? That their title, indeed, is not only not weak, but that it is perfect, unimpeached, and positively unimpeachable, except by supposing that their adversaries have a better title, and were themselves elected? Upon this supposition—this faith, this foregone conclusion—and this only it is, that you entertain even a suspicion of the title of the return members, and that you are willing to aid in ejecting them from their places. And therefore it is that I now invite you—I now call upon you, to be consistent, and take courage enough to go on, and act the doctrine out. Your judgment is, if it mean any thing, that the party who is out, according to the present prevailing inclination and faith of your mind, has the better title—has the title; and of course, that the party who is in has none. Now, I say to you, be men, and execute the whole of this judgment, if you really mean to execute any part of it. If you turn out one party, put in the other—do it; for I tell you, you have not the shadow of pretence or excuse for turning one party out, but because the other party has a right to come in. Put them in, then—do it! Do not be alarmed for the result or the consequences. If your present foregone conclusion shall turn out to be right upon the facts, the whole judgment is already executed to your hand. For form's sake, you may then recognise and confirm it. And if it be otherwise—if the facts in the case shall perversely fail to bear you out—why, what will it matter? It is but the reversal of a judicial decision after hearing, which it was convenient to you to pronounce before hearing—if it must come to that, which there are many chances of your avoiding, after all; and, in the mean time, the present is safe enough. Five party votes against you are got rid of, and five party votes for you are secured, for two, or three, or six months, as the case may be; the present is made sure—let the future take care of itself. Do it, then, I invite and advise you—do your whole will in the case, and not merely the half of it—do it!

Mr. Speaker, an honorable and learned member from Virginia, [Mr DROMGOOLE,] in the remarks with which he favored the House yesterday on this case, argued to us, with much sincerity and earnestness, that a House of Representatives, once organized and qualified according to the Constitution, has the power and right to go into evidence, on a question of contested election, out of or behind the return. Sir, nobody, I believe, at this day, doubts or disputes that proposition; and the honorable member might have spared himself the pains of quoting so many authorities and precedents to prove it. But it is one thing to show that your court has competent jurisdiction and power to try and determine a great judicial question, and quite another thing to maintain that that court may adjudge and execute first, and hear and try afterwards. And this is what gentlemen here propose that this tribunal shall do; nay, this is what the honorable member himself maintained, in substance, that this House ought to do. We have before us, said the honorable gentleman, some evidence in the case touching the point of the contested election, and we may now act upon that, so far at least as to exclude the return members from their seats, until the whole case shall be heard. Upon what principle of justice or right will you do this? And does not the gentleman now see that this same evidence if sufficent to exclude the return members until the whole case shall be heard? is sufficent also to put the claimants in their places until the whole case shall be heard? Indeed, does he not see that there is no evidence whatever to impeach the title of the return members, except that which goes to establish the adverse title of the claimants? That, in truth, the validity of the adverse title is the conclusion to be drawn from the evidence, if any can be, and that the failure of the other title is merely an inference from that conclusion? The argument of the gentleman proves too much—much more than he intended, I think; for I have not yet understood that he is prepared to go at once for the admission of the claimants, though he is prepared to go for the exclusion of the members who are in their places. But upon what principle, I ask again, will he venture to adjudge and decide upon any part of this case? By the very terms of your proposition, you admit that a part only of the evidence, and not the whole, is before you; and you, sitting as a judge, with the oath of Heaven upon you, will decide now, and hear the rest of the matter afterwards! You will decide, as I say, the whole case now, or, as you must admit, at least a principal point in the case, and afterwards—yes, afterwards—proceed regularly to the trial! But, besides, you talk of evidence, as if really there was any evidence whatever yet in the case. Sir, there is none—not a particle. Do not tell me of the certificate of the Secretary of State of New Jersey. Another man—any other man—had as much legal right to make that certificate, for the uses to which it is here attempted to be put, as he had; nay, there is not a poor beggar in the streets, betwixt this and Trenton, who has not as much right, legally, to certify the members returned from New Jersey out of their seats, in this summary way, as this Secretary of State had. Evidence, indeed! Judicial minds, methinks—judges—should demand something very different from this when they would have evidence.

Sir, the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, that we should receive and act now upon what he calls the evidence before us, is identical, in this particular, with that offered a few days ago by an honorable member from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] and in which that member was ingeniously supported by an honorable colleague of his, [Mr. HOLMES;] but it should be said, in justice to these gentlemen, that they would have made this "evidence" cover the whole case; they would not have rested with the exclusion of the members who were in, but they would have brought in the claimants upon it to fill the vacant places.

The position of the honorable member [Mr. PICKENS] was briefly this: that it was competent for a body of Representatives, without any organization whatever, not, indeed, to go into the question of contested election, but to determine upon evidence who of the parties contesting seats "were entitled to the return;" and he thought that the evidence before us, in the present case, was sufficient to settle that question conclusively in favor of the claimants. It would be difficult, I think, to find another instance where an ingenious mind was more entirely deceived and misled by a mere form of words. What did the honorable member mean when he proposed that we should look into the certificate of the Secretary of New Jersey to see "who were entitled to the returns?" He admitted that we could not, in the state we were them in, go into the merits of the election, and yet we might decide who were "entitled" to the returns. I pray to know, sir, who were ever, at any time, strictly entitled to the returns but those who were actually elected? The State officers furnish to the members, and through them to us, according to law, and by a power expressly confided to them under the Constitution, their decision, in an authentic form, as to who were "entitled" to the returns; and this is conclusive, until the House of Representatives, duly organized and qualified, shall revise and reverse this judgment, upon proper proof and due deliberation. When that is done, then there is a new judgment as to who are "entitled" to the returns; but this is a judgment upon the election, and nothing less. And when the honorable member proposed, therefore, that we should undertake to ascertain who were "entitled" to the returns, it was only proposing, though not himself, I dare say, aware of it, that we should try the election question on its merits, and try that question, too, upon evidence that evidence was none, or, at any rate, upon evidence that was known and acknowledged to be partial and defective. The proposition itself, in terms, was presented with the knowledge of the fact that the evidence, such as it was, could only carry us forward to a certain point in the case, and there it would leave us. In short it would bring us to this notable conclusion, standing uncontradicted, that the majority of votes actually cast in the New Jersey election, counting all, good and bad, legal and illegal, legitimate and fraudulent, were given for the claimants; and upon this finding we must admit the said claimants as being "entitled" to the returns. The allegation of fraudulent and illegal votes in the case, and a great many of them, is distinctly made, and nobody pretends to question the fact; and yet we are to go on and decide, in a judicial way, that those gentlemen are "entitled" to the returns, and to their seats here, who had succeeded at the polls in securing for themselves the greatest number of these fraudulent and illegal votes.

And why must this flagrant and foul injustice be done, and why must we do it? Verily, because this is now found to be the Constitution and the law! It is now discovered, after a necessary and uniform practice to the contrary for fifty years, that though the State laws, passed in obedience to the requirements of the Constitution, may authorize State functionaries to "hold" elections for Representatives in Congress, yet these functionaries can have no constitutional power to judge, even in the first instance, of the qualifications of electors, or of the result of a canvass. Their duty is to receive the votes that are offered—all of them, bad and good, and count them all up, and there irthe duty ends. They cannot ascertain and certify any result; they cannot make a return, or, if they do, such return is to go for nothing. It is the business of the House, according to this new doctrine, as a preliminary measure, before any organization whatever, getting at the facts as best it may, to cast up the votes which have been given, find where the majority falls, and thus determine and ajudge who, in the first instance, are "entitled" to the returns, reserving the important business of purging the poll-lists of the frauds with which they may be tainted, to a later and more convenient season. And this new doctrine is found, we are told, after a careful analysis of the Constitution, by which a prevailing confusion of ideas on the subject is dissipated! And there is no confusion of ideas in supposing that to judge of the "returns" of members is to determine who are "entitled" to the returns, and that to determine who are "entitled" to returns is not to judge of the "elections;" no confusion in supposing that a body of gentlemen should come together to form a House of Representatives, not one of whom has any right or title to sit and act as a member until the House, not yet composed, as it cannot well be without members, has passed upon his pretensions, and determined that he is entitled; no confusion in supposing, as the gentleman did, that though the Consitution requires the members to take an oath, yet, as it does not specify when that oath shall be taken, the injunction will be well obeyed if the oath be taken, without regard to the time when—in other words, it may as well be taken in June or July as in December, as well on the last day of the session as on the first; and, in the mean while, a positive statute prescribing that the oath shall be taken "before the transaction of any other business," need not be brought into the account at all; no confusion, in short, in supposing that you may have a House to judge without members; that judges may as well be sworn after judgment, as before; that a judicial tribunal may have power expressly given it, by the Constitution, to decide a cause upon hearing one-half the testimony, and that half authenticated in no legal manner whatever, at a time, too, when it has no constitutional authority to hear the whole evidence—in other words, may have power to do a great wrong, but no power to do right except by accident; and, finally, that the House of Representatives is directly instructed by the Constitution to admit to their seats, in the first instance, those persons, in all cases, who shall have received, in the elections, the greatest number of votes, counting all, the bad and the good together, and to admit such persons, therefore, as should have been, or should be, by themselves or their friends, most unscrupulous and most successful in practising a gross fraud and outrage on the sacredness of the elective franchise and on the purity and majesty of the laws! In all this there is no confusion of ideas, all this is the result of a careful analysis of the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, the honorable gentleman from South Carolina goes with the rest for excluding the return members from New Jersey from their places on this floor: let the House, let the country judge, if he offers a better reason for the measure than the rest. To my mind it all comes to the same thing. Gentleman agree well enough in their conclusions, though some may travel a long road, while others take a short cut to get at them. They agree that the members from New Jersey, as much in office as themselves, must be excluded. Judgment must be pronounced, and execution had now, and by and by there shall be a regular and satisfactory trial.

Perhaps, sir, the briefest mode of arriving at this same practical and necessary result which has been suggested by any body, was that presented yesterday by another honorable and distinguishable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT.] He suggests that the resolution now before us contains a proposition, if now identical, equivalent to one already passed upon and decided, and which is of binding force and effect upon this House. His position is, that the proposition is "res judicata," that it has been decided, and that the decision was in the negative; that this House has pronounced its judgment against the admission of the return members to their rights and privileges on this floor as the Representatives from New Jersey—at least until the point of ultimate right upon the election shall be determined.

It must be remembered that upon the former resolution to which the honorable member refers, the members, when the resolution was put to the vote, were found to be equally divided. Of course, says the gentleman from South Carolina, it passed in the negative.

Now, in the first place, I must deny, in a manner the most solemn and explicit for me to do, that a vote of a tribunal acting judicially, in a matter affecting either personal or representative rights, ever had, or ever can have, the legal effect of a judgment where the members are equally divided in opinion, whatever may be the form of the question. Nothing is, or can be, decided in that way. The matter stands as if no vote had been taken. The House of Representatives acting judicially, can no more put a man out of office, or put a man in—can no more change the incumbency of an office, temporarily, or permanently and finally, without a vote, affirmative in effect, whatever form it may assume, by a majority of voices, than any other judicial tribunal, any court of competent jurisdiction in the land, could do the same thing without such majority of voices.

But, sir, while I make this denial in regard to the effect of a divided vote in the case referred to, I will take leave to recur for a moment to the resolution which has been supposed to be so identical with that now under consideration. That resolution did not embody a simple proposition; is declared, first, that the credentials of certain persons from New Jersey were sufficient to entitle them to take their Seats in the House. And, second, that the question of contested election ought to be left to be decided afterwards. Such were the affirmative propositions stated in this resolution, and the resolution was voted upon entire. What, then, was the converse of these two propositions taken together, and which, it is contended, was established and decided by a negative inference? Why—to present the converse in a reverse but proper order—that the question of contested election ought to be decided now, and before the members from New Jersey should be admitted to their seats, and therefore they should not take their seats, upon their credentials alone.

Mr. RHETT here rose and asked for the reading of the resolution referred to; and it was read as follows:

"Resolved, That the credentials of the following members, John B. Aycrigg, John P. B. Maxwell, Wm. Halsted, Chas. C. Stratton, and Thos. J. Yorke are sufficient to entitle them to take their seats in the House, leaving the question of contested election to be afterwards decided by the House."

Mr. BARNARD proceeded. Such was the resolution, Mr Speaker; and such, I repeat, as I have explained, was the plain converse and negative of the propositions contained in it. This converse and negative, says the honorable gentleman, was established and decided by the body which passed, by a vote, upon the resolution. In short, then, that body decided that before the return members from New Jersey should be admitted to their seats and allowed to act in the appropriate business of that body, the House, as then constituted, would go on, and, in its own way, determine the question of the contested election.

Mr. Speaker, if the inorganic body of Representatives—I use the term advisedly, sir—did thus resolve, then, whether binding on this House or not, at least it would seem it must to have been binding on themselves. What did that body do? How did they regard the position in which they found themselves after the vote on that resolution? How did the gentleman himself and his friends, the political majority in that body, conduct themselves under that decision? Sir, that decision, if made, threw the House back upon the precise position it had occupied a short time before, when a prior resolution, moved by the honorable gentleman himself, had been put to the vote, and passed by a clear majority. A brief recital of events will show what that position was, and what was done under it.

This House was thrown into its original embarrassment in regard to the New Jersey question by the refusal of the Clerk of the House to perform the plainest ministerial duty which was ever imposed by Constitution and law on a public officer. He refused to call five members returned from New Jersey. Upon this, after a delay of some days, it was proposed, in the form of a resolution, that the Clerk should proceed to call the roll of members returned as elected to the 26th Congress in the usual way. This resolution was laid on the table, on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT.] And thereupon, it was moved by the same gentleman that a proceeding, equally unusual and extraordinary, should be adopted. A resolution was adopted, on his motion, first, that the Clerk should proceed to call those members whose seats were not contested; and then, that such members, being a quorum, should, before the election of Speaker, proceed to hear and adjudge upon the elections, returns, and qualifications of other persons claiming seats in the House. The roll of members occupying uncontested seats was then called, and a quorum was formed; and it then remained to carry the latter part of this order of the body into effect. And so it was actually attempted to be done. A resolution was offered, and carried, that a committee should be raised for this purpose. Yes, carried! And honorable members were actually casting about, some of them, at least, to make their ticket, preparatory to the election of that committee! But, sir, that solemn farce—no, sir, that solemn revolutionary proceeding—was suddenly arrested. Gentlemen were appalled at the position in which they had placed themselves. They had gone as far on that road as they dared to go, or could go. The Constitution and the laws began to thicken and darken in the way before them. It was obstructed, absolutely blocked up. The end could not be seen; night, thick night, was brooding over it; there was not left a solitary, distant star to twinkle on that new, untrodden path. They hesitated; they retreated; they returned. By a unanimous vote, the resolution for the appointment of a committee was reconsidered; and then was presented that resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] upon which the tie vote which has been referred to was taken.

Now, sir, recurring to that resolution, we see what it was that body, by plain inference—if the position of the gentleman from South Carolina as to the effect of the vote upon it be correct—resolved to do. By a double obligation, having passed two separate and distinct resolutions to the same effect, that body determined, in substance, that they would proceed to hear and adjudge, before the election of Speaker, on the returns, elections, and qualifications of all persons claiming contested seats in the House. This was what was deliberately and twice resolved to be done. And now, how did that body act on their own resolutions? How did they follow up and obey their own orders? Did gentlemen then go on, and make another effort to try the New Jersey question on the merits? No, sir, they had enough of that. To permit the members returned from New Jersey to occupy their seats, as they were clearly entitled to do, was not to be thought of for a moment; and to enter into any investigation of the case was as little to be thought of. It was easy enough to resolve to investigate, but not so easy to do what was resolved should be done. There was an ugly knot in the case, and, as it could not be untied, it was cut. In the face of their own order, twice given, and binding upon nobody but themselves, gentlemen turned short round, and resolved to proceed without further delay to the election of Speaker. This resolution was executed, and a Speaker was chosen, the votes of five members from New Jersey having been early in the canvass refused and omitted in the count.

And now, what is the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT?] Why, simply, that a resolution of that body, which had had an anomalous existence here before the election of a Speaker—a resolution which the gentleman himself, and his friends, composing a majority, declined and omitted to regard as having any binding force or effect, in one of its most important features, even on themselves, by whom it had been passed—that resolution shall, in another feature of it, at least, be considered as revived and in full force, and binding on the House of Representatives now, at least partially organized by the election of a Speaker. With what kind of face can the gentleman ask us now and here to consider a resolution in force, which he himself, and a majority of the House with him, have heretofore, and when, if ever, it should have been deemed obligatory, repudiated in the most distinct and explicit manner?

But I have another objection to make to the res judicata of the gentleman from South Carolina. I plead to the jurisdiction. I do not recognise any authority in that body which passed, by vote, upon the resolution referred to, over this House of Representatives. The gentleman asked, with some emphasis, if not with an appearance of triumph, when arguing for the identity of this body with that which existed here before any organization—the gentleman asked: Does the election of a Speaker make a House of Representatives? I answer, sir, if it do not, yet you cannot make a constitutional House for the transaction of business without a Speaker. A House of Representatives, under the Constitution, is composed of members and a Speaker. Each constituent is essential to the other. It is just as necessary to have a Speaker as it is to have members. The Speaker of the House of Representatives is an officer of the Government, receiving his appointment indeed from the members, but deriving his powers from the Constitution and the law. Let gentlemen ask themselves what the members can do without a Speaker to perform his part in the business of the House. Can the House in the first place, hold, or begin to hold, its daily sessions, without a Speaker to take the chair? By the general parliamentary law the Speaker is to appoint committees, unless the House, by a positive act, take the power out of his hands; and how can the House take power away from a functionary who has no existence? By the same general law, the Speaker decides questions of order, with which the House does not interfere, except by way of appeal. Can the members receive an Executive or any other official communication, without a Speaker to receive the messenger or organ of communication? The members may pass laws, but the Speaker must sign them. They may order an arrest, or imprisonment, but the Speaker must issue the warrant, or commitment. They may order witnesses to be sent for, but the Speaker must issue the subpœna. In short, gentlemen will find that members, without a Speaker, are members, but not a House for the transaction of business; and if there were no other reason for it, it is sufficient that, by the express terms of an existing statute, there can be no House for business without an oath, and there can be no oath without a Speaker. For myself, therefore, sir I cannot consent to regard any order or resolution of a body of Representatives, assembled but not yet organized, without a Speaker and unsworn, as having any force or authority whatever over a House of Representatives composed and organized for business, as this is now claimed to be, according to the Constitution and the law. No, sir, there is no res judicata in the case. Even after you shall have voted now, in your present state, by a majority, as I suppose you will, against admitting the members from New Jersey to the oath, and by which you mean to exclude them from their seats, the case will be no more res judicata, in my opinion, than before. You will have done an act by the physical power of members, and the effect may be just what it would have been if you had had the constitutional authority to do it; but I tell you that an arbitrary and lawless decree—a decision before trial and without a hearing—is no judgment in legal acceptation, that it wants all the sanctions of a judicial determination, and is to be submitted to just so far as submission is compelled, or may be politic, without compulsion, and no further.

Mr. Speaker, the honorable gentleman from Virginia, near me, [Mr. DROMGOOLE,] in the conclusion of his speech, demanded why it was that we must have the members from New Jersey in the House, so long as it was known to every body that their ultimate right was at least dubiful. Why must we have some body—why need we have any body to fill contested seats on this floor? Why not wait till the contest should be decided? Sir, my answer is a plain and direct one. We must have these members, because they are members, by the law of the land, as much as we are; and because we cannot form a constitutional House of Representatives without them. They are here, in office, by the same tenure and the same authority by which we hold; they are here as early as ourselves, and ready to unite with us in composing the House. The Constitution gives to New Jersey the right to have them here, and if you can form a House, under the Constitution, without them, you can, by the same rule, form a House after lopping off as many more of us as may suit your sense of propriety or convenience, taking care only to leave a bare quorum.

Besides the point on which you rely to justify this proceeding is that you are advised that the seats of these members will be contested. The rule, then—a rule, so far as your precedent and example can go, which is to be established law hereafter—the rule is that the House being informed, however informally, that the seat of a return member is to be contested, such member stands aside, by order of the House, till the contest shall be determined. I ask gentleman to look seriously and steadily at the monstrous evils they are about to introduce by such a rule. Who does not see how easy a thing it must always be to get up claims to the places of return members, and very plausible claims too? Nothing is more common, from one end of the country to the other, than elections decided by a very close vote between the candidates, and nothing is easier than to make allegations of fraud or mistakes in such cases, or indeed in any other cases. But according to this rule, it is the mere setting up of claims, with or without foundation, which is to deprive members of their seats. Facts cannot be inquired into, because it is not possible to try the question in a preliminary and summary way. There is nothing for it but to take the mere allegations of the party making the claim, as enough to decide the matter. Denials must go for nothing. Members of the House, regularly commissioned and accredited, must be thrust out of their places, as many and as often as there can be found men, honest and dishonest, to set up a claim to their seats. With what a tremendous power are you here clothing any unscrupulous party which may at any time be found occupying seats within this Hall! Such a party need give itself no trouble to secure a majority here through the popular elections; it may create that majority for itself on the spot. Finding itself short by a dozen votes or so, it has only to procure claims to be set up for the seats of an equal number of obnoxious members, when the seats of such members become vacant of course, and the whole thing is done. And then we have only to get one step further, and, in the progress of incoming political corruption, suppose two great parties to meet here, both equally unscrupulous, and of nearly the same numerical strength, when, under the operation and cover of this very rule which you are now about to establish, they will go on, pari passu, decimating each other's numbers, and neither yielding in profligacy or obstinacy to the other, until no quorum shall be felt, and the House, if not the Government, be ipso facto dissolved.

Sir, I trust that no man respects more than I do that feeling, wherever it may be found, which revolts at the violation of the popular will, whenever that will is legally and constitutionally expressed. I can readily understand, without imagining any thing sinister or improper, and I can therefore pardon something of that zeal and that pertinacious adherence to a mistaken and fatal line of conduct, of which we have seen so much on this floor; for I do not doubt that many gentleman came here believing, seriously and in good faith, that the people of New Jersey were likely to have their will trampled upon and violated by the admission here of the return members from that State. The mistake in the case is, in taking for granted what remains to be proved, and what can be proved in only one way, and that is a way provided and clearly marked out by the laws of the land. So far as the fact has yet been legally ascertained, these members are the persons, and the only persons, to represent the popular will of New Jersey; and if the truth be otherwise, it will be found in time—just in the time and the mode appointed by law—and then the proper correction will be made. And I would take leave to remind gentlemen, such as honestly make much of the popular will, that ours is a Government of Constitution and laws, as well as a popular Government; and I know of nothing, no, nothing fraught with higher danger to such a Government, than that the Constitution and laws should suffer encroachment and violation, under the pretence of serving or preserving the ascendency of the popular will. I say to gentlemen, preserve your Constitution, and your Constitution will preserve and maintain the true sovereignty of the people. But once depart from the Constitution and laws, once give them up, once let slip the cables and drop off these anchors into the great deep, and we are adrift, with our last and only security gone. The moment this is done, this Government becomes a government of men; ay, a government of the strongest. Occasionally, indeed, reason may lift her feeble voice, and be heard; but the certain end will be confusion, anarchy, and blood. Strike out the Constitution, in any one essential feature of it—do this and you strike out the sun from our political firmament, and you leave all those ponderous bodies, the States, the planets of our system, to wander on in illimitable space, without any thing to keep them within their wonted and proper spheres, and with nothing to prevent or preserve them from those dreadful and destructive collisions which will inevitably follow.

Sir, if this House, or the country, need a commentary or a warning in regard to the course of proceeding in case of a contest for seats here such as has been and is proposed to be adopted on the present occasion, they have that commentary and warning in the history of the present House of Representatives. What is that history? We are now in the middle of the third week of an attempt to organize the House, and the organization is not yet completed. What has produced this extraordinary and dangerous delay? Sir, on the first day of the session, the Clerk of the House, acting no doubt, as he was advised and instructed, having a plain and simple duty to perform which should have embarrassed nobody, suddenly came to a dead stand midway in his call of the roll of members returned here as Representatives. The position on which he rested was identical in substance with that which the majority of the House now seemed disposed to adopt and maintain. It was, that in all cases where members returned to this House are followed here by claimants with the avowed purpose of contesting the seats of such members, whether with reason or without reason, on good grounds or on no grounds at all—nobody, of course, can tell—in all such cases, such members are to be excluded from their seats until the question of ultimate right shall be decided. In the conduct of the Clerk, then, a mere ministerial officer, who arrests a high public proceeding, and for the time brings the Government itself to a pause we see the first practical effect of this novel and dangerous doctrine. And what has followed this bold and unfortunate beginning? For four days the body of Representatives here assembled went on without a head, unless the Clerk might for some purposes be so regarded, preserved from confusion and violence only by an extraordinary exertion of mutual forbearance and moderation. An important change in the condition of the House was then effected. Pressed by a strong necessity, and a common sense of danger, the House resolved to escape, while it could, for the delicate and hazardous position in which it was placed. A venerable member from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] fitted by his age and his superior merits for the occasion and the office, whose long and eventful life had been one of devotion to his country and to mankind—who had once been called by the confidence of his countrymen to preside over and guide the destinies of the nation—he was named, almost by acclamation, as the proper individual to preside over and preserve the order of the House, and was conducted accordingly to the chair.

And now a new spectacle was exhibited to the country and the world. We, the assembled Representatives of the nation in Congress, unable as yet to compose and form a constitutional House, had now resolved ourselves into a body, organized, indeed, in our own way, yet inorganic as a House of Representatives, because without organs known to the Constitution and the law—a body of Congressional Representatives, with an extra-constitutional organization, drawn up in formidable and imposing array, with an extra-constitutional head, and standing, not on the platform of the Constitution, but standing without, at the portals of that great edifice of Government founded and reared by our fathers, with no flag waving over us but one that we may be said to have borrowed for the occasion, that we might seem to belong to a country and a Government, and to be acting in their name. Fearful condition for ourselves and for the country—this body, this extra constitutional body, lasted for ten days or more, and until, indeed, all felt and saw that its existence could not be protracted much longer, while the way of escape seemed only to grow more and more doubtful and difficult. A dark, mysterious, and impenetrable future was before us; and what man among us had courage to look over the precipice on which we stood, and peer into the deep, deep, fathomless gulf which yawned beneath our feet? Sir, the boldest shrunk back. The hope of escape to which all clung, though none could tell how that escape was to be effected—this hope, and the efforts it inspired, finally saved us; and let us, one and all, thank God devoutly for our deliverance.

Now, I appeal earnestly to gentlemen, shall not the past suffice? I beseech, I implore them, by the difficulties we have just encountered, by the appalling dangers we have just escaped, not to pursue their doctrine and policy further; not to go on, and, by a solemn and deliberate decision, establish a precedent for a course of proceeding which has been found productive of nothing but difficulty and peril in its first practical workings, and which, if persisted in now, bids fair to rise up before the assembled Representatives at the meeting of the very next, and every new Congress, to produce a repetition of the delays, embarrassments, and dangers which we have experienced, and to end, finally, nobody can tell in what disaster and ruin. For the sake of peace—for the sake of order—for the sake of the country—for the sake of freedom, of constitutional, American freedom, and freedom all over the world, I beseech gentlemen to pause. Let them pause. Let them not tread one step further the perilous way they have attempted. Let them return to the plain and pleasant ways of the Constitution and the laws; and then, and then only, shall they, or we, or the country, be safe.

EECH OF MR. CLAY,

OF ALABAMA,

In Senate, January 8, 1840—On the bill for the armed occupation and settlement of that part of Florida overrun by hostile bands of Indians.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said that when he made the motion for adjournment yesterday, it was not his intention to address the Senate on this subject to-day; but, on reflection, he had determined that he would now submit some views, which he hoped might not be wholly unworthy of consideration.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] who addressed us on yesterday, said Mr. C. now occupies a position very different from the one in which he stood, and utters sentiments very much at variance with those he seemed to entertain, about eighteen months since, when the bill making appropriations for the further prosecution of the war in Florida was under consideration. At the time referred to, he not only censured (with very few exceptions) all who were in any manner connected with the management of the war, but declared substantially, that before one cent more was appropriated for its further prosecution, an investigation ought to be instituted, as to the prodigal expenditure of the public treasure, which, he said, had already then taken place, and also as to the causes of the disgraceful failures of former efforts to subdue the enemy. Now, sir, what is the Senator's present position? He not only considers this bill wholly inefficient and unequal to the accomplishment of the object intended by its passage, but he is now willing to vote for an army of any number, —say ten thousand—fifteen thousand—nay, the gentleman went so far, if I am not mistaken, as to profess a willingness to vote for an army of twenty thousand men; and this without any investigation, and notwithstanding all his charges and complaints of extravagance, in relation to the manner in which the war has been heretofore conducted. He (Mr. CLAY) was constrained to consider these views of the Senator from South Carolina, as wholly inconsistent, and irreconcilable with those which he formerly entertained and expressed. Why, sir, (said Mr. C.) the Senator has represented to us that the expenses of the Florida war, from its commencement to the present time, amounts to some twenty or twenty-five millions of dollars, which he very properly considers enormous; yet, almost in the same breath, he professes his readiness to raise an army that would exceed his highest estimate in a single year. When the Administration proposes the expenditure of more money to effectuate the objects of the war, it is all wrong; too much has already been expended; and when the Administration proposes to economise, to stay the hand of prodigality, as the Senator formerly characterised it, and pay for the conquest of the country in a small portion of the land, it is still all wrong; the measure is entirely inefficient; the gentleman would now have us pour out the public treasure, to the amount of millions, more than has ever before been expended! So frequently do the views and sentiments of the Senator change, that it may be well questioned whether the Administration can devise any measure that will meet his approbation.

But the Senator from South Carolina not only abuses the Administration for the manner in which the war in Florida has been directed, but also reflects censure on the military officers who have been engaged in it.

[Mr. PRESTON explained. He said directly the contrary. He had said that some of the officers had behaved with great gallantry, and instanced Generals Scott, Clinch, and perhaps General Taylor.]

Mr. CLAY resumed. He said he was aware there were some exceptions from the Senator's denunciations; but, he said, he certainly felt justified in saying the Senator from South Carolina did reflect on the conduct of some of the officers, and more particularly that of General Jesup. The gentleman alluded unfavorably to that officer's conduct in the Creek nation, and to the manner in which he had been made to supersede General Scott, and to the unfortunate results of his operations, while commanding in Florida. Mr. C. also said he recollected that the Senator had arraigned his conduct on a former occasion, and had represented it as not worthy of an American officer. Mr. C. said he would take that occasion to say of General Jesup, what the Senator himself might have known, if he had looked back into the history of those matters, that, before he left the command of the army in Florida, he had requested a court of inquiry into his conduct, which, however, was deemed unnecessary, and declined by his superiors. I will go further, (said Mr. C.) and say that General Jesup is now willing, and at all times prepared, to defend his character and justify his conduct in that war, and, indeed, his whole military course in the South, before any court of inquiry that may be instituted here or elsewhere; or before a committee of the Senate, should the gentleman think proper to move an investigation of that character, or should the Senate think proper to appoint one for that purpose.

But the Senator from South Carolina has taken occasion to bestow much commendation on the course pursued by General Scott, and insists that, if he had not been removed from the command, in all probability, not more than another campaign would have been necessary to terminate the war. Now, (said Mr. C.) what are the facts? Did not General Scott begin the war with what every one deemed a competent force? He had the regular troops, which had been under the command of General Clinch—the troops brought into the field by General Gaines—and, if I mistake not, had authority to call, in his own discretion, upon Georgia, Alabama, and some of the adjacent States, for any additional volunteer militia force he might deem necessary. He did have troops from both the States named, and probably from some others. The Indians were then concentrated, or, at least, in large bodies, and, Mr. C. believed, generally ready to give battle. Mr. C. said he would not pretend to speak with much confidence as to what might or ought to have been done under the circumstances stated; but he might be permitted to speak of results, and from them gentleman would be able to form some opinion, as to the accuracy of the Senator from South Carolina. Gen. Scott formed his own plans, for aught Mr. C. knew, very judiciously; he marched his army through the country in various directions, exhibiting an imposing force, fighting battles whenever the occasion offered, and, no doubt, always ready to give battle; but was the enemy subdued? No—so far from the fact, or any indications of it, on the part of the Indians, they fought his volunteer troops out of the Territory at the close of the campaign, on their return march, at least those from Alabama, and Mr. C. was under the impression those from Georgia also. Yes, said Mr. C. when the volunteer regiment from Alabama were on their return to Tampa Bay, from a fort then called Alabama, (now, he believed, called Fort Foster,) about thirty miles distant, to embark for their homes, they were attacked by the Indians in great force at Clonotasassa, and fought one of the hardest battles of the whole campaign, which continued about an hour and a quarter; and, although we had a glorious victory, it resulted in the loss of many valuable lives. Such, sir, were the indications of a speedy and triumphant close of the war, at the end of the first campaign. Then what ground is there for saying that Gen. Scott (from whose reputation, as an officer, Mr. C. said he had not the slightest wish to detract) would have terminated the war in another campaign? Several campaigns, under the direction of other commanders, have since taken place, and the objects of the war have not yet been attained—consequently, when the gentleman from South Carolina insists that Gen. Scott would have accomplished those objects in one more, if he had not been recalled, he indirectly casts censure upon other officers equally skilful and meritorious. At all events, said Mr. C. let the gentleman show what would have been done by Gen. Scott, that his successors in command have not done.

Sir, said Mr. C. some allusion has been made by the Senator from South Carolina, to the conduct of the Creek war; and as I happen to know, personally, many of the circumstances under which General Jesup acted on that occasion, I feel it my duty to refer to them. If they had been fully known to his commanding General, I have little doubt they would, as they should, have called forth commendation instead of censure.

Had General Jesup been disposed to take up the line of march from Tuskegee, the head quarters of the Alabama volunteers, with any undue haste, he might have done so four or five days sooner than he did. He had a sufficient number of troops in the field to have fought every Creek Indian then in arms against us; he had arms, munitions, subsistence, and the means of transportation. Independent of seven or eight hundred Alabama volunteers, then under his immediate command, and a still greater number at Irwinton, he had secured the co-operation of the powerful chief Hopoth-le-Yoholo, with some fifteen hundred friendly warriors; and knew he would be joined on his march by an additional battalion of mounted men then on their way. His troops had been some time in camp, were in danger of becoming sickly, impatient for active service, and liable to that discontent which long delay universally produces with the best citizen soldiery. In the mean time he had ascertained from a source that merited the highest confidence, that Tuckabache-Hadjo, a popular chief, was vascillating as to his course—balancing between a union with the hostile Creeks or the whites, and that, if he had joined the enemy, he would probably carry over with him some two thousand warriors. This chief was a brother of Nea-Micco, a principal chief, who was already at the head, and encamped with a portion of the war party. Such an union was greatly to be deprecated; it would have rendered the enemy formidable indeed, and would very naturally have rallied against us much the larger portion of the fighting men in the nation. Under such a state of things, not a moment could have been justifiably lost; it became the duty of Gen. Jesup to take such steps as would strike terror into the enemy, already in the field, and deter others from augmenting his force. Fortunately for the country at large, but more especially for Alabama, Gen. Jesup promptly determined on the proper course. There were two routes leading from Tuskegee to Irwinton, whither, Mr. C. believed, Gen. Jesup was ordered to march and join Gen. Scott, the most direct of which led near the encampments of the enemy. During this march Gen. Jesup captured Neamathla, the life and soul of the war party, with his son. The celebrated chief alluded to was the master-spirit, who had raised the storm, and he alone was able to ride in and direct it. This well-timed and most fortunate capture struck terror and dismay into the hostile party, and at once terminated the war. In a few days afterwards they were all captured or subdued; the white inhabitants restored to their homes, and pursuing, in safety, their usual avocations. Suppose it had been contrary to orders, (which, however, Mr. C. denied to be the fact, so far as he was informed,) is there any Senator present who would not be ready to justify a departure from the prescribed line of march, under such circumstances, when it was certainly to be followed by such happy results? By this fortunate and prompt movement, a war, which had been commenced with one of the most powerful and warlike of the Indian tribes, was terminated without bloodshed, (after the troops were in the field,) which might otherwise have cost thousands of valuable lives, and have been as protracted, and have cost as many millions of dollars as that with the Seminoles. Sir, said Mr. C. it was my fortune to be at the headquarters of the Alabama troops, on the occasion referred to, and, knowing the state of things, as I did, I not only advised, but urged Gen. Jesup to adopt the course he did; and, so far from meriting censure, his conduct entitles him to commendation and gratitude.

Mr. C said he did not think it necessary, or proper, on this occasion, to pass on the relative merits of those two officers. Their deeds were recorded in our history, and known to their countrymen. They had both distinguished themselves in some of the hardest fought battles on our Northern frontier, during the late war with Great Britain. And he would not have made the remarks which had fallen from him, but for the wrong done to Gen. Jesup, under circumstances with which he (Mr. C.) was familiar, and because he desired that justice might be awarded to that meritorious and distinguished officer.

But, said Mr. C. the gentleman censures the Administration for the results of the Florida war. On what ground? Had the Administration been remiss in furnishing men, or the most ample means for prosecuting the war? Did any person imagine, at its commencement, that the force under General Scott was insufficient? He had, perhaps, as effective an army as any that has since been in the field. His requisitions were all met. He had regular troops and militia—infantry and artillery. He had not only those under his own command, but the unexpected aid brought into the field by the veteran, General Gaines, who had hastened to the scene of conflict, without awaiting orders, the very moment he had heard of the war-cry of the enemy; and, who, it is believed by some, whose opinions are entitled to weight, would probably have terminated the contest at one blow if he had had three hundred mounted men. Who but the commanding general directed and controlled the operations of the army? Not the President—nor, Mr. C. presumed, the Secretary of War Then, if blame is to be attached to any, in regard to the first campaign, it should not fall on the Administration.

The same, Mr. C. supposed, might be said of all the campaigns which had followed it. The Administration had sent officers of established courage, known experience, and high reputation, into the field; and had furnished men, arms, munitions, and subsistence in the greatest abundance. What more could be desired? Did such facts warrant the imputation of imbecility, impotence, or inefficiency, so far the as the Administration was concerned? Mr. C. said he was willing to leave this question to be answered by the good sense and justice of the country.

One thing, Mr. C. said, was certain, that notwithstanding the many hard fought battles—in not one of which, he believed, had there been a single instance of cowardice, either amongst the regular troops, or volunteer militia—notwithstanding the number of lives that had been sacrificed, and the millions that had been expended; and although we had killed, or captured and removed some three thousand Indians or more, the war was not yet over—the savage warwhoop still resounded in Florida—the unrelenting tomahawk and scalping knife were still rioting in the blood of men, women, and children, indiscriminately; and whilst the number of the enemy had been reduced, there appeared to be no diminution of the ferocity and persevering desperation of his attacks. The plan of operations hitherto pursued, Mr. C. said, had entirely failed to bring the war to a close, nor could he see, if it should be continued, that its purposes would be accomplished in any definite period. Such doubts, uncertainty, and discouragement, were not only felt here, but, he believed, amongst our fellow-citizens every where; and even the officers and soldiers of the regular army were dispirited and desponding.

Mr. C. said if the Senator from South Carolina would examine the report of the Secretary of War, which accompanied the President's late annual message, he would find that even General Taylor, who was now, and had been commanding in Florida ever since the return of General Jesup, (and whom the Senator had lauded, no doubt very justly, for his chivalry and known ability)—yes, sir, even General Taylor despairs of success, by continuing hostilities as we have heretofore done. After a most melancholy account and gloomy detail of his operations during the last year, General Taylor adds the following remark:

"And should the war be renewed, (which I most sincerely hope may never be the case,) the only way to bring it to a successful issue, in my opinion, is to cover the whole country, so as to prevent the enemy from hunting and fishing."

This, sir, said Mr. C. is the very language of despair. He deprecates its continuance, and sincerely hopes it may never be renewed. Yet, sir, all this is right as regards General Taylor, in the judgment of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON.] No blame is to be ascribed to the present commanding General, but it is to the inefficiency of the measures of the Administration we are to ascribe all our failures. Now, sir, said Mr. C. while I will not cast censure upon others, with my limited means of information as to the mode of conducting the late campaign, I beg leave to invite the attention of the Senator from South Carolina, and others, to the facts as contained in the official report of the Adjutant General, with the sanction of the General "commanding-in-chief." He said it would be found in the "Return of the Army employed in Florida against the Seminole Indians, under the command of Brevet Brigadier General Zachary Taylor," there were the following number:

Second regiment of Dragoons -	10	companies.
Third regiment of Artillery -	9	"
First, second, sixth, and seventh regiments of Infantry, ten companies each, making -	40	"
Aggregate of regulars - -	59	"
Besides Florida mounted militia	10	"
And making a grand aggregate of	69	"

[Here Mr. PRESTON asked the Senator from Alabama to give the general result in numbers.]

Mr. C. said he would readily comply with the Senator's request; and, turning to another column of the return, said 3,991, or, in round numbers, an army of 4,000 men, consisting of dragoons, mounted volunteers, infantry, and artillery. Mr. C. here asked, was this an inefficient force to fight the Seminole Indians now in Florida? He said he could not pretend to estimate the number of the enemy with accuracy, but the Senator from South Carolina had represented the number of warriors at about three hundred. If this calculation be correct, (said Mr. C.) the army might have been divided into eight parts, and either would have been able to have fought successfully the entire force of the Indians; for each eighth part would have been as five hundred to three hundred. Now, it did not appear to Mr. C. that an army more than thirteen times as strong as the enemy to be encountered, could be regarded as a very inefficient force.

But, Mr. C. said, General Taylor seemed to suppose, if the war should be renewed, the only way to bring it to a successful issue, in his opinion, is to cover the whole country, so as to prevent the enemy from hunting and fishing. This seemed to justify an inference in favor of the plan proposed by the bill under consideration, which, though not proposing to cover the whole country literally, approached that plan as nearly as practicable, as it contemplated establishing bodies of men in all parts of the theatre of war. To cover the whole country by a standing army, Mr. C. supposed could not be intended, for if it were even as numerous as that proposed by the Senator from South Carolina, amounting to 15 000, the Territory being 45,000 square miles, there would not be more than one man to every three square miles. Nor, from the experience we had had, did Mr. C. think there would be much good done by marching an army of that number through the country. The Indians might then, and no doubt would, dispersed as they were, in small bodies, retire as our troops approached, conceal themselves in some neighboring hammock, and, thus eluding them, be as secure as ever.

But, sir, said Mr. C. whatever may be the opinion of General Taylor on this subject, there can be no doubt of the approbation of the Secretary of War. It will be found, by reference to his report, that he gives it his express sanction. The following is the passage to which I allude:

"The passage of the bill introduced in the Senate during the last session, and partially acted upon in Congress, for the military occupation of Florida, would, it is believed, be attended with beneficial effects; and I further recommend that authority be given to the Executive to raise one thousand men, to serve during the war in Florida, who shall receive the pay of dragoons, and, upon its termination, a bounty in land. These men it is proposed to arm and equip, and drill in a manner to render them equal to the Indian warrior in vigor and endurance, and to employ them in active operations during the ensuing winter. The exigencies of the service at this particular juncture, compel me to ask this additional force. It will be seen that the state of the Western frontier requires the forces there to be increased rather than diminished, and the condition of the Canada frontier will not allow the withdrawal of the troops at present stationed there."

The Secretary not only recommends the passage of the bill, but he, at the same time, states facts which are, of themselves, a powerful argument in its favor. He says: "It will be seen that the state of the Western frontier requires the forces there to be increased rather than diminished; and the condition of the Canada frontier will not allow the withdrawal of the troops at present stationed there." Yes, sir, and he might have referred, also, to the state of the Northeastern boundary, where, in my opinion, we should also have a strong military force, prepared to act as exigencies may require. But, sir, he has said enough to show that all our regular army, not already in Florida, has sufficient employment elsewhere. Whence, then, is the Senator's army of fifteen or twenty thousand men to be drawn, admitting we were willing to increase our expenses some thirty or forty millions of dollars? Will the gentleman increase our regular army to that amount, or will he raise them from the militia? Mr. C. presumed the Senator intended from the latter, and he had no doubt it could be done. For, said Mr. C. I know the mass of our citizens, who constitute the militia, are ever ready to rally around the standard of their country whenever she needs their services, and are always brave and efficient when their operations are skilfully conducted by officers who are worthy of their confidence. But, sir, experience has demonstrated that they are the most expensive class of troops. Besides, such calls are extremely annoying and injurious to our citizens, breaking in upon their accustomed avocations and pursuits. He said they had already fallen heavily on Alabama. She had already furnished three regiments for the Florida service; and whilst it was true that, stimulated by laudable pride and patriotism, they were all volunteers—not a man having been coerced into service by draft—yet it had resulted ruinously to many of them, whose claims for property lost in the public service were now lying in the Third Auditor's office, unadjusted and unpaid, after the lapse of nearly two years. Such treatment was calculated to cool the ardor of the most patriotic citizens, and render them less cheerful in obeying the call of their country in future emergencies. Mr. C. said the calls for citizen troops, to fight the Seminole Indians, had not been confined to Alabama. Georgia, Tennessee, and some of the other States had felt the burthens of this service. It would be unreasonable to expect them to furnish the immense additional force that seemed to be contemplated by some gentlemen, and which, or even more, would be necessary to meet the views of Gen. Taylor.

Mr. C. thought the provisions of the bill were the best calculated to terminate this long protracted war. The other plans had been tried with all the advantages of gallant troops and skilful officers, and had failed. [Mr. C. then read and commented on provisions of the bill.] At the conclusion of the war, and when the Seminoles had been removed west of the Mississippi, and not till then, each settler would receive his three hundred and twenty acres. Well, suppose the whole number provided in this bill would go; but for himself, he did not believe the whole number would—it was not necessary—a less number would answer—but suppose all should go, it would require about 3,200,000 acres of land, which at the ordinary price of our public lands, would amount to $4,000,000. If economy be the object, this plan is better than any other proposed. If it should accomplish the purpose in view, it will only cost us the land, and one year's subsistence and clothing—if it shall fail, or the Indians are not removed, the land will not be given to the settlers; they can claim no other reward for their services under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. C. said there were more than 26,000,000 acres in that portion of Florida occupied by the Indians, of which we propose to give three and a quarter millions to those who have to conquer it all for us, before they will have a right to possession. Do gentlemen see any better mode of conquering and removing the Indians from Florida? All the large bodies are captured and dispersed, and there only remain small straggling parties or individuals, which it is impossible to "catch," as proposed by the Senator from South Carolina, by merely marching an army through the country. Such a purpose is not to be attained by a transient force; it can only be accomplished by a stationary, or permanent body of men. The bill proposes that the settlements shall be in stations, designated by the commander of the United States troops in Florida, according to a general plan, to be approved by the President; not less than forty, nor more than one hundred settlers to be at each station; that each station shall be protected by block-houses and stockades, to be put up by the settlers, with the aid of the United States troops; and that special military protection shall be given to each company of settlers, while putting up their block-houses, and a general protection afterwards, by military force kept in the country. In such block-houses the settlers, and all others in their vicinity, would find protection at all seasons, as the experience of the Western country had proven. Indians do not use artillery, nor understand its use; and one hundred men could efficiently protect themselves within these wooden fortifications, against 1,000 Indians. It would be the interest of the settlers to get the lands into their possession as soon as possible, to watch the marauding Indian, and capture or destroy him whenever he put his head out of his hammock. Let it not be supposed that if this bill is passed, there will be any difficulty in finding men in sufficient numbers, of stout hearts and willing hands, who will be ready to close with its offers. The West and the South still contain men enough who are willing to undertake, and able to accomplish, like deeds of noble daring as distinguished their ancestors in days gone by in their conflicts with the savages. Yes, sir, many of the descendants of the hardy pioneers of the West would gladly embrace this opportunity of acquiring a freehold. In my own State, when a regiment of volunteers was asked for of two battalions—for one of those battalions to consist of five companies, eleven companies presented themselves at the place of rendezvous within ten days from the date of the order requiring them, though many of them travelled more than an hundred miles; and for the other battalion, four or five companies more than could be accepted offered themselves. Although these troops returned not altogether pleased with the manner in which things were conducted, a single county had since furnished two full regiments, and were still ready to volunteer, on terms much ess favorable than those offered by this bill. There were a great many hardy and industrious men residing in the States of Georgia, Alabama and Tennessee, who were not possessed of freeholds, who would avail themselves of the terms of this bill to acquire them, and defend themselves by the strength of their own arms. He said three hundred and twenty acres of such soil as that represented to be in this portion of Florida by the communication of the Surgeon General, which was before us at the last session, would lay the foundation for an ample competency for an industrious man and his family. A bounty so liberal, to be obtained, probably, by one or two years' honorable military service, at intervals, (for it was not intended that they should be continually in service throughout the year,) would hold out strong inducements to the bold and enterprising; and he would not be surprised to see battalions or regiments going forth, almost in bodies, to secure its advantages.

Mr. C. said he could not doubt that the plan proposed by the bill was practicable, and that it would be carried into effect. He said it was in this manner that a large portion of the Western country had been settled and reclaimed from the occupancy of hostile bands of Indians, and with less aid and protection from Government than was offered in this bill, as many who were now living could attest. He was unwilling to believe that we had so far degenerated in courage, tact, or energy, that the present age was unequal to the achievement of victory and conquest over, comparatively, a handful of savages, cut off, as they were, from the assistance of any other people.

But, said Mr. C. if the prospect of success were less encouraging, the plan is worth an experiment. If it should fail, it will cost a comparatively trifling expenditure. We have tried all the ordinary modes of warfare without subduing or expelling the enemy. We have had all our principal officers there, and all their efforts have resulted unsuccessfully. The officer who has commanded them during the last campaign, and who has been so highly extolled for his gallantry and skill, is opposed to a renewal of the war on the system heretofore pursued. Shall we submit, ingloriously, to a mere remnant of a paltry tribe of Indians, and suffer them to remain masters of a valuable portion of our territory, perpetrating their savage cruelties, and marauding upon our fellow-citizens with impunity, and without restraint? Or shall we incur the expense of the enormous addition to our military establishment which has been suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina? Or shall we adopt the measure now under consideration? Mr. C. said he could not hesitate in giving his decided preference to the latter; believing it would result in the conquest of the country, and the removal of the only tribe of warlike Indians now east of the Mississippi.

Under similar circumstances, and with such views, the bill received his support at the last session of Congress, when it passed the Senate. He would again vote for it, and trusted it would now receive the support of a majority of the Senate.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SPEECH OF MR. DUNCAN, OF OHIO,

In the House of Representatives, January 9, 1840—On the subject of the New Jersey election for members of the Twenty-sixth Congress:

Mr. DUNCAN said, he had been rather a looker on than a participator in the scenes that have been acting from the time since we have assembled; and but for some charges that have been made against the Administration he thought it his duty to support, and the party to which it was his duty and his pride to belong, as well as some doctrines that have been advanced, which he thought pernicious and dangerous in all their bearings and tendencies, he would not now attempt to detain the body in its struggle, either for party ascendency or the establishment of the rights of the people of New Jersey; and before he progressed, to oppose the former, or sustain the latter, he hoped he would not be considered out of order, if he responded to some of the charges made and some of the positions taken by the Opposition, not directly bearing on the question really before the House.

The first charge that he would attempt to meet was that which every Opposition member, who had addressed the House, had made against the Democratic party, viz. the consumption of the people's time and the people's money. Sir, we have fallen far short of the people's expectations in the time which has been occupied in the organization of the House. But, sir, I think the Democracy of this House have but little to fear from the people in this struggle. They have been maintaining the principles they were sent to maintain. I mean the free institutions of our country, and the purity of the elective franchise. The rights and dear bought suffrage of the freemen of a sovereign State have been violated and trampled upon by a corrupt party Governor and a corrupt party Council, and the sovereign will of the the people sacrificed at the shrine of party ambition and love of power. It is their wrongs we are endeavoring to redress. We have nothing to fear from the people, though we remain in this struggle till doomsday. No frowns or popular indignation await us. We expect to and will receive their smiles and approbation for our efforts on this occasion. Let those who attach more weight and character to the certificate and broad seal of a Governor, and the dictation of a Privy Council, than to the voice of the freemen of a sovereign State, meet the consequences and responsibility of this shameful and disgraceful waste of "public time and public money."

But, sir, how have the "public money and the public time" been wasted by speeches; and who is it that has thus wasted the "public money and the public time," by speaking? My diary will show, which I was induced to keep in consequence of the charge of the waste of the "public money and the public time," made upon the Democracy by the time and money saving modern Whigs!

On the first eleven days of the session there were:

	Whig speeches.	Dem. speeches.
First day,	21	5
Second day,	15	7
Third day,	13	6
Fourth day,	9	1
Fifth day,	15	12
Sixth day,	31	18
Seventh day,	10	1
Eighth day,	31	14
Ninth day,	19	12
Tenth day,	18	12
Eleventh day,	18	6
	200	94

The journals will show that nearly all the motions made and the questions of order raised to consume time, and stave off the organization of the House, were made and supported by the Whigs.

This carries us up to the close of the eleventh day of the session, and the result shows that the money and time saving Whigs! of this House have made two hundred speeches, and the Democrats who have been charged hourly with wasting the "public money and the public time," have made ninety-four speeches. I thought it my duty to make this expose to counteract the effects of a charge, as unfounded as the object for which these speeches have been made is corrupt, at least in their tendencies, if not in their intent. Why all this unexampled strife on the part of the Opposition; and why this wreckless sacrifice of time which should have been devoted to the country's business? The world will understand the answer. It is to smuggle in five Whigs to seats on this floor, who have about as much right here as the remains of the cabal who disordered the administration of Charles the Second. I mean John B. Aycrigg, John P. B. Maxwell, Wm. Halsted, Charles C. Stratton, and Thomas Jones Yorke men whom the sovereign freemen of New Jersey have pronounced through the ballot box, in the proper legal and constitutional manner, politically unworthy, and unqualified longer to hold seats on this floor. Sir, those who are supporting the usurpers, or the certificated members, had no expectation that they could hold their seats longer than the time when a committee could report upon their pretensions. The object was to smuggle them in, that they might have an opportunity to vote in the organization of the House, or, in the language of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. CHINN,] that they might cast their votes for JOHN BELL. Yes, sir, this was the object. The right of suffrage is to be trampled upon, the purity of the elective franchise must be violated, and the voice of a sovereign State treated with contempt, to the end that JOHN BELL might be Speaker of this House. Sir, such an attempt is not more idle than it is vain. JOHN BELL will never be Speaker of this House while his name is JOHN BELL, nor will these usurpers get seats in this hall again, until the voice of New Jersey shall pronounce them entitled to them. But more of this hereafter.

Mr. Chairman, I think I have seen a disposition manifested here to carry, by violence, the unjust and assumed claims of the Whig New Jersey pretenders. When all other means should fail, violence seemed to be the intended resort. Questions of order have been raised, involving nothing but quibbles, the most contemptible to the most ordinary understanding. When I was addressing the House the other day, I was arrested (or the Clerk, while reading the evidence upon which I was predicating my remarks, was) by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH] The evidence which I was causing the Clerk to read, was the certificate of the Secretary of State of New Jersey, certifying that Messrs. DICKERSON, VROOM, KILLE, RYALL, and COOPER, have a majority of all the votes polled, and were duly elected members of the Twenty-sixth Congress; also certificates of the election officers, and affidavits of others having a knowledge of the case. While the reading was going on, Mr. RANDOLPH objected to the reading of the papers, for the reason that these papers were never before the Governor and Privy Council. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL,] said that he was authorized by Messrs. DICKERSON and VROOM to say that they were before the Governor and Council. The gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH,] said they were not. The gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] rejoined that these papers were copies. Does the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. RANDOLPH] mean to deny that the original papers, of which these are copies, were never before the Governor and Privy Council of New Jersey? The gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH] dropped his head and said, "No, sir." Sir, such a quibble is too contemptible for this place. It is unworthy of the gentleman himself; it is unworthy of this House and this body; it is alone worthy of the most pitiful seventh-rate pettifogger. Sir, I trust I shall not again be interrupted by a question of order involving such a quibble.

It is the strongest evidence of a bad cause, when it must be maintained by low quibbling.

But, sir, gentlemen will find blustering threats and boisterous denunciations as ineffectual as quibbling. They will find, when such means are resorted to to carry measures over the Democracy here, that they are barking up the wrong tree, or, what may be worse, that they have not treed their game at all. There is too much of the Revolutionary blood flowing in the veins of the Democracy here to quail or wince for a moment at all the blast and bluster that can be paraded in this dying struggle of Federalism. It will all be regarded as "sounding brass and tinkling cymbals"

As the floods rush from the mountains of Ethiopia, to the overflowing of the Nile, and to the enriching of the valleys and plains of Egypt, so has been the torrent of public sentiment and approbation through the medium of the ballot box, in favor of the leading measures of this Administration, and the glorious and hallowed cause of Democracy and the people. Sir, with the Revolutionary blood and patriotism of our ancestors, backed by the thundering voice of approbation by millions of freemen, are the Democracy to be awed or intimidated by the threats or frowns of a conquered and dying party in their last spasmodic agonies? No, sir; its effect is but to produce the sneer of contempt and derision. As it is common here for gentlemen Whigs to give their young friends (new Whig members) advice, so I will volunteer some advice to my young friends; and that is, to treat with contempt and scorn, all the blasting, blowing, blustering, and bullying displays they may see here or elsewhere, though the fiercest Federal lions be turned into this hall, and though their "shaggy tails be erect, and their jaws bedaubed with human blood," they really have no terrors; the people have extracted their teeth; they can do nothing but shake their manes and growl; approach them, lay your hand upon them, they are tame; they are like Daniel's lions; the hand of God rested on them; the hand of the freemen of this country rest upon the Federal lions and bullies of this day. When I first entered this hall, I entered with some trepidation—such is the Whig system of puffing by the lean, lank dogs, in the character of penniless letter writers, who beset this Capitol by throngs, and whose hungry yelp is never out of your hearing. I expected to see men gigantic in body and intellect; such is the effect puffing has upon the mind of objects at a distance; but when I came to mingle with them, I found few of them whose bodily altitude exceeded that of my own and; when I surveyed them, I saw nothing in them, mentally or physically, to be feared; I found them just such creatures as surrounded me at home every day; I saw nothing here at which a well corn and pork fed Western Buckeye would not douce his woolhat, throw of his linsey hunting shirt, roll up his sleeves, and "walk right into."

We have heard the tempest of party howl; we have felt the rain fall in torrents from the party elements; we have been pelted by the hail; we have seen the lightning flash; and we have heard the thunder peal and roll over our heads; but we have not been stricken down or riven by its bolts; and all this, too, when foul Federalism had reared its crest to its greatest altitude—to the threatening of the overthrow of our simple Republican institutions. What now have we to fear, when it sneaks to hide its guilty face, and is ashamed of its very name. It writhes under the feet of our free institutions as the reptile squirms under the heel of man.

Sir, as if to prepare the Opposition for a contest of violence, the New Jersey usurpers have been advised not to jump out of the windows, as was the case at Harrisburg. The Democracy of this House have manifested no disposition to maintain their principles by bowie knives, or carry out their measures with brickbats. The admonition was gratuitous and uncalled for. Nor was it the Democratic members of the Legislature of Pennsylvania who threatened violence to the corrupt usurpers who claimed seats in that hall. It was the honest, hard-handed Democracy, who rallied to the standard of their country when their legislative halls were to be corrupted by usurpation and fraud. It was the kind of men who maintain and support your country in peace, and defend it in war. They were the kind of men, and governed by the same political principles, who were called plebeians in the republican days of Rome, who, when Anthony offered Cæsar the crown, threw up their sweaty caps and clapped their hard and chapped hands, at his refusal to accept it. Anthony persisted, and offered it again. Cæsar refused it; they threw up their caps, shouted in token of approbation, and clapped their chapped and hard hands; but the patricians groaned and hissed. Again Anthony offered him the crown; but again Cæsar passed it with his hand from his head. The patricians groaned and hissed; but the plebeians continued to throw up their sweaty caps and clap their hard and chapped hands. These were the kind of men who filled the streets and crowded the legislative halls of Harrisburgh. They saw that their liberties were in danger, and they rallied to the defence of their institutions and the purity of the elective franchise. Such men do not crowd the streets and avenues of Washington city and overflow the legislative halls of this Capitol. No, sir; the usurpers in this case have nothing to fear from the populace here. Sir, with many honorable exceptions, our streets and avenues are crowded with blacklegs, political jugglers, hungry expectants, lounging, lean lazaroni loafers, bank vassals, and Federal minions, congregated from all parts of the Union. Dandies, coxcombs, and liveried drones, whose subsistence depends upon theft, begging or fraud, or upon the "glories of the credit and banking system." Hence it is that you hear from your galleries shouts of approbation and joyous applause, when you gain any thing like a temporary Whig victory over the cause and principles of Democracy, however contemptible and pitiful that victory may be. Sir, I think I can give the userpers assurance that they are on the right side for safety here; but I could not insure them from decapitation if they were to present such claims in the Capitol of Harrisburg. Sir, as usual, we have heard the success of the cause of Democracy attributed to corruption, Executive influence, usurpation, base vassalage, party slander, and servile submission. Yes, sir, the Administration and all its measures; the Harrisburg Convention; the election of General Harrison, and the success of the Federal party; and the contest for party ascendency in the next Presidential election, have all been drawn into the vortex of discussion, on the simple proposition of the New Jersey election returns; and free drafts in that discussion made from the columns of the most slanderous and degraded Federal sheets of this day of political strife and reckless turmoil, to abuse the Administration and its measures, and the Democratic party. I meet and face the whole in my weak way.

Such charges are in bad time, and from a quarter which should blush to name them. This Administration is emphatically an Administration of the people—its leading measures float upon an overflowing tide of public approbation—its enemies are the enemies to free institutions, equal rights, and human liberty. To denounce it in such terms, is but a reiteration of the high toned Federal and aristocratic doctrine, which constitutes one of the fundamental principles of that party who deny an intelligence and virtue to the people, sufficient for the purposes of self-govenment. What Executive influence, usurpation, or control, I ask, was made to bear upon the great body of the American people, even if they were subjects of corruption, so as to secure the support which the Administration and its measures have received other than the correctness of the Administration, and the purity of the measures themselves? Has it been done through the influence of Federal officers? No, sir; they may have done their part in the support of the Administration and its leading measures, as they were and are bound to do; those, I mean, who are from principle attached to it; but there is an antagonist principle sufficient to counteract all their influence. More than one half of all the Federal officers of this Government, from the heads of bureaus in the Department of State here, down to the most petty postmaster in the country, are hostile to this Administration, its measures, and the Democratic party and its principles, who exert themselves, to the extent of their personal and official influence, to prostrate the Administration and subvert the Democratic institutions. Is it the newspaper presses through the country favorable to the Administration and its measures, to the Democratic party and its principles, that have produced it? No, sir. They may have done their part as they were and are bound to do; and they, no doubt, have exerted themselves to the extent of their means. It is due to them to say, that they have done much. But there is an antagonist principle, which, to a great extent, neutralizes their efforts and their influence. There are more than three newspaper presses in this Government opposed to this Administration and its measures, and to the Democratic party and their principles, to one that is favorable; and I might ask the man who charges slander and detraction to the Democratic newspapers, O! shame, where is thy blush! Look at your Federal sheets, sir, from your base, bought up, corrupt vassal sheet, the Courier and Enquirer, down to the most contemptible rag that bears the cognomen of a Whig newspaper sheet. What are they, sir, but a tissue of foul channels and corrupt and filthy sewers, through which the vilest slanders and basest falsehoods are communicated to the public mind, not even the misnamed National Intelligencer!!! excepted. No, sir: the great principles of reform, which are on their march to the prostration of Federalism and the downfall of bank dominion and bank dictation, are the result of the examination, intelligence, and patriotism of the freemen of this country; they are the result of the "sober second thought of the people," which is never wrong. Yes, sir; the cry of Executive corruption is yelped by a party, with many honorable exceptions, I am proud for my country to say, who are sustained as a party by, and feed upon, the putrid carcass of corruption itself. I wish to be understood as speaking politically. The cry of Executive influence is yelped by a party, whose prospects, pecuniary and political, are lighted up and cheered by the smiles of the banks and the credit system, and cast down and overshadowed by thick dark clouds of dismay at the frowns or disappointments of either or both. The blush of shame, and the sacred cause of truth, should save the Democracy from such charges from such a party! Against whom, or what, is this interminable war directed? Who is it intended shall drink this inexhaustible cup of slander and detraction, even to the dregs of bitterness, and bonds of iniquity? The men of the Administration, think you? No, no! It is not against men that all this unceasing and unmeasured torrent of calumny, detraction, and falsehood, is directed. No, sir: it is not intended for the men who administer this Government, and those who support them. It is against the cause of Democracy, and the free institutions of our country. Men are used merely as instruments of illustration; men are the mere mediums through which the great principles of equal rights and civil liberty are to be overthrown. No, sir: when the party tempest howls the loudest, and when the storm of faction rages highest, and beats the hardest upon our plain, simple, Republican institutions, the men who support them and their bitterest assailants, are on terms of intimacy and friendship. Yes, sir; and even those who are the most unmeasured in their abuse of the President and all his leading measures, are the men who are to be found most frequently at the table of his bounty, and who drink deepest from his wine goblet. And all this is right: these men have no personal hostility to Mr. Van Buren. It would be worse than folly to tax the purse, the head, the heart, and pollute the tongue with a warfare fraught with such cost, such iniquity, and such foul slander, merely to prostrate the earthly tabernacle of frail men, who, by the immutable laws of nature, must in a few short years, perhaps months, perhaps days, return to their great mother earth; become the food of worms, and mingle with the dust. No, sir; it is not against men this warfare is waged: I repeat, that the object is to overthrow the Republican institutions of our country. When will this warfare cease? When the men who administer this Government, and those who act with, and support them, pay the debt of nature, think you? No, no. The termination of their existence will be no signal to cease hostilities. They never will cease until the Federal aristocratic prediction is fulfilled, "that man is incapable of self-government. That the people have not the intelligence and stability to govern themselves" This war will cease when the reins of Government shall be surrendered by the many to the hands of the wise, the wealthy, and the great few—when "the common herd" shall become the vassals of a few "exclusives"—when the many shall become "hewers of wood and drawers of water" to the few—then, sir, will this war upon human liberty cease, and not before.

But, sir, have the Opposition no other object in pushing the fraudulent claims of the Whig pretenders, than the maintenance of the abstract rights of New Jersey? Yes, sir, I have named one, (the election of a Whig Speaker.) But that, in itself, is but a collateral object.

The great object is to prop and support a rotten, tottering, sinking cause. One last dying, desperate effort is to be made to prevent the overthrow, downfall, and final ruin of the once great and powerful Federal faction. This desperate effort to trample in the dust the voice of New Jersey, is a practical demonstration of what we may expect as to the mode and manner by which the political warfare is to be conducted in the approaching contest for polical ascendency. It is a concert of action with the proceedings and result of the Federal National Convention which has just closed its operations at Harrisburg. Can any man doubt, for a moment, that the choice of a candidate for the Presidency, made by that convention, is but the tocsin of war to rally the contending factions, of all denominations, from the remotest parts of the Union, to the conflict against the common cause of Democracy and human liberty. Virtue, patriotism, and good order, are all to be sacrificed at the shrine of Federal ambition in this great contest. The man has been selected around whose standard Antimasonry, Abolitionism, National Republicanism, Federalism, and every other ism under the sun except Democraticism, may rally. Open fight, secret ambuscade, fair play and foul play, and every other mode of warfare known to the nations of the earth, civilized and savage, is to be adopted and used in this war. All missiles and weapons, common and uncommon, broadswords narrow swords, long swords, short swords, straight swords, and crooked swords, are to be used in fighting under this ring-streaked and speckled banner. Falsehood, fraud, and corruption, will be in market for the highest bidder. Every venal Federal sheet will teem with foul slander, base detraction, and unblushing falsehood, and the tool of faction who can lie most, will receive the highest price for his occupation. Yes, sir, the zeal and Christian patriotism which were exhibited on the plains of Palestine, in defence of the Holy Land, were nothing to compare to the zeal which will be displayed in the conduct of this war upon the simple institutions of freedom. The untiring efforts of the monk Peter to rally the Christian nations in defence of the holy cause, will sink into insignificance, when compared with the efforts wich will be used by the Federal demagogues to rally the mercenary factions to this war against the common cause of Democracy. But to use a common Dutch maxim, it will be all nix cume rous," or it will be applicable to a more classic maxim, "montes parturiunt, et ridiculus nascitur mus."

Yes, sir, a convention of the contending factions of this Union, opposed to the cause and principles of Democracy and equal rights, has been held at Harrisburg; and the farmer of Tippecanoe has been nominated for the Presidency! And the result of that convention will be about as it was in 1836, when, for the purposes of sectional division, General Harrison, Judge White, and Daniel Webster, were put upon the track. But they were all distanced: so it will be in 1840. Old Tecumseh and Kinderhook will distance Tippecanoe and the man of the Old Dominion, the first heat. If I were capable of giving General Harrison and his friends advice, it would be to just put their entrance money in their pockets, and leave the field; and if they have forfeitures up, let them go: that will be the saving game.

But, sir, perhaps these predictions may be considered impious, for I see in the reported proceeding, that the Rev. Mr. Sprecker pronounced a benediction upon the convention. Now I am going to animadvert a little upon that benediction, and let no man impugn my motives, or attach irreverence to me; for if I have one feeling of grateful recollection for a Reverend father and a pious mother, both of whom now inhabit the narrow house, it is the recollection of the religious and pious precepts and principles which they taught me in sincere piety from my youth to manhood; and although shamefully loose in their practice, yet when I forget them, or fail in filial gratitude to those who taught them, may God forget me. If there is one book on earth that I reverence, it is the sacred word from which I am about to recite a few passages from recollection. If there is any one of the great causes which operate more than another to the perpetuity of our Government, the stability of our religious and civil institutions, the peace of man here and a happy and glorious immortality hereafter, I believe it to be the glorious cause of Christianity. The Rev. Mr. Sprecker may be a righteous man—I hope he is; and according to the weight and authority here given to "prima facie evidence," I am bound to believe so, for he presents that evidence in his title; and we are told in holy writ that "the prayers of the righteous avail much." But if I do not much mistake the import or meaning of that biblical maxim, it is of importance to the success of even the prayers of the righteous man, that the object of his prayer should be worthy of Divine approbation. Holy writ furnishes us with many consoling evidences of the powerful and miraculous effects of prayer, when made at the throne of Divine mercy; evidences which show not only the duty and importance of prayer, but also the power, mercy, and goodness of Him at whose throne every knee is bound to bend.

The Almighty heard the prayer of Abraham, and healed Abimelech, his wife, and his maid servants, of the barrenness with which he himself had cursed them, in consequence of Sarah, Abraham's wife. The Jews under Moses complained. The anger of the Almighty was kindled, and he sent consuming fire into every part of their camp. Moses prayed for them, he was heard, and the hand of Divine vengeance was stopped, and the fire quenched. The Jews were visited with fiery serpents, on account of their sins. The serpents bit many of them, and they died. The people came to Moses and confessed their sins, and asked him to pray for them that the Almighy would take away the serpents. Moses prayed for them; his prayer was heard—and the Almighty directed him to prepare a serpent of brass, resembling in appearance the fiery serpents, and to lift it upon a pole. He did so; and if any man thereafter was bitten by a serpent, he looked upon the provided remedy and lived.

While Moses was in the mount receiving the tables of the law, the people, with the assistance of Aaron, prepared a golden calf. When Moses returned, he found them engaged in idolatry; he threw down the tables. The anger of the Almighty was kindled and burnt against Aaron and the people; Moses fell down and prayed for Aaron and the people for forty days and forty nights; and such was the effect of his prayers, that, instead of the Almighty blotting out their names from under heaven as he threatened, he hearkened unto Moses and spared them.

Again: the Shunamite's son fell sick and died. The afflicted and pious mother laid him in the prophet Elisha's bed, in a little room which she had prepared for him; she went for the prophet. He sent his servant, who laid Elisha's rod upon the face of the child, and he awoke not. But when the prophet shut the door, and prayed, and laid upon the child, he sneezed seven times, opened his eyes, and he delivered the child alive to his mother.

In the days of the prophet Baal, there was a drought for three years and six months. The fountains were dried, and the rivers were drank up, and famine and desolation dwelt upon the land. Elijah went up to the top of Carmel, and prayed for rain. A little cloud instantly arose out of the sea, like a man's hand, and soon the heaven was black with clouds, and there was a great rain.

Job prayed for his friends, and such was the effect, that the Almighty turned his captivity, and blessed his latter end more than his beginning.

When Hezekiah prayed in his sickness, and turned his face to the wall and wept, the Almighty heard his prayer, and added fifteen years to his life.

Here, sir, we have evidence of the highest character of the omnipotent effects of prayer. But it must be remembered that the prayers here presented were not only the prayers of righteous persons, but the objects prayed for were worthy of and met Divine approbation. It is not only necessary that those who would be heard in prayer and answered, should not regard iniquity in their hearts, but the subjects of their benediction should be in favor with the Almighty, and their objects and pursuits in conformity with the cause of justice, right, and his Divine will. Was such the case with the Harrisburg convention? Sir, the men that they are endeavoring to place in office, and the principles they are endeavoring to establish, are at war with the spirit of our Constitution, human liberty, the duration of our free institutions, and the principles which we have undoubted reason to believe are in favor with Him who sways and controls the destinies of nations, from the fact that he led the patriots of the Revolution to battle and to victory. He "withheld the battle from the strong and the race from the swift." The light of his wisdom and the strength of his power have since defended our institutions from the hand of violence from abroad and the corruption of factionists at home. Then, sir, I undertake to predict that the prayer of the Rev. Mr. Sprecker, however righteous he may be, will fall to the ground unanswered—the objects of the convention being unfavorable to the Divine will and His favored people.

But, sir, there are some other difficulties that present themselves to the success of the assembled factions and the election of the nominee of the Harrisburg Convention. Is it supposed that Mr. Clay will quietly submit to the indignity offered him and the neglect with which he has been treated? No, sir: disappointed ambition is not so easily calmed. He has been a distinguished leader of a great party for many years. He has worn a life nearly out in its cause; and although I think he knew too much of the character of the American Democracy to believe, for a moment, that he ever could be President of these United States, still it was his pride to live at the head of his party, and it was his hope, it would be his glory, to die at the head of his party. Of this hope, the only reward for his long and toilsome services, his party have deprived him. Now that he is worn down, he is turned upon the commons to shift for himself, as the Romans used to turn their worn out slaves upon an island in the Tiber. Think you, sir, he will bear this treatment with impunity? No, sir: prudence may at first induce him to bear the neglect and ingratitude with apparent forbearance. He may smother his wrath for a time, but, sir, he will rave like the disappointed political lunatic; he will growl like the hungry hyena; he will bellow like the hunted buffalo; he will roar like the lanced lion; he will do more; he will disband his troops; his sentinels scattered over the Union, who have watched with fidelity on the towers, ready to do any thing at his bidding, will throw down their arms, and take their banners from the "outer wall," and will deny obedience to their new commander. Murmurs, seditions and tumults will be heard throughout the camp among his troops. We have already heard some whimpering, and seen some evidence of disaffection here. I hold in my hand a paper which contains a Whig dialogue, that speaks the voice of thousands. It is short, and I will read it:

"Good morning sir."
"Good morning to you, sir."
"Have you heard from the Harrisburg Convention?"
"No."
"General Harrison is nominated."
"You don't say so!"
"Yes I do!"
"Oh!!"

Another:

"Good morning, sir."
"Good morning, sir."
"Well, the Harrisburg Convention have shot their granny."
"No, they hav'nt—I wish they had."

Yes, sir, disappointment, confusion, and dismay, brood in the hearts, dwell upon the tongues, and perch upon the countenances of the Clay ranks, attempt to conceal it as they may.

But to the New Jersey election. But before I go into that investigation, permit me to say a word in relation to party and party feelings, and their effects. No Government, since the civil organization of society, or the establishment of political institutions, has ever been without parties. There never has been a Government without parties; and the great principles constituting the basis of party, are the free exercise of all natural privileges and powers, on the part of the individual community, not incompatible with the general good, and a general participation in making, adjudicating, and executing the laws, either personally or representatively, on the one hand, and a usurpation of power, in the hands of the few to the exclusion of the many, on the other hand. There may be factions or subdivision of parties; but when the great principles come to be acted upon, the rank and file of every faction and subdivision, with their leaders at their head, banner in hand, will be seen to rush to the standard of their first principles, regardless of their peculiar notions about minor matters, as you will see the factions of all names and hues rally to the standard of Federalism in the coming contest; and although each faction may pretend to march after its own banner and wear its own uniform, yet each individual of each faction will be known by one badge, which he will wear in his heart, if not on his hat—I mean the black cockade.

Sir, I say every Government has two parties, and every honest man in the community belongs to one or the other. Show me a man that belongs to no party, and I will show you a man without principle. Show me a man who has no party feelings and predilections, and I will show you a fool or a knave—a man who needs a keeper, or one who will steal your horse. The proper place for such a man is the poor-house or the penitentiary. Avoid such a man; if you meet him, he will either beg your purse, or rob you of it. Party is the salt of the nation. It establishes a watchfulness and wholesome guardianship over the institutions of our country; it checks and restrains the reckless ambition of those in office, and never fails to expose the nonfeasance, misfeasance, or malfeasance of those in power. But it is possible for party feelings and party practices to run too high, and thereby produce the very evils which they are so well calculated to suppress. When party feelings run so high as to submerge political morality, the worst of evils are to be apprehended. Party feelings and party ambition may become so reckless, as to overflow the best prospects of our country, prostrate the free institutions which constitute the basis of civil and religious liberty, and subvert the Government itself in their desolating sweep; and, I must confess, that I have some fearful apprehensions that we now border on such a state of things. Let us examine the New Jersey elections which involve the present contest. The examination of the question will show whether my fears are well founded, or whether they spring from a timid heart or a distempered head.

On the first Monday of last month, which was its second day, we, the supposed members of the Twenty-Sixth Congress, assembled in this hall, and at the usual hour (12 o'clock) the Clerk of the House of Representatives for the previous Congress, in conformity with his official duty as established by custom existing from the foundation of our Government, and under the solemnity of the oath he had taken at the threshold of his duties, commenced making out and calling the roll of members who, he had been informed and believed, were elected to the Twenty-Sixth Congress. As has been the custom, he commenced, geographically, the call of members from the State of Maine, and proceeded through New Hampshire, Connecticut, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New York, and to the name of JOSEPH F. RANDOLPH, a Representative from the State of New Jersey. Here the Clerk was arrested with the cry of "Pass over New Jersey!" He stated that the election of five of the New Jersey members having certificates of election, and claiming seats thereby, were contested, and there were conflicting evidences in his possession, and submitted to the House whether he should pass the State of New Jersey until the members from the other States should be called. Here the game was blocked. Here the proceedings to organization were arrested; here the controversy commenced, all on that simple and respectful statement and submission of the Clerk. Those opposed to the Democratic party and the Administration insisted that the names of the certificate members from New Jersey should now be called. The friends of the Administration were in favor of the Clerk's suggestion, to the end that the conflicting claims might be examined, and justice be done. The result has been many days of moderate, warm, angry, violent, and tempestuous debate, at an immense expense to the American people, when there was really no question involved except as to the propriety of postponing the call of New Jersey until the other States should be called, to the end that justice might be done. I might here ask what can be the motive which has superinduced this unexampled array of hostility to so respectful and rational a proposition made by the Clerk. I have before hinted at a reason; others will be developed as the history of this contest is unfolded. But a word in defence of the course of the Clerk in this controversy, and the reasons which governed him. I have said that it was a part of the official duty of the Clerk to make out a roll, and call the names of the members of the Twenty-sixth Congress. This he was to perform under the solemnity of an oath, for the faithful performance of which he is answerable at the bar or his country, and at the throne of eternal justice and Divine accountability. What was his duty under this solemn responsibility? Was it any part of his duty to enrol and call the names of men who were not members of the Twenty-sixth Congress! He stated at the outset, and he continues to state, that there are conflicting evidences in his possession as to the members from New Jersey, and that he does not feel warranted in taking the responsibility on himself of calling and enrolling the names of men—which call may entitle them to seats in this hall—whom he has good reason to believe have not been returned by the people. Sir, his course has been in conformity with the duties of his station, his obligation to his conscience, his God, and his country; and any other course would have been a violation of his oath, and his religious, moral and political duty. His course has been just, manly and dignified, and will meet the approbation and support of every man in the community untainted and uncorrupted by party poison. But what has been his reward here? Day after day contumely, abuse and derision have been poured upon him in an unceasing torrent. No names have been too degrading to use upon him; no motives too corrupt to attribute to him. He has been charged with being the catspaw of a party, and driven to the stand he has taken as the reward he is to receive in the renewal of his station. Sir, I have never conversed with the Clerk upon the subject, but I take the responsibility upon myself to deny, in unqualified terms, that he has ever been flattered, driven, bribed, or hired to the course he has taken. I throw back the charge upon those who make it. I can maintain what I say. Now, sir, I present the copy of the certificate of the Secretary of State for the State of New Jersey. Here it is. I ask that it may be read from the Clerk's table, together with all documents on his table going to show that Messrs. DICKERSON, VROOM, KILLE, RYALL, COOPER, and RANDOLPH, were the six candidates who received the greatest number of votes for the Twenty-sixth Congress of the United States in the State of New Jersey, and are, and of right ought to be, the members returned—all of which I intend to incorporate with, and make a part of, my speech.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF NEW JERSEY, ss.

I, James D. Westcott, Secretary of State of the State of New Jersey, do hereby certify, that upon a careful examination of all the returns made by the several clerks of the respecti counties in said State, and filed in my office, and also of returns of votes given in the townships of South Amboy, in the county of Middlesex, and of Millville, in the county of Cumberland, verified by the affidavits of the several township officers of election in said townships respectively, which township returns were not included in the returns of the clerks of said counties of Middlesex and Cumberland, and which were directed to be filed by the Governor, and now remain on file in my office, of the election for members to represent this State in the House of Representatives of the Twenty-sixth Congress of the United States, held on the ninth and tenth days of October, anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight, it appears that Philemon Dickerson received 28,453 votes, Manning Force 28,314 votes, Peter D. Vroom 28,492 votes, Daniel B. Ryall 28,441 votes, William R. Cooper 28,455 votes, Joseph Kille 28,426 votes, John B. Aycrigg 28,294 votes, John P. B. Maxwell 28,383 votes, William Halsted 28,337 votes, Joseph F. Randolph 28,427 votes, Charles C. Stratton 28,396 votes, and Thomas Jones Yorke 28,321 votes, and by which it appears that, at said election, Philemon Dickerson, Peter D. Vroom, Daniel B. Ryall, William R. Cooper, Joseph Kille, and Joseph F. Randolph received a majority of the whole number of the votes given in the State of New Jersey for Representatives of said State in the House of Representatives of the Twenty-sixth Congress of the United States.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my seal of office at the city of Trenton, in said State, [L. S.] this twenty-fifth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine, (1839,) and of the Independence of the United States the sixty-fourth.

JAMES D. WESTCOTT.

This, sir, (said Mr. D.) is the certificate of the Secretary of State, an office as old as the State itself. Created by its Constitution, its responsibility is of the highest character; its duties of the most sacred nature, and its importance not inferior to that of the Governor. This officer is elected by the Legislature, as the Governor is, and responsible both to the Legislature and to the people. His duty involves the care of the archives of the State—the care of the files and the records. Here is an official document given from under his hand, with his seal of office affixed, and under the resonsibility and solemnity of an oath which he took at the entrance upon his official duties. Here, sir, you have prima facie evidence of the fact that the certificate members are not entitled to seats in this hall.

Before I proceed, give me your attention for a few moments while I give a short history of the manner in which Congressional elections (for I have nothing to do with any other in this case) are conducted in New Jersey, for the benefit of those who may read me. By the laws of New Jersey, the election for members of Congress and the State Legislature is held at the same time, except when electors of President and Vice President are chosen. The time is the second Tuesday of October, and the day following. One poll is held in each township. The election is by ballot; and the votes for all the candidates are put in the ballot box in the several townships. The assessor and the collector of the township, with a judge of election chosen for the purpose at the annual township meeting, preside over and act as judges and inspectors of the election, and the township clerk officiates as the clerk of the election. The time of opening and closing the poles is the same in all the townships, and is established by law. The candidates for Congress are nominated in the several counties on the first Monday of September. The county clerks transmit the names of the persons nominated to the Governor of the State. The Governor prepares and transmits a true list of all the persons nominated, to the clerk of each county in the State. It is the duty of the county clerk of each county to transmit a copy to each township clerk in each county. It is the duty of each township clerk to put up copies for the information of all, and the election is made from the persons thus nominated.

This is the history, now for the law. The law provides that after the polls are closed it shall be the duty of the judge and inspectors, and the clerk of the election, to proceed immediately

"To take an account of, and cast up, the votes given for each candidate, make a list of the same, which list they shall sign, certify, seal up, direct, and transmit to the clerk of the county, who shall attend at at the court house of the county on the Saturday next after the day of the election, for the purpose of receiving the same, which list shall be delivered to him before five o'clock in the afternoon of said day, which said clerk shall proceed in a public manner to make one general list of all the candidates voted for as aforesaid, together with the number of votes received for each of them, and shall transmit the same at the expense of the State, to the Governor, or person administering the Government, within seven days thereafter, having first caused a duplicate thereof to be filed in his office, together with the lists from the said township."

The law further provides and makes it the duty of the Governor, that,

"If the certified lists of votes given for Representatives in Congress shall not be received from the clerks of any of the counties of the State, by him, within seven days after the time prescribed by law for casting up the same, &c. by the clerks, as aforesaid, forthwith to send express to the clerk of the county or counties, from which such certified lists have not been received, and to procure the same at the expense of the State."

And it is further made the duty of the Governor,

"Within five days after receiving the said lists, to lay the same before a Privy Council, to be by him summoned for that purpose; and after casting up the whole number of votes from the several counties for each candidate, the said Governor and Privy Council shall determine the six persons who have the greatest number of votes from the whole State, for Representatives in Congress of the United States from this State, and forthwith commission them," &c.

This, sir, is "the law and the prophets," and substantially all the law that bears on the case. And now for the facts: By the laws of New Jersey, her members of Congress are elected the year preceding the Congress in which they take their seats. The second Tuesday, and the day following, of October, 1838, were the days on which the election was held for the members of this Congress. Two sets of candidates were nominated, as provided by law. Messrs. DICKERSON, VROOM, RYALL, COOPER, KILLE, and FORCE, were the Democratic candidates; Messrs. AYCRIGG, MAXWELL, HALSTED, YORKE, STRATTON, and RANDOLPH, were the Federal candidates, six Representatives being the number to which New Jersey is entitled. The polls were open at the legal hour in the different townships. The elections were conducted in a fair and proper manner; legal votes were received, and spurious ones were rejected. The polls were closed at the proper hour. The voice of the sovereign freemen of New Jersey was expressed, and that expression deposited in the ballot boxes. All that remained to be done was the public promulgation of that voice through the mediums provided by law. Those provisions were carried into practice, in conformity with the spirit and meaning of the law, and according to its letter, except in the cases which I shall name hereafter. The township election officers made their returns to their respective county clerks. The several county clerks made their returns to the Governor; and the returns made and now on file of office, in the office of the Secretary of State, and in his possession, show that the Democratic candidates had as follows:

Philemon Dickerson has	-	28,453 votes.
Peter D. Vroom	-	28,492 "
Daniel B. Ryall	-	28,441 "
William R. Cooper	-	28,456 "
Joseph Kille	-	28,427 "
Manning Force	-	28,314 "

The Federal candidates had as follows:

John B. Aycrigg	-	28,294 votes.
Jno. P. B. Maxwell	-	28,383 "
Wm. Halsted	-	28,366 "
Charles C. Stratton	-	28,396 "
Thomas Jones Yorke	-	28,321 "
Joseph F. Randolph	-	28,427 "

Consequently, by the practical operation of the simple rule of subtraction, it is reduced to a mathematical certainty that

Mr. Dickerson's majority over Mr. Aycrigg is 159 votes.

Mr. Vroom's majority over Mr. Maxwell is 109 votes.

Mr. Ryall's majority over Mr. Halsted is 105 votes.

Mr. Cooper's majority over Mr. Stratton is 60 votes.

Mr. Ryall's majority over Mr. Yorke is 106 votes.

Mr. Randolph's majority over Mr. Force is 113 votes.

Mr. Randolph, one of the Federal candidates, ran over his party strength, and Mr. Force ran behind his party strength. Consequently, the tables which I exhibit show Mr. Randolph to have a small majority over Mr. Force. The statement which I have now exhibited, is true as holy writ; and I will prove it as clear as the unclouded sun at noonday, to every man in this Union, who is not as blind with party poison as a copper-head in dog-days. As a part of that proof, I have exhibited the certificate of the Secretary of State, with his official signature, and his seal of office annexed; and I have shown the importance of that office, and the responsibility of that officer. I now proceed to exhibit further evidence, to show the correctness of the conclusions to which I have arrived, and to establish the truth of the assertions I have made; evidence which is indisputable, and that which no man will deny, who regards his reputation for consistency, truth, and sincerity. I proceed to show, as well the fact that Messrs. Aycrigg, Maxwell, Halsted, Yorke, and Stratton, are not elected to this Congress, or that Messrs. Dickerson, Vroom, Ryall, Cooper, and Kille, are, and the evidence which shows the latter to be elected, shows the former not to be. I now exhibit the return of the clerk of the county of Middlesex, as made at first, in which the township of South Amboy is omitted:

The following is an accurate copy procured from the proper authority:

"A List of Votes taken in the County of Middlesex on the ninth and tenth of October, A. D. 1838, for Members of the Twenty-sixth Congress of the United States, as received at the Clerk's office from the Judges and Inspectors of the several Townships, pursuant to law.

| Townships. | | |

The matter stands thus: By the whole returns of the State, except the townships of South Amboy, in the county of Middlesex, and Millville, in the county of Cumberland, is, (average vote) for Messrs. Aycrigg, Maxwell, Halsted, York, and Stratton - - - - - 28,150
For Messrs. Dickerson, Vroom, Cooper, Kille, and Ryall - - - 27,951

Which gives Messrs. Aycrigg and Co. a majority of - - - - 199

But when we read the votes of the township of Millville and South Amboy, the tables are turned. There they are—look at them.

The following table exhibits the result of the election, had the votes of the townships of Millville and South Amboy been counted.

	Gen. list.	Millville votes.	S. Amboy, do.	Total.
Dickerson,	27951	206	296	28453
Force,	27813	205	296	28314
Vroom,	27990	206	296	28492
Ryall,	27939	206	296	28441
Cooper,	27954	206	296	28456
Kille,	27925	206	296	28427
Aycrigg,	28150	100	44	28294
Maxwell,	28239	100	44	28294
Halsted,	28192	100	44	28383
Randolph,	28283	100	44	28427
Stratton,	28252	100	44	28396
Yorke,	28177	100	44	28321

By this table it is seen that Mr. Dickerson's whole vote is - - - 28,453
Mr. Aycrigg's - - - 28,294

Mr. Dickerson's majority 159

Mr. Vroom's whole vote - - 28,492
Mr. Maxwell's " " - - 28,383

Mr. Vroom's majority 109

Mr. Ryall's whole vote - - 28,441
Mr. Halsted's " " - - 28,336

Mr. Ryall's majority 105

Mr. Cooper's whole vote - 28,456
Mr. Stratton's " " - - 28,396

Mr. Cooper's majority 60

Mr. Kille's whole vote - - 28,427
Mr. Yorke's " " - 28 321

Mr. Kille's majority 106

This expose brings us to the indisputable and incontrovertible fact that I asserted when I commenced this investigation, as set forth in the table which I before exhibited, viz:

That Mr. Dickerson's majority over Mr. Aycrigg is 150 votes.

Mr. Vroom's majority over Mr. Maxwell is 109 votes.

Mr. Ryall's majority over Mr. Halsted is 105 votes.

Mr. Cooper's majority over Mr. Stratton is 60 votes.

Mr. Kille's majority over Mr. Yorke is 106 votes.*

I have shown that an election was held in the State of New Jersey for the election of Representatives to the Twenty-sixth Congress; that it was held at the proper time is not denied; that it was held in the proper manner, as prescribed by the Constitution and the laws of New Jersey, is not denied; that the officers of election for the several townships were legally and properly qualified to officiate as such is not denied; that the polls were opened and closed at the legal hour is not denied; that the election, so far as the reception and record of votes by the election officers of the several townships, was fairly conducted, is not denied; that voters who voted were qualified and entitled to the elective franchise is not denied, (except for the mere purposes of quibble,) and that the returns by the township clerks to the county clerks, and from the county clerks to the Governor, has been made in conformity with the meaning and spirit of the Constitution and laws of New Jersey. And by these returns I have shown that Messrs. Dickerson, Vroom, Cooper, Kille and Ryall have a majority of all the votes given at the election. And why are they not now occupying their seats, and taking a part in the discharge of their duty as Representatives from the State of New Jersey? Sir, I will go on to expose the reasons, and I undertake to say that the development will unfold more fraud, foul iniquity, and barefaced villany than has been practised, or attempted to be practised, in any place or at any time since the formation of this Government, to prostrate the right of suffrage, and violate the purity of the elective franchise; and this in open violation of law, which the actors had taken a solemn oath to sustain, and which it was their official, political, and patriotic duty to have sustained, without regard to that oath? I proceed to disclose: It is said that the returns from the townships of South Amboy and Millville, not having been made to the clerks of their respective counties in due form, within the proper time, ought not to have been counted by the Governor and Council; and upon this miserable, diminutive, and squeaking quibble, rest the claims of the usurpers. What are the facts, as disclosed by the evidence on your table, and which has been read to this body?

I read from the Democratic Review, a faithful work, which ought to be in the hands of every Democrat in this Union:

The South Amboy return was made up in due form, except that it was not signed by the clerk of the election, and that no certificate of the election of James M. Warne, as one of the inspectors, he having been duly elected to that office on the morning of the first day of election, was sent with the return. The return was delivered to the clerk of the county on the twelfth of October, by Mr. Wood, the clerk of election; he states, under oath, that he delivered it on that day to Mr. Booraem, and "asked the said Nicholas Booraem if it was correct, so that if it was not it might be made correct, to which the said Nicholas Booraem replied, as this deponent believes, that it was all right, and proceeded to take down the votes for members of Congress from off the said certificate along with the returns of other townships, before deponent left the office." And the fact is that he did, in the first official list prepared by him, include the South Amboy return, for Mr. Steele has deposed that Booraem showed him the official list, with all the townships in it, on the fifteenth, in the clerk's office.

The first return from Millville was informal in two or three particulars; but the only objection to the second was, that it was received six hours after the appointed time, though four days before the county clerk actually made up his return for the county. For the second return for Millville was delivered to the clerk at 11 p. m. on Saturday, the thirteenth of October, and his return to the Governor is dated the seventeenth.

The grounds, therefore, upon which these returns were rejected are:

1. For want of the signature of the clerk of election; and
2. For want of a certificate of the election of an inspector in South Amboy; and
3. Because received six hours after time in the Millville case.

The e are good grounds for refusing to count the votes of Millville and South Amboy! But you dive to the depths of research and you can find no other reason to justify the reason why they constitute good ground for refusing to count them than that they return a Democratic majority; and so say virtually the Governor and Council.

For upon examination of the official returns from all the counties on file in the Secretary of State's office in New Jersey, it appears that no certificate of the election of the person who acted as judge in Dover township, Monmouth county, was received in time, and that no lawful certificates of the election of either judges or inspectors in Shrewsbury or Dover townships, were ever received by the county clerk. In Burlington county the returns of the townships of Burlington, Washington, Chesterfield, New Hanover, and Little Egg Harbor, were neither of them signed by the clerks of election; the return from Mansfield township was without the signature of the clerk and one of the inspectors; and that from Chester township was received open and unsealed; and in Somerset county no certificate was ever filed with the clerk of the election of William Parker, who appears, by the returns, to have acted as one of the inspectors in Franklin township.

Yet the returns from all these townships, though accompanied with the evidence of these informalities, were received and counted.

Shrewsbury gave a Federal majority of				63
Dover	"	"	"	246
Burlington	"	"	"	17
Washington	"	"	"	138
Little Egg Harbor	"	"	"	65
Mansfield	"	"	"	9
Chesterfield	"	"	"	52
New Hanover	"	"	"	34
Chester	"	"	"	18
Franklin	"	"	"	207
Making a total of				849

Thus, while the township returns of South Amboy, giving a Democratic majority of two hundred and fifty-two, were rejected for want of the signature of the clerk, and the certificate of the election of an inspector, and the returns of ten Federal townships, giving a Federal majority of eight hundred and forty-nine votes, though all wanting one or both the requisites adjudged vital in the Amboy case, or some other equally important, were received and counted.

Here, sir, you have fraud in its naked deformity, unsophisticated and unburnished; political corruption and robbery perpetrated in open day, while the sun is at meridian, and in the wakeful face and staring countenance of all living. Yes, sir, open-handed, unblushing, and unconcealed treason, of the most alarming and dangerous character, and which would justly hang its perpetrators by the neck until they were dead, dead, dead, in any other time than when the political atmosphere is distempered and poisoned with party ambition, an indomitable love of power, and moral depravity. My language is strong, and, perhaps, offensive; but the crime I am exposing is stronger, and more offensive. It is no less than a bold, depraved, and open attempt to prostrate the elective franchise, and thereby subvert the Constitution and overthrow the Government. Can any language be too strong to denounce such a desperate, daring, damning attempt? "But the returns were not made in time." Why were they not made in time? The law which I have read specifies no time when the Governor and Council shall proceed to count up the votes, etc. other than that they shall proceed, etc. within five days after receiving the lists, etc. The Legislature of New Jersey, with reason, contemplated the possibility that the clerks might not send up the returns within the times specified by law. They therefore wisely defined no time when the Governor and Council should proceed to cast up the votes, etc. other than the time, viz: "within five days" after the time when all the lists should be returned. But the Legislature further contemplated the possibility that not only the lists might not be returned within the time defined by the law, but also that the clerks might fail to make the returns at all. The law, therefore, provides that if the clerks shall fail to make returns within the times specified, it shall be the duty of the Governor to send forthwith, at the expense of the State, for the returns so neglected to be made; and yet, it is urged as a reason that the votes of South Amboy and Millville should not have been counted, because the returns were not made in time, when the very reason that they were not made in time, has its foundation in the failure of the Governor to do what the law commanded him to do, and what his office and oath bound him to do, and in refusing to do which he violated both.

Sir, there is no means left for the Governor or his partisans to get him out of the difficulty and disgrace in which his conduct has involved him, except ignorance of his duty or the law, which he was bound to know. Ignorance or fraud is the horn of the dilemma on which he dangles, make the best you can of it: both inexcusable and unpardonable in a political, legal and civil sense. And this he virtually admits himself, in the following communication, which I now ask leave to read, and to which I shall have occasion to refer hereafter. In the Governor's opinion to his Privy Council, he says:

"What does the law direct the Governor to lay before the Privy Council? The said lists, referring manifestly to the lists transmitted by the county clerks, which has been mentioned immediately before. What are the Governor and Privy Council to do with the lists thus laid before them? They are to cast up the votes. When this is done, what are they to determine? Who are entitled, under all the circumstances, to the seats in Congress? No, but they are to determine 'the six persons who have the greatest number of votes.' No language can be plainer. Was it ever intended by our laws to make the Governor and his Privy Council the arbiters of an election? There is no power conferred on us to examine a single witness, to send for persons or papers, or to take one step towards a judicial investigation. If we may go behind the returns of the county clerks to those of the township officers, why should we stop there? We may, by the same authority, and with equal reason, undertake to examine the proceedings of those township officers at the polls. Who has ever dreamed of a Governor and Privy Council of New Jersey setting themselves up to decide on any of these matters? They always have been, and from the very words of the act must be, confined to the clerks' returns, and to the duty of casting up the votes.

"But it will be asked, with force and propriety, is a candidate to lose his seat in Congress because a county clerk does not make a return of the votes? Certainly not. If, through inadvertence or by design, any votes have not been returned by the clerks, it is in the power of the House of Representatives, in their discretion, to allow those votes and give the seat to the person who, with those votes, may be elected. All representative assemblies possess and continually exercise the right of deciding who is entitled to a seat in them. We give the certificates to the persons who may appear, by casting up the clerks' returns, to have the greatest number of votes; we are, by law, obliged so to do; but the House of Representatives may go further, and inquire whether any votes have not been returned and counted, and if such be the case, may allow them in their discretion. Our laws evidently contemplate such a state of things, for they require the township officers to make out a duplicate certificate of such election, and to file the same with the town clerk, 'to be used as occasion may require.' It would be to me a most painful reflection, were I to believe that the restraints under which we are placed by the law, of not going beyond the certificates of the county clerk, would deprive any candidate of his ultimate rights. I declare here my earnest wish, that before the proper and constitutional tribunal for deciding the matter, each candidate may have the full benefit of every legal vote he may have received at the election."

*No notice is taken in this estimate of the votes of Mr Force, the Democratic candidate, or Mr. Randolph, the Federal candidate. It is given up that Mr. R. was elected by a small majority over Force.

Let it be remembered when the above expose was made, and the admissions therein submitted, it was more to allay public indignation, which was howling round him like a tempest. In the first paragraph of this expose, which is devoted to defining the duties of the Governor and Privy Council, it will be perceived in relation to elections, that one of the most important duties that devolves on the Governor, viz. that of sending for the polls when the clerks fail to send them up within the time specified by law, is not hinted at, which he failed to discharge in this case, and which, if he had performed, would have saved all the trouble of this hypocritical and metaphysical definition of duty, and Messrs. Dickerson, Vroom, Cooper, Kille, and Ryall would now be in their seats, representing the "sovereign State of New Jersey," in conformity with the voice of her freemen, as expressed through her ballot boxes on the "second Tuesday and the day following of October, 1838." I say it is the withholding of this duty in the above definition; and whether it was the fault of stupid ignorance or corrupt design, perhaps his friends can answer.

But, sir, the returns were before the Governor and Privy Council, and were acted upon by them; but were set aside, not because they were not made in time, merely, but because they were not made formal in time!! All this objection for want of time and formality in the returns of Millville and South Amboy would have been regarded as a quibble worthy of a contemptible pettifogger, if, when opened, they had displayed the glorious intelligence of a Whig victory. Yes, sir, all such objections would have been scouted and sunk into nothingness; but as they unfolded the astounding and prostrating intelligence that a Democratic victory had been gained; that Federalism was overthrown, and routed horse, foot and dragoons, the objections were insurmountable in the eyes of the conscientious Governor and his partisan Privy Council, and of this we have proofs in the reception of the informal returns of the Federal townships, to which I have referred. Sir, I am done with the history and the facts of this case, only as I may have to refer to them incidentally. I have stated no fact in its exposition, in which I have not been sustained by proof indisputable and incontrovertible, and there is no reason why Mr. Dickerson and his associates should not now take their seats; no substantial reason exists why they should not have taken their seats at the commencement of the session. The Constitution of the United States, the laws of New Jersey and the policy of this Government, which secure the election to the man or set of men who have the greatest number of votes in an election, shall be the member or members returned, shall be entitled to be sworn, and take his or their seat or seats. Mr. Dickerson and his associates are these men. Sir, much complication has been thrown around, and much perplexity interwoven in this question, whereas there is but one simple, plain proposition involved, and that is the question of return. Who has the State of New Jersey returned to the Twenty-sixth Congress of the United States? Is it Mr. Dickerson and his associates, who have received "a majority of all the votes in the State," and who have now on our Clerk's table indisputable evidence of the fact, and who were the favorite candidates of the people, or is it Mr. Aycrigg and his associates, who have received a minority of all the votes in the State, as the proof on our Clerk's table shows conclusively, and who are but the favorite candidates of a corrupt Governor and a Federal partisan Privy Council, who claim seats here merely by virtue of a Governor's certificate and a broad seal. The question I say is a question of return merely, and involves no other principle.

The Constitution of the United States, art. 1, sec. 2, declares that "the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature." "No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen." It also declares, in section 4, that the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed, in each State, by the Legislature thereof; but Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators." And, in section 5, that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." This is the whole of the provision of the Constitution of the United States on the subject.

I repeat, that no question but that of the returns is involved; none other claims our consideration for a moment. The fifth section of the first artiele of the Constitution here read, provides that each House shall be the judge of the election, returns and qualifications of its own members. A question might present itself in which the returns, qualifications, and elections might all be involved. But in this case no such question is presented. The qualifications of the members presenting claims are not doubted; they all come up to the standard of the Constitution. The mode and manner in which the election was conducted came up to the standard of the laws of New Jersey; there is no real objection on that subject. So there is no question of "election" involved. It is the returns alone upon which this House is called upon to act. Strip the subject of all the complication in which it has been unnecessarily involved, and the question simply turns upon the power of the Governor's certificate, with the broad seal annexed, and the power of the ballot box. If the verity and power of the Governor's broad seal and certificate convey with them more political, constitutional, and legal omnipotence than the voice of a majority of the freemen in New Jersey, then is Messrs. Aycrigg and company entitled to seats in this Congress. But if the voice and suffrage of the people are to prevail, then give Messrs. Dickerson and company their seats. We have been read many loud and long lessons on the importance, value, and power of the broad seal of New Jersey, and the precedents in favor of the verity and solemnity attached to the broad seal, and of the vast importance of strict and unyielding adherence to precedent in support of the regard due to the broad seal. This stuff has been hammered into me until I am benumbed. Fundamental law, fundamental principles, common law, usages, customs, and precedents have been harrowed up from the rust and ashes of antiquity back to the dark and barbarous ages of the Norman conquest, and arrayed in support of the vast, omnipotent and divine importance which is made to attach to Governor Pennington's certificate and the broad seal of New Jersey. Now, sir, all the thanks that I have to return for all the labor of mind and body spent in this behalf, is, that I have a most sovereign and indignant contempt for common law, fundamental law, broad seal, precedent, and company; only as they go to support the plain principles of common sense—the principles of right, justice, and political freedom. Sir, I have the candor to acknowledge, that if I can maintain the character of possessing common sense, and an intention to do justice, it is the height of my ambition. I will never tax my brain with the investigation of abstruse, abstract, and fundamental principles, common law, precedent, &c. If the effect of such an investigation is to force upon me such conclusions and principles as have been advanced in this contest, I will leave such an investigation with those who smother and trample under foot the voice of sixty thousand freemen, by the omnipotence attached to a Governor's certificate and a broad seal. If the effect of such kind of learning and metaphysical research is to so far corrupt the heart and distemper every patriotic feeling, as to induce him who possesses it to prostrate the Constitution, nullify the spirit and meaning of the laws, and overthrow the freedom of the elective franchise, I beg to be excused from such learning and such research.

But we are asked how we can look behind the Governor's certificate and the broad seal? Are we going to blot out the State of New Jersey from the Federal Union? Are we going to pluck out one of the stars from the political firmament of this Government? Are you going to annihilate one of the old thirteen States of this Union, who poured out her blood like water in the Revolution? which you will do, if you disregard her broad seal, which is the evidence of her sovereignty? Sir, this is all flummery and fog. The sovereignty of New Jersey does not consist in Governor Pennington, his broad seal, or his certificate; nor is either of them, or all put together, in this case, evidence of her sovereignty. The certificate is a fraud and a falsehood, and the broad seal is but the evidence of the official character of him who perpetrates the one and asserts the other. Our effort is to maintain the sovereignty of New Jersey and her elective institutions, and the voice of her freemen, by preventing all from being sacrificed at the shrine of Federal corruption and the love of power. When, from absolute necessity, General Jackson declared martial law in the city of New Orleans, and suspended the writ of habeas corpus, and thereby saved the city from pillage, plunder, slaughter, and destruction, the Federal yelp was raised, loud and long, that it would have been better that New Orleans had fallen into the hands of the enemy, and Louisiana sunk, than that martial law should have been declared. It was a stroke of military despotism more dangerous and fatal in its character to the free institutions of this country and this people, than to have sunk New Orleans and Louisiana with her! What is the attempt we now see by the same party? no less than to overthrow the suffrage of sixty thousand freemen, to the end that credence may be given to a broad seal, evidencing nothing but the official character of the manufacturer of a false certificate! But we are told that the Governor's certificate, with his broad seal, is "prima facie evidence" that those who have it are truly elected, and we are bound to admit them as members until the converse is proven. What do we care about prima facie evidence, when we are in possession of the evidence itself. We have had read to us, and now have in our possession, the best evidence—evidence that proves conclusively that those who possess the prima facie evidence of their election were not elected. Of what value would be a certified copy of a record as evidence in a court of law, if the court were in possession of the original record itself? It would be the first and highest evidence; and such is the evidence we possess to support and prove the fact that Mr. DICKERSON and his associates are members of this Congress. But in the face of all this, the prima facie evidence is urged upon us.

The reasoning of gentlemen of the Opposition, reminds me of a small book I saw and read when I was a boy; it contained a system of logic. I never studied logic; I am ignorant of it as a science; and thought but little of this book at the time I read it; but the whole course of reasoning of the learned party, comes precisely up to the standard of the logic of that little book; and, indeed, there has been no other illustration of logical principles in this discussion on the part of the certificate, broad seal and Pennington men, than was illustrated by the work in question; and if the author's logic was not good and sound, it has, at least, the advantage of being popular.

The author reasoned thus: "Gentlemen wear boots. Mr. A. B. wears boots, therefore Mr. A. B. is a gentleman." "Ladies wear corsets. Miss A wears corsets, therefore Miss A. is a lady." Now, sir, gentlemen of the learned party here reasoned thus in this contest—members of Congress have a Governor's certificate, with a broad seal. Messrs. Aycrigg and company have certificates with the broad seal, therefore, Messrs Aycrigg and company are members of Congress. Now, sir, I deny the soundness of the logic. The reasoning is unsound, and the conclusions are false. I know men who wear boots who are not gentlemen; and so very common is it for every description and character of men to wear boots, that boots no longer afford even prima facie evidence of a gentleman. I know girls and women who wear corsets that are not ladies, and, indeed, it is so common for women to wear corsets, that corsets are no longer prima facie evidence of a lady; and, sir, I have even known ladies to be without corsets.

I know men who have a certificate with the broad seal who are not members of Congress; and, indeed, so common is it becoming, that a certificate with the broad seal is no longer prima facie evidence that he who bears it is a member of Congress.

But we have been told more than a thousand times this is a broad seal—"the broad seal of New Jersey." This seal is not the track of a calf's foot; no, sir, it is the track of an ox's foot. When it is slapped down, it makes a splash like the elephant's foot in a wet day. Sir, it must be as broad as the foot of Milton's devil, when he was cast out of heaven, which covered ten acres of ground; yes, broader, for Governor Pennington's certificate and broad seal covered the whole townships of South Amboy and Milliville, and nullified the entire vote of both, the surface of which I take to be equal to that of the original surveyed townships of the West, which I believe are each six miles square, which would be a surface of seventy-two square miles. This is going the whole in nullification. But, sir, we are implored to the support and defence of the broad seal, because it had its origin in ancient times, and has in its character the solemnity of antiquity. Sir, in my estimation, its power and character diminish by its antiquity. I believe the kind of seal in our use can be traced no farther back than the close of the Norman conquest, and if that is the time of its beginning, its antiquity is but a poor recommendation in its behalf. It had its invention and origin in the days of darkness, ignorance, and barbarity, when human ingenuity was concentrated upon the invention of arms, and when the most valuable human requisitions consisted in the skilful and dexterous use of those arms, and the most skilful and successful mode of carrying on a barbarous warfare; when letters were unknown, and science and philosophy were held in contempt. This was the origin of the broad seal. It was used to signify the intent to confirm a contract, and convey real estate in fee simple, for a time, or in trust; and the seal itself consisted in making a scrawl on parchment, which was not unlike the mark on paper which a spider would make in its escape from the contents of an inkstand. So much for the antiquity and invention of the broad seal, upon the solemnity and sacred preservation of which depends the preservation of the sovereignty of New Jersey, and without which her government must be overthrown, and she blotted out of the Federal Union! But, sir, I am unwilling that the broad seal shall enjoy the benefit of the character for antiquity which the learned party here are disposed to attach to it. I think the antiquity of the broad seal will have to commence with the reign of the Prince of Orange, who assumed the administration of England on the abdication of the throne by King James. Soon after James the Second came to the the throne he manifested a disposition to patronise and support, by his royal influence and revenue, the cause of the Roman Catholic, to the prejudice and exclusion of that of the Protestant religion, and to such an extent did he carry his measures that the nation became alarmed and commenced operations with a view to put a stop to those innovations upon their civil and religious liberties; and such was the general feeling and indignation manifested that King James, fearing a civil revolution and the loss of his head as well as his throne, in turn became alarmed, and gave his Government and throne "leg bail" for security; and it seems that he attached the same kind of consequence to the broad seal gentlemen here do, for he took it with him in his flight to France and cast it into the river Thames, thinking thereby to submerge the English Government, and with it all her political, civil, and religious institutions; so that if it is intended that the broad seal shall enjoy the benefit of antiquity from the close of the Norman conquest, gentlemen will have to devise some means to procure it from the bottom of the Thames, otherwise they will have to commence its antiquity with the abdication of King James. But the reasoning of King James in relation to the effect of the loss of the broad seal was about as fallacious as the reasoning of gentlemen here in relation to the effect upon the sovereignty and institutions of New Jersey, by a violation of her broad seal. The English Government was not submerged either by throwing the broad seal into the Thames or the abdication of King James. All the civil institutions in the Government continued their operations. The judicial functions were continued, civil magistrates and ministerial officers continued to discharge their duties. Little or no change was effected, or violence perpetrated; some few Roman Catholic institutions were prostrated, and Feversham disbanded the troops in the immediate neighborhood, without either paying them or disarming them; and these were about the consequences. The bishops and peers, who were then in town, being the highest remaining authority in the State, (for the Privy Council, composed of the king's minions, and his creatures, was totally disregarded and held in contempt,) assembled; they chose the Marquis of Halifax their Speaker. They gave directions to the judicial, civil and ministerial departments to continue in the discharge of their several duties. They reunited the army, and issued orders, which were obeyed, to the fleet, the army, and all the garrisons, and at the same time placed the Prince of Orange, the next of the blood royal, on the throne, and the Government went on as before. And this is all the effect that both the loss of the broad seal and the abdication of the throne had on the Government of England. What disastrous consequences have we to fear, then, to the sovereignty of New Jersey, when our course is to secure justice to her citizens, and stability and freedom to her institutions.

Such fanatical and superstitious attachment to the broad seal is worthy the slavish land of precedents, aristocratic customs and despotic dogmas. When in the reign of George III the broad seal of England was stolen from the high Chancellor, a question was entertained and discussed, whether the thief who stole the broad seal was not the King, de facto, of England, and George III merely King de jure; nor is the broad seal of New Jersey entitled to the solemnity which gentlemen here attach to it, from antiquity. If I mistake not, history authorizes me to say that the Governor of the colony of New Jersey was a tory in the Revolution, fled his country, and bore the broad seal with him; so gentlemen must limit the antiquity of this broad seal to the State organization of New Jersey. This is not the first time the broad seal has been used for the base purposes of fraud. The Earl of Essex, in the reign of Elizabeth, counterfeited the broad seal of England, and thereby seized many large estates, which he enjoyed for some years before the fraud was discovered.

Sir, during a part of my remarks on the broad seal of New Jersey, and the fanatic attachment of the learned of this House to it, a gentleman, who sat in the gallery, made notes of what I said; he turned a portion of those remarks into rhyme, and presented it to me—here it is. To the end, that some future use might be made of it, I was desirous to prefix a tune to which it might be sung. Finding my own poetical and musical abilities insufficient (for I have no poetical talent, nor have I any turn for music, save that I sometimes draw the horse's tail across the catgut, and squeak out a little music for my own amusement, not for any other person's,) I applied to my little son Thomas, (a boy ten years old,) who is a musician, and I fear has a talent for poetry, (I fear so, for I have seldom known a native musician and poet that was good for any thing else) to assist me. He took hold of the paper, and, counting the syllables of the first two lines of the verse, instantly applied the

AIR—"Jim Brown."

When England's Third George madly ruled o'er the land,
A thief stole his seal from the Chancellor's hand;
And quibblers in crimson, and vicars in lawn,
Asked, who was the King, when the broad seal was gone?
And some were so simple—ay, passing belief—
As to say that the sovereignty lodged with the thief;
That George was a sovereign—de jure—alone,
While the thief with the seal was, de facto, the Throne.
But, excepting this time, since the days of King James,
When he threw the great seal in the midst of the Thames,
No child e'er conceived, tho' his sire was an ass,
That sovereignty lived in a circle of brass;
That Liberty nestled in lumps of red wax,
Affixed to dead leather from bellweather backs,
Till Pennington's seal, with its plough and its steer,
Was shown as the presence of sovereignty here.

Yes, yes: it was left for the wise of our time,
To second an error so grand and sublime.

True, Essex the Earl, in Elizabeth's time,
Counterfeited the seal of his sovereign for crime,
And many a broad belted Earldom he gained,
And with the strong hand of a noble retained;
But at last Gaffer Time, that old mar plot, revealed
What Essex so long from the nation con-cealed;
And back to the owners the lands were returned,
While the records were crossed, and the title deeds burned.

The seal of New Jersey, tho' good in its way,
Is not half so ancient as many folks say.
When a province, and during the Third George's reign,
A tory her Governor long did remain;
But finding, at last, revolution was brewing,
And fearing the quid they designed for his chewing,
He cleared, with the seal in his pocket—oh, fie!
And left its antiquity—all in my eye.

Illustrious seal! thou art bigger, by half,
Than the head of a cat, or the foot of a calf.
An ox could not cover thee over, 'tis plain,
Milton's devil, to do it, would labor in vain.
He covered ten acres with only one foot,
But you covered Milville and Amboy to boot.
Yes, Milville and Amboy, and, sorrowful fate,
You palsied the popular will of a State.
But softly, my muse, thou art fast in thy zeal;
The lovers of freedom have palsied the seal.

Yes! spite of thy mighty defenders—Oh! brass
Impressed in red wax on the skin of an ass—
Thou art left for thy own sovereign people to scorn,
Though lovely art thou with thy field of ripe corn;
Thy ox and thy husbandman blush to be shown,
Declaring a fact which the people won't own;
Thy presence is evidence, only, that men
Can do with thy face what they do with a pen,
That is, they can use thee to solemnize frauds,
As wedding rings often are given to bawds;
But simpletons only will swallow for truth,
What apes would reject in the days of their youth.

Once, gentlemen, only, wore ruffles and boots,
And lovelocks and dickeys and superfine suits;
And ladies, alone, in tight corsets were seen,
In dancing saloons or in walks on the green;
And members of Congress, alone, were revealed,
By writings on parchment, by Governor's sealed;
But now many loafers in boots walk the street,
And woman—not ladies—in corsets we meet;
And men claiming seats in the halls of the land,
With sovereignty waxed in the gripe of the hand,
Whose rights to the same scarcely equalled the brutes
Who furnished them parchment and wool for their suits.
But reason looks down from her mountain top throne,
And passing the boots, takes the decent alone;
And throwing the corsets and signets behind,
Takes ladies for ladies and members in kind.
Then hey for the age, when the mark of a dolt,
Though broad as an ox or as small as a colt,
Is passed by the free, for the facts of the case,
And parchment and wax to the people give place.

But, sir, in all these arguments and conclusions in favor of the rights of the people of New Jersey, to the exclusion of her broad seal, which has been on this occasion used to prostrate them, we are met with the all omnipotent objection of PRECEDENT. Sir, we have been hammered with precedent! precedent! until we are all beaten into stupidity. Sir, I hold in my hand the Constitution and its amendments, and the whole put together is not larger than a child's primer, and its easy comprehension resembles the contents of the book it in size represents. Its brevity depends upon the simplicity and clearness of its provisions and propositions, and the whole most happily displays the powerful minds and clear comprehensions of those who framed it. Every sentence in it shows that its authors meant what they said, and said what they meant, and no more. Hence it is that the Democracy of this country, entertaining this view of the Constitution, deny to the Federal Government the right to exercise any power not expressly authorized by the Constitution. And yet, simple and plain as it is, adapted, as it is and as it was intended to be, to the most common unlettered understanding, not a question can come up here that has any connection, mediate or immediate, with the Constitution, but we are led into the labyrinths and mazes of antiquity for precedents to illustrate it. We have our uncomplexed Constitution; we have, what we suppose to be, our plain, simple, and well understood maxims, customs, and institutions, that all are supposed to understand, and all of which have an analogy to our Republican Government, by which we live and by which we hope to die. But, I repeat, that a question can hardly be raised here, but what we are driven, for its illustration, into the dark, damp, winding labyrinths of antiquity for precedents, which, when found, only serve to involve us in the fog and the mazes of metaphysical jargon. Sir, I, as an American citizen, hold myself bound by none of them, only as they illustrate truth and maintain justice. Our gallant ancestors, by a bravery and patriotism which shall ever be the subject of shout and song, threw off their allegiance to the throne and Government of Great Britain. They broke the chains and burst the shackles that bound us to an order of despotic dogmas and a set of aristocratic maxims; and I hold that all obligations have been cancelled, and we are now free. But gentlemen say, "No: we are bound by precedents." Sir, we might as well be under the mandates of her Britannic Majesty, as to have all our own free and simple institutions overthrown by the aristocratic precedents common to England. To little effect did our ancestors battle for independence, and to as little effect did they ply their patriotism and skill to rear a Government of free institutions, if the divine right of king precedent is to dictate laws, and enforce his despotic usages upon us, to the exclusion of our own Constitution and laws, and in the teeth of common sense, and the plain principles of justice. Why, sir, one would be led to believe, from the vast consequence attached by gentlemen in this discussion to precedent, that it is the prerogative of precedent to not only control the civil action of the living, but to judge the dead. Sir, such dogmas may suit such as occasionally amuse and delight themselves in pronouncing eulogies, such as did the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] the other day, on the Government and institutions of England. We always have had a party in this country who have been a little more attached to the political institutions of England than those of their own country. For my part, sir, I have no love for the concern. I look upon their Government and all their political institutions as a rotten, corrupt, and despotic establishment, at war with every true native principle of human liberty; and most of their maxims and precedents incompatible with the simple institutions of our country. Their corrupt policy has bankrupted the nation, fastened shackles of slavery on their people, that will never be broken, and filled their continent with hungry, pinching, and naked beggars. Yes, sir, tombs of despotism and antiquity have been torn open, and the rotten and half decayed volumes of other ages and other centuries paraded forth to prove to the American people that the apostolic reverence due the worm-eaten carcass and gray locks of precedent demand that Governor Pennington's certificate and the broad seal of New Jersey, in the face of justice and truth, staring us in the teeth, and in the violation of the voice of a majority of sixty thousand freemen, entitles Messrs. Aycrigg and company to seats in this hall. As I have before said, the great question seems to rest in this simple inquiry, whether Governor Pennington's certificate and his broad seal shall secure to Messrs. Aycrigg and his associates seats in this Congress, or whether evidence, indisputable and now in our possession, of the fact that Messrs. Dickerson and his associates have had a majority of all the votes in New Jersey, shall entitle them to seats. The Opposition go for and sustain the certificate members, and we, the Democracy, believe in and support the force and power of the poll-books; that is, we go for and support the claims of the members elected by the people. The Opposition rely upon precedent to sustain their position, as I have before said. Now, sir, although no advocate for precedent farther than it will support justice and confirm right, I will, for the benefit of some gentlemen here, recite a few cases of precedent, which I think, from the character of their authority, will have a becoming weight, at least with those who are the authors of some of them. We go, I say, for the polls, and we were opposed to either of the contesting members participating in the organization of the House until we were in possession of the proper amount of evidence to decide upon their claims. And now for the precedents (modern, not ancient.) The first case of precedent I will present in favor of our position, is the case of Moore and Letcher of Kentucky, which occurred in 1834—a case involving precisely the same question and principles that this does, only that Moore, the certificate member, was a Democrat.

Mr. Aycrigg and his associates in this case are Whigs; and in that case neither of the parties were permitted to participate in the organization of the House. So far we are sustained in our refusal to permit Messrs. Aycrigg and his associates to participate in the organization of the House. But here comes the Whig opinions in that contest. Mr. DUNCAN read:

Mr. ALLAN, it will be seen, opened the question by objecting "TO THE RECEPTION OF THE RETURNS TRANSMITTED BY THE GOVERNOR OF KENTUCKY, AS BEING ILLEGAL AND NULL;" and the ground upon which he declared the certificate illegal and null, was one which did not appear on the face of the certificate itself, nor in any official document of the Governor of Kentucky, but which does appear in an official communication of the Governor of New Jersey in regard to the certificates given by him to the minority candidates there. It is "THAT THEY [the returning officers] HAD NOT COUNTED ALL TH; VOTES."

Mr. CHILTON of Kentucky, another Whig member, said that "THE SOLE QUESTION WAS, WHETHER THE CERTIFICATE WHICH HAD BEEN PRODUCED WAS OR WAS NOT OF A LEGAL CHARACTER." He insisted it was not, because the law had not been "COMPLIED WITH"

Mr. MARSHALL contended that the certificate was void, "BECAUSE IT DID NOT CONTAIN EVIDENCE OF THE MAIN FACT—WHAT WAS THE CHOICE OF THE PEOPLE OF THE DISTRICT. THIS WAS WHAT THE HOUSE WANTED, AND THIS COULD BE OBTAINED FROM THE LEGAL RECORD—THE POLL BOOKS—CERTIFIED COPIES OF WHICH ARE NOW ON THE CLERK'S TABLE."

Mr. ELLSWORTH (another Federalist) took the position "that the House would be governed by THE ACTUAL STATE OF THE BALLOT BOX," not by the Governor's certificate.

Mr. ADAMS assumed that "THE DIFFICULTY HAD ARISEN IN A FRAUD," and upon that question he "WAS PREPARED TO SIT AND VOTE UNTIL IT SHOULD BE SETTLED."

Mr. D. remarked that the doses that he now was administering were bitter doses. They nauseated the stomachs and sickened the bowels of gentlemen to whom they were administered. They were technically called drastic doses, by knights of the lancet; but sickening as they were, he hoped gentlemen would take them in confidence and good faith, as they, perhaps, would have the effect to cure that most dangerous and malignant disease with which they are affected, he meant the disease of inconsistency—a disease most calculated of all others to subvert the moral faculties, destroy every pretension to truth and justice, and overthrow a reputation for candor and sincerity. This disease has both its remote and proximate cause in a dropsical overflow of the foul waters of Federalism, and these were the best doses for such a malady. Moreover, the prescription is made by a regular built physician, not one who boasts of his professional skill at all, but one who has the prima facie evidence of his profession; that is, he has the parchment with the appropriate certificate, and that, too, in classic language, with all the diplomatic flourishes; the blue riband, and, what is of vastly more importance, the broad seal of a regularly and legally authorized and established medical college, of the good old orthodox order; none of your new fashioned root, vegetable, botanical, electromagnetic, Thompsonian, No. 6 institution. Then, sir, according to the doctrines advanced here, and the omnipotent consequence attached to certificates and broad seals, gentlemen must take in good faith the prescriptions of any one who has the prima facie evidence of the medical profession, though he be the greatest empiric that ever disgraced the order of the lancet. With his explanation, sir, I proceed to prescribe, and with the best hope of success.

Mr. BINNEY (another Federalist and lawyer of eminence) laid it down as a principle, that "THERE IS SOME WEIGHT IN THE POLLS, AND UNLESS IT WAS COUNTERACTED BY EVIDENCE, THE POLLS MUST STAND."

Mr. LINCOLN maintained the same principle. But the speech of Mr. BANKS, (one of the most honest, enlightened, and respected Federal members,) which was made upon a motion of his own to give Mr LETCHER the seat, after the first resolutions, given above, had passed, assumed the highest ground, and we think the true ground, after the House had rejected the Governor's certificate as not corresponding with the polls. He said, "THE MAJORITY OF VOTES DOES ENTITLE THE PERSON TO WHOM THEY ARE GIVEN TO HIS SEAT. MR. LETCHER SHOULD, THEN, IN OUR OPINION, BE CONSIDERED IN THIS TRIAL AND DISCUSSION AS IN POSSESSION OF HIS SEAT."

Mr. CHILTON of Kentucky said the sole question in the case was, whether the certificate which had been produced, was or was not of a legal character. The duty of the sheriffs was plainly pointed out by the law, and all to be decided was, whether they had complied with it or not. He then reviewed the certificate, and insisted that it was palpable that they had not. Not could he admit, as had been concluded, that though the evidence furnished by such a paper might be incomplete, yet it was the next best that could be obtained in the case, and therefore ought to be received. Would it be admitted in a court of justice, in a case where there were two witnesses to a fact, one of them competent, credible, and disinterested, and the other of an opposite character, that, if the first could not be obtained, the testimony of the interested witness must be admitted, because it was the next best? Surely not.

Mr. C. dwelt upon the dangerous consequences that must grow out of the reception of such a paper to the purity of elections, and the safety of the elective franchise.

* * * * * * *

Mr. MARSHALL of Kentucky went into an examination of the certificate on which Mr. MOORE claimed, and insisted that no court of justice in the country would receive it as evidence under the law of Kentucky. The paper did not contain evidence of the main fact in the case, viz: what was the choice of the people of the district in question? This was what the House wanted, and this could be obtained from the legal record, the poll books; certified copies of all which were now on the Clerk's table. The certificate was only a substitute for these, admitted out of convenience; but if it was defective, then resort must be had to the records themselves—which were the very best possible evidence in the case.

* * * * * * *

Mr. ELLSWORTH presumed that if either of the claimants could satisfy the House what had been the actual state of the ballot box, the House would be governed by that fact, and decide accordingly. This was not one of those cases where a majority of sheriffs could act for the whole. Had they certified that A B had been elected according to the votes of one county, could that be deemed sufficient? Surely not. Suppose they had certified the same according to two counties, would that be admitted? or of three? why then of four, when five counties had voted? would a certificate be admitted that a certain paper was the record of a court, except one page? This was just such a certificate.

In the House of Representatives, Wednesday, June 11, 1834, the case of the contested election of Messrs. MOORE and LETCHER being under consideration—

Mr. ADAMS said: There was no difficulty in the question; or, if there was, the House had already surmounted it, by deciding on all the questions of principle involved. What remained was easy; and if the House would only proceed as it had been occupied, they would arrive without difficulty at a just result. And he, for one, was prepared to sit and vote till it should be settled. The difficulty had arisen in a fraud.

Mr. BINNEY of Pennsylvania, remarked: Were the votes illegally received or illegally rejected? That was the first question. There was some weight in the polls; and unless it was counteracted by evidence, the polls must stand. If evidence was brought to counteract them, that evidence must be judged of as it was elsewhere—as it was daily judged of in the courts of justice; and when it had been weighed on both sides, the scale preponderating must be allowed to preponderate.

Mr. LINCOLN repudiated the idea of the decision being impracticable, or even difficult. All that was to be done was to lay down a just principle, and then try the items of evidence by it. A great outrage had been committed on the people and laws of Kentucky, and it was the duty of the House to vindicate those rights. Would the House consummate the very object in view of that sheriff who had fraudulently withheld the poll book! Would they become instruments to effect his purpose which was to defeat the election of Mr. Letcher? The House was bound to teach a lesson on that subject, which should prevent the repetition of such an outrage.

Extracts from the remarks of Mr. BANKS, in the House of Representatives, May 20, 1834, on the contested election of Messrs. Moore and Letcher, of Kentucky.

In my judgment, the majority of the votes entitled Mr. Letcher to the certificate of election. The certificate, which was given for Mr. Moore, and forwarded to the Secretary of State, was not only irregular, but absolutely void. It was not signed by all the sheriffs: it appeared, on the face of it, that all the votes given in the district were not compared and added up. It was proved that the Lincoln poll was withheld from the computation, in fraud of the law, in fraud of the rights of the electors of the district, and in fraud of the rights of Mr. Letcher. The certificate was signed but by three out of the five sheriffs in the district. It is a principle of law that we should presume that officers had done their duty, in absence of proof to the contrary. But this presumption cannot be made in favor of what is irregular on its face; much less can it be made in favor of that which is found to have been done in open violation of law and public duty. Nor, in my opinion, does this certificate derive any additional force from the fact that it was sent by the sheriff to the Secretary of State, and that it has been forwarded here. This does not cure the defects; this gives it no additional authenticity. It was, in the first instance, void, and, in my judgment, is still void. I do not think that it entitled Mr. Moore to his seat, and I believe a large majority of the members of this House entertain the same opinion.

The production of a legal certificate entitles the person in whose favor it is, to his seat, in the first instance. In the absence of this certificate, the polls are as high, if not the highest, evidence of the person elected in the first instance, subject, however, to be impeached. The majority of votes actually given entitles the person to a certificate. If no certificate is given, then the majority of votes does entitle the person to whom they are given to his seat. Mr. Letcher should, then, in my opinion, be considered, in this trial and discussion, as in possession of his seat, and Mr. Moore should be held to prove that the majority of legal votes was given to him, and not to Mr. Letcher. This he should do, by clear and satisfactory evidence.

This appears to be the obvious course which should be pursued. This puts the parties in the position in which the electors of the district have placed them.

Here are Whig precedents and Whig opinions for you! Here, sir, are precedents and opinions from the learned heads and honest hearts of the Whigs in 1834—in a contest, I repeat it, involving precisely the same question, and no other than this does. Then the polls were all powerful and omnipotent, and the Governor's certificate and the broad seal of the sovereign State of old Kentuck nothing. But now the tables are turned; now Whigs hold the certificates, and the broad seal is all powerful, and the polls nothing. Yes, sir; the saddle is on the other horse. So, it seems, precedent works two ways; or, like the juggler's card, it has two faces. The jack of clubs is presented, and at the order, "presto change," instantly the beautiful queen of hearts appears. So we go in these times of moral depravity and political corruption. But, sir, as precedents are in such high demand, we will exhibit a few more. It has been iterated and reiterated, over and over, that the whole table of precedents, ancient and modern, is in favor of receiving the certified members in this case. Sir, I am not going to risk my carcass and health, by going into the damp, unwholesome vapors of the tombs of antiquity, fit only for a toad or a snake to inhale, and mingle with the spirits of the dead, to hunt up precedents; but I will exhibit what I have found above ground, and those of modern times. I hold in my hand a book, containing all the cases of contested elections since the organization of this Government, worth recording. It is a large book; it contains one thousand and twenty-five pages. I have turned over every page of this big book. It is full of contested elections. I have examined the points upon which every case it contains turns, and the principle upon which each case has been decided; and I now assert, that there is not a decision between its lids that will warrant the reception of the certificate members to their seats, and I challenge successful contradiction. It is full of precedents that either expressly or impliedly sustain the claims of those members with the certified poll books, showing that they have a majority of the votes. I will read one or two. The first to which I will ask your attention is the case of Spalding against Meade, p. 157. The point upon which this case turned is:

"Congress is, by the Constitution, the exclusive judge of the elections and returns, as well as the qualifications of its members, and the returns from the State authorities are prima facie evidence only of an election, and are not conclusive on the House."

I will ask your attention to another. It is the case of Mallory against Merrill, p. 328. The point upon which the decision turned in this case is:

"Votes fairly given to a party may be counted in his favor, though they have never been returned to the proper State authorities; the default of a return not being chargeable upon such party."

One more case, sir, if you can have patience, and I will trouble you no more with precedents. It is the case of Biddle and Richard against Wing, p. 504. In this case it was decided that:

"The officers of the different election districts must certify the result to the commissioners, and they must certify to the Governor. They are all ministerial officers, and error committed by any of them, either through mistake or design, is to be corrected by the House."

One more, sir, strikes my mind that is in point: Messrs. Dickerson and his associates present you the certificate of the Secretary of State, showing that they have the majority of all the votes polled at the election of which they claim to be elected; but this is contended not to be sufficient evidence. Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson, members from Mississippi for the Twenty-fifth Congress, appeared at the commencement of the extra session of that Congress, and claimed their seats. It was objected that the evidence of their election was not sufficient. (I think they had the certificate of the Secretary of State.)

Mr. MERCER of Va. offered the following, viz:

"Resolved, That sufficient evidence has not been afforded to this House that John F. Claiborne and Samuel J. Gholson are lawfully entitled to seats therein."—Jour. Ex. Ses. p. 4

The resolution was debated. The question was laid on the table by an overwhelming majority, and Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson took their seats. So, sir, here is an admission of members on the certificate of the Secretary of State, and here ends the chapter, with me, on precedents.

But, sir, we have been told, in tones of triumph, that New Jersey has confirmed the fact that Messrs. AYCRIGG and company were elected at the October election in 1838, by electing a Whig majority to both branches of the State Legislature in 1839; and this fact is paramount evidence that Messrs. AYCRIGG and company are entitled to their seats in this Congress. Yes, this is the highest evidence that can be demanded that Mr. DICKERSON and his associates are not the choice of a majority of the people of New Jersey. Sir, when I received the news of the Federal victory in New Jersey last fall, I rejoiced at it. Such was the overflowing tide of Democratic success over every part and portion of the Union, that I feared the consequences. I dreaded that apathy which never fails to seize the unsuspecting Democracy upon universal victory. I was afraid that they would be overtaken and overthrown by an enemy that never sleeps, before they could be awakened to a sense of their danger. Knowing, as I did, that the whole power of Federalism, with all its means, will be brought to bear upon the contest now commenced, I felt rejoiced that we had met with a temporary defeat, which could do no serious injury to our cause, but which would serve to keep, at least, our sentinels from sleeping at their post. I thought and reasoned as did Philip of Macedon, when he heard, in the space of one hour, of his success in the chariot races in the Olympic games, the victory of his troops in a great battle, and of the birth of his son Alexander. The Pagan raised his eyes and his hands towards heaven, and prayed, "Oh, ye gods! send me some slight misfortune, that I may not be overcome with this overflowing torrent of good news, and, lest some great misfortune overtake me." These were my feelings and my reflections when I heard of the Whig victory of New Jersey. But, sir, we have seen the fatal effects of political apathy by successive victory, in our own time and country. History furnishes us with many fatal disasters, both of a political and military character, from the same cause. The immortal Hannibal was successful in his long and arduous march from New Carthage to the Rhone. He was successful in its perilous passage, and in conquering those who were prepared to contend against him. He was successful in ascending the Alps, whose snow-covered tops seemed to reach the skies, and in routing the Gauls who defended their passes. His cavalry successfully fought and routed the Roman horse on the Ticenus. The fields of Trebea yielded him victory; the Roman troops of Thrasymine fell before him or fled like the timid hind. Cannæ proclaimed him victor, and the plains of Italy were his. The walls of Rome shook, and her citadel trembled at his name. But now the fatal effects of unchecked success and unmixed victory seized him. Now, said Maharbal, is our time to take Rome; her gates will open to us. I will think of that, said Hannibal. Lulled by a mistaken security, which sometimes besets the most vigilant in successful career, he took his winter quarters in Capua, where his troops rioted in the fashionable indulgences of that opulent city, on the rich spoils of the conquered enemy. But when the spring campaign opened, they were no longer the hardy soldiers of Hannibal; their bravery and invincible courage, and their capacity for toil and fatigue, were exchanged for softness and effeminacy, the offspring of idleness and luxury, and their love of order and subordination for contemptuous mutiny, supineness, and irregularity; and, with all these, sunk the power of ever taking Rome—the glory of Hannibal tarnished, and his name made less immortal. Such, sir, is the fate of those who rest in security upon success and victory. I repeat, I thought and reasoned as did Phillip when I heard of the Whig victory of New Jersey. But, sir there was no Whig victory.

Sir, I deny the position in fact and in principle. I deny that the fact that the Federalists have a majority in the present Legislature is any evidence that a majority of the people of New Jersey are in favor of the certificate members, and I deny that a majority of the voters of New Jersey have placed a Federal majority in the Legislature. I acknowledge that there is a Federal majority in the Legislature, and I will account for it. Members of Congress in New Jersey are elected by general ticket. Members of the Legislature and of the Council are elected by counties and districts.

The Federalists have had the ascendancy in the State Legislature for two years, and it is a well known fact that no small part of their time and ingenuity have been devoted to districting the State so as to favor their party, and always secure a Federal majority in the Legislature; and so well have they succeeded that a Federal Legislature may be, and has been, elected by the present district system, while there is a large majority of Democratic voters in the State. Sir, as I have not taken a position, nor asserted a fact, but what I have or can maintain, so I proceed to maintain this, viz: that so far from the Governor being sustained in his corrupt course, an overwhelming majority of the people of New Jersey have expressed their disapprobation and indignation at it. Sir, the increased Democratic majority, of the recent elections, over the Democratic majority of 1838, is near two thousand votes. Here is the proof; here are the facts and figures; read for yourself. Here is a table which shows the Democratic majorities and Whig majorities in the several counties, in 1838 and 1839. Here they are; you can run and read:

There may be some errors in the published returns, from which these abstracts are taken, but none to vary the estimated majority materially. But farther, sir, in many of the counties having large minorities of Democratic voters no test was made; the Whig candidates were not opposed, and of course, the Democratic votes not polled. It is justly presumed, that if there had been opposing candidates in every instance, the popular Democratic majority would have been over four thousand. What has become of your vaunted assertion, now, sir, "that the people of New Jersey in their recent elections have sustained the Governor and his Council." These tables show.

Sir, the Governor in his so called opinion to the Privy Council—though it better deserves the cognomen of a paltry, whining, pining, hypocritical apology to the community, for the fraud he has practised upon them—I say, in that opinion, he submits and answers the following proposition: "But it will be asked with force and propriety, is a candidate to lose his seat in Congress, because a county clerk does not make a return of the votes? Certainly not. If, through inadvertence, or by design, any votes have not been returned by the clerks, it is in the power of the House of Representatives, in their discretion, to allow those votes, and give the seat to the person who with those votes may be elected," &c. Now, sir, it will be remembered that the Governor, in another part of his opinion, says that he can act only on the returns that are made in time. He cannot look behind the clerks' returns, etc. but recommends the contestors—whom, he admits, have "a majority of all the votes in the State," and that he has the returns before him, which show the fact, but he can only act on those that have been made in time—to apply to the House of Representatives for relief, etc. Well, sir, the contestors are here, and make the advised application; and how have they been me? Why, sir, the Opposition, taking the cue from the Governor, say, we can do nothing for you; we can't look behind the Governor's certificate. What incomparable stuff! what superlative sophistry! The only respect due to it is to treat it with the contempt it merits, and that is silence. Sir, I think New Jersey is "sold to the Dutch." No, not to the Dutch—I wish it was—the Dutch are Democratic. Swamped in the vocative! Heels over head in the Federal mire! The State districted so as at all times to secure a Federal majority in the Legislature and Council. And now for the powers of the Legislature. What are they? Why, by the Constitution of New Jersey, the Legislature makes the Governor, and to them alone is he responsible; the Legislature makes the Judiciary; the Legislature makes the county clerks, and the Council, or so many of them as the Governor may see proper to select, (not less than three,) makes the Governor's Privy Council. What prospects have the Democracy of ever raising their heads, though their majority at this time of the popular vote perhaps is not less than four thousand.

A Federal Legislature will always make a Federal Governor; a Federal Governor will always expend his patronage on Federalists; a Federal Governor will always select a Federal Council; a Federal Council will always advise the advancement of Federal men, Federal measures, and Federal institutions; a Federal Legislature will make all their appointments of judges and county clerks from the creatures of their own party, and they will never fail to carry down the principle to appointments within their gift. What have you left now? Why, you have but one standard around which you can rally—one loop on which to hang a hope—the name of but one State official Democrat to dwell upon your lips, and that name is James D. Westcott, Secretary of State; and just as soon as his time expires, he will walk the chalk, for he, too, is elected by the Legislature. The only remnant of practical franchise you have left, is the power you have to elect by general ticket your Representatives to Congress. But do not be flattered with this hope; it is an idle dream, a vain delusion, and will avail you nothing; for if you succeed in giving your Democratic candidates "a majority of all the votes," a Federal county clerk will refuse to make returns in time, a Federal Governor will, in violation of the law, refuse to send for them, and they not being returned in time, he will not act on them. "He cannot look behind the clerk's returns." He will give the certificates to the Federal candidates, who have a majority of votes returned in time. Your Democratic candidates who may have "a majority of all the votes," in conformity with your constitutional rights, will attend with certified copies of the poll books, showing that they have been elected by a clear and undisputed majority; but they will be met at the threshold of this hall, and told—gentlemen, go home, we can do nothing for you, we cannot look behind the Governor's certificate and the broad seal. Democrats of New Jersey, have you really thought of your situation? If you have not, it is time for you to wake up and do yourselves justice—it is due to yourselves that you should do so. It is due to the services and memory of your ancestors; but above all, it is due to those who will come after you, that you transmit to them the freedom of the elective franchise, as pure and unembarrased as it descended to you.

Sir, had I the voice of thunder, I would speak in peals, to the ear of every lover of human liberty in New Jersey, to rally to the standard of his constitutional and equal right, and nerve himself to the overthrow of Federal despotism, that is now overshadowing the free institutions of his State, and corrupting the fountains of the elective franchise.

Sir, appeal after appeal, and appeals upon appeals, have been made to the State rights party here; and they asked, in pretended and hypocritical patriotic tones, if they will stand by and see the broad seal of a State mutilated, and her sovereignty dishonored. The State Rights party has been vociferated already, until it has become a hackneyed phrase. I suppose the State Rights party are to be the jacks upon which every demagogical trash is to be packed during this session. Sir, I have given some little attention to the subject of State Rights doctrines, and my application has led me to the conclusion,

1. That the Federal Government can exercise no power not expressly authorized by the Constitution.

2. That the States can do every thing (not morally wrong) which is not expressly prohibited by the Constitution.

3. That the Government has no power to raise a revenue to the amount of one dollar over and above what is wanted for the support of the Government, in the exercise of the powers for which it was created.

4. That the Federal Government was formed for the purposes of national defence, as well to the suppression of internal dissensions as foreign invasion, and for no other.

5. That, in the formation of laws for the purposes of revenue, the strictest principles of equality should be sacredly observed; and no system should be established which would, in its operations, benefit one part of the Union to the injury of another.

6. That whatever powers the Federal Government possesses were surrendered by the States, and are limited within the letter of the Constitution, which is the evidence of that surrender.

7. That whatever powers were not so expressly surrendered, were reserved to the people and the States.

8. That a violation of any or all of these principles, is a violation of the Constitution—an infringement of the rights of the people, and a subversion of the free institutions and sovereignty of the States affected by such violation.

9. That the sovereignty of a State consists in the full enjoyment on the part of the people of all powers, civil and religious, not surrendered to the Federal Government; and more especially the free exercise and full benefit of that most valuable and sacred of all principles, the freedom of the elective franchise.

10. That, in the constitutional exercise of power by this House, over the returns, qualifications, and elections of its members, the inviolable preservation of free sufrage should be its first and highest object, as the only means by which the rights of the people can be secured, in the exercise of their sovereignty. And these, sir, are Moses and the ten commandments, which I have extracted from the sacred book of State rights.

Now, sir, if these are State Rights doctrines I am a State Rights man; and I hereby attach my hand, and affix my seal, and swear upon the altar to maintain them. But I have yet to learn that the sovereignty of a State, and the freedom and independence of her people, have their existence in the certificate of a Governor, which is no more than prima facie evidence of a fact, sometimes of a falsehood, and his seal, which only evidences his official character. This is a new and late addition to the doctrine of State Rights, and I undertake to say not recognized as orthodox by the party; and, sir, calls upon the State Rights party to sustain such a doctrine as this, will be as vain as the call of Dives upon Lazarus. They will be unanswered by every State Rights man who properly understands the creed of his profession, and whose doctrines are not in market.

Sir, the deadly stab that the free suffrage has received by the hand of Governor Pennington and his Privy Council is not confined in its operations and withering effects to the people and the institutions of New Jersey; it is general and wide in its operations; it spreads pestilence, sickness, death, and desolation to the elective franchise and free institutions of other States and other people. So interwoven and identified are the principles, political and civil, of all the States and people of this broad spread Union, and such is the uniformity of principle upon which they are based, that a violation of any one native or political right or privilege of a fundamental character never fails to have a corresponding effect upon the whole, and more especially when so important and vital a principle as that of the elective franchise receives a wound, the whole political frame, Federal and State, is for a time palsied. Why is it that we have a volcanic agitation here, whenever any order is attempted to be taken in behalf of modern Abolitionism? It is not because gentlemen who represent the South or the slave States feel an abstract interest in favor of the perpetuity of slavery in the District of Columbia, or the bondage of the enslaved population within it. No; I have no doubt but what their private and individual feelings are against both; but it is because they look upon the effort to abolish slavery in the District as an officious intermeddling on the part of those who are attempting it, incompatible with the reserved rights and sovereignty of the States, and a direct effort of the people of other States to overthrow the institutions of theirs. They look upon it, and not without reason and just suspicion, as an entering wedge to the introduction of other innovations, and the exercise of other powers, that may control and prostrate the institutions of the South which may not be fashionable in the North; and if entertained here, they have no where to look for security but in their own strength. God knows, and my readers know, who have read me, that I am no friend to slavery, but I am a friend to the duration of this Union; and knowing, as I do, and as all know, that this Union can be perpetuated in no other way than by a strict adherence to the letter of the Constitution, the narrowest possible exercise of Federal powers, the broadest security of State sovereignty, and the most sacred observance of the conditions upon which this Government was established, I must ever feel my highest duty to sustain the latter, while I have only the right and the feeling to deplore and lament the former. Whenever it is the expressed wish of the people of the District of Columbia to abolish slavery within its limits, it will gratify the most noble feeling of my heart to do my part to carry out that wish; but, until then, I believe we have about as much right to interfere with slavery here as we have to legislate on the miserable condition and slavish bondage of the serfs of Russia, or the boors of Denmark.

Yes, sir, the causes that give rise to the watchful jealousy of the South, in relation to the workings of modern Abolitionism, illustrates the medium through which the elective franchise, throughout this Union, has been wounded by the stab given by Governor Pennington and his Privy Council.

But softly, gentlemen of the South—you of the modern Whig order. Your hurricanes on the introduction of Abolitionism must come down to gentle winds and soft showers. Your late Harrisburg Federal National Republican Whig Convention has imposed on you, if not an Abolition candidate for the next Presidency, a candidate of the Abolition party, and with them you are ranked to fight shoulder and elbow; so if it is your desire to conquer, you must be moderate and yielding with your new friends.

Mr. Speaker, ours is a Government of the people. That is to say, the people govern. They govern by their representative, their judicial, their ministerial, and their executive officers. The officers of these different classes are but the political and public servants of the people, and the people are their sovereign principals or political masters. Prior to the establishment of our Goverment the capacity of man to govern himself, in a political sense, was a great problem, which had never been fairly and fully solved. The Republics, as they were called, of Carthage, of Greece, of Rome, and some others of the old world, were, in a republican sense, of but a limited character.

The right of suffrage was not enjoyed to its full extent. There were various despotic and aristocratic restraints, checks, and balances thrown around and interwoven in all their political institutions, incompatible with a free government of the people. Under the governments of the old world, there were no people who maintained longer their free institutions, such as they were, than did the Carthaginians. None were better balanced and secured with checks than were the political institutions of that Republic. Yet their constitutions, customs, and laws contained within themselves the seeds of destruction, and the principal of these were the restraints upon the freedom of the elective franchise and the circumscribed right of the people to hold offices. The possession of property constituted the qualifications in both cases.

The consequence was, that patriotism, talents and virtue were disregarded or overlooked, which was sufficient of itself to seduce and corrupt the whole community, and prostrate whatever national freedom they enjoyed. It was the abuse of the elective franchise, and the restraints thrown around it, that finally subverted the Government. It was the same restraints, and the same abuse, which enabled the overgrown nobles to oppress the public liberty of Athens, Syracuse, Corinth, Thebes, and overthrew Rome itself, under Scylla and Cæsar. Rome long struggled with the powers of wealth, bribery and corruption practised by the patricians, and those in power and those striving to obtain power. But at last, by reckless ambition, and regardless violation of that palladium of liberty, the elective franchise, she was overcome and sacrificed at their shrine. Her death struggle survived four hundred years. What must have been her strength in her vigor of health? Our gallant and brave ancestors, who founded this Government upon their own victories, gained on fields of blood, were not ignorant of the history of the world of man, and of the subversion and downfall of all the Republics that had ever existed before them. They were familiar with the melancholy tale that disclosed the fatal effects of a limited suffrage and the abuses of the elective franchise by the boundless and reckless ambition of those in power, and those in pursuit of power.

They established a free Government of the people with a trembling hand and fearful apprehensions. Hence the apostolic, paternal and patriotic care with which our political fabric is framed; hence the jealous care with which all its parts are guarded; and none were intended to be guarded with so much vigilance as that of suffrage, and the free exercise of the elective franchise—knowing, as they did, and as experience will prove, that the duration of the work of their hands, and the perpetuity of the human liberty they had purchased with their blood and toil, must depend upon the sacred and inviolate preservation of that franchise in its pristine purity. Sir, a due reverence for the Revolutionary spirit that walks (though unseen) amongst us—a reverence for the memory of the patriots of that Revolution which overthrew the crown, and broke the crosier that enslaved the body and imprisoned the soul—a proper regard to our own highest interests, and above all, that sacred obligation that rests upon us to transmit to those who are to come after us uncontaminated the boon which has been transmitted to us—imperiously demand that we should suffer no violence to that most sacred of all our institutions, the elective franchise. But, sir, in the face of these obligations, which we have no power to cancel at our own will, we have seen fearful and alarming innovations as well upon the domains of the Constitution as upon the freedom of the elective franchise. Sir, we have seen this Government shaken with earthquake violence, from its centre to its circumference, and our free institutions reel and totter like a drunken man, by a reckless disregard of the sanctity of the Constitution, and violating the freedom of the right of suffrage. Avarice, ambition, and a love of power—which in their nature are reckless as to every other interest except their own—have been the instruments by which all Republics that have gone before us have been prostrated and consigned to the dust.

Sir, at the formation of our Government, there was a party who denied to the people the integrity, intelligence, stability, and virtue necessary for self-government. Sir, such a denial is a slander upon the human family, and degrading to him who makes it; but such was the fact. And the same party have, from the commencement of our national career, to this time, been unsparing in their efforts to carry out in principle, what they had not the power to establish in practice, viz: anything but a Republican Government, free institutions, and equal rights. It was said by the same party, that all the Republics had been overthrown by the seditions of the people, and ours would share the same fate; and such would be the fate of every Government of the many. Not so, sir; they have all been overthrown by the ambition, avarice, and love of power of the few—for want of a sufficient portion of the control of Government in the hands of the many. Sir, that same aristocratic spirit which has ever characterzied a want of confidence in the virtue and intelligence of the people, and a disregard for their political rights has been boldly manifested in this contest, in the unexampled and desperate effort to secure seats in this Congress, to the members of Governor Pennington, and his Privy Council, to the exclusion of the members of the sovereign people of New Jersey.

Mr. Speaker, I am no advocate for capital punishment. I have been disposed to doubt the right of any Government, or any political human establishment or association, to inflict it. I have been induced to give much weight and character to that dixit of the Almighty, by the mouth of his prophet, that "vengeance is mine." But if there is any crime of which man is capable, for which death ought to be inflicted, it is that of treason against his Government; and if there is any grade or comparison in treason, it seems to me that a wilful and corrupt violation of the elective franchise is superlative treason. If there is any one crime against the Government involving a principle of treason more alarming and dangerous than another, it is such a violation. If there is any one crime of treason that more deserves the curse of God, and the universal execration of man, more than another, it is the treasonable crime of violating the purity of the elective franchise, and trampling in the dust the voice of a free people.

Mr. Speaker, since the organization of our Government there never has been so flagrant an abuse of the elective privilege presented for the consideration of this House, or any other legislative body. It is the right of this body to take such order as the extremity of the case demands. It is the duty of the House, as far as possible, to prevent the repetition of such a case hereafter. The workers of this base iniquity should receive the brand of infamy that should point them out to all living, as execrable outcasts, while they are permitted to linger out their degraded lives, and stamp their memory indelibly with infamy through all time to come, as an example to the reckless wretch who might so far forget his sacred obligations as to be disposed to perpetrate a like treason. Our duties to the injured, insulted, and outraged people of New Jersey, demand that we should take such an order. The obligations we owe to ourselves, in common with those we represent, and those who are to follow us, demand it. The Constitution, and the solemn oath we have taken to support that Constitution, and defend it inviolate, demand it; and, above all, the obligation of patriotism, religion, and morality, which we have made uncompromising by our approach to the throne of eternal justice and divine accountability, when we took the solemn oath, in the presence of God, and confirmed it with uplifted hands or the kiss of His holy word, binds us to take such order as shall forever again protect the hallowed cause of the elective franchise from the polluted footstep of the betrayer of human liberty, and corrupt and reckless demagogue. Let us, therefore, this time, divest our skirts of that party spirit which seems to have overshadowed the brightest prospects of our country, and swallowed in its vortex those religious, moral, and patriotic obligations, upon the sacred observance of which alone rest the duration of our Government and the stability of our free institutions, and with one voice and with one action meet the case, and dispose of it as the highest interest of our common country demands.

SPEECH OF MR. DROMGOOLE, OF VIRGINIA,

In the House of Representatives, December 14, 1839—On the New Jersey disputed election, in reply to Mr. SERGEANT, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. DROMGOOLE observed that he had not, at any preliminary stage of the proceedings on the subject of the New Jersey election, gone into the merits of the controversy, because he believed that the whole discussion heretofore had been premature, and could have no other effect than to prejudge the matter in dispute, and to forestall the opinions of the House and of the public, before the evidence was submitted to a regular and impartial examination. His opinion had been, from the first, that they ought to go into an investigation of this question of disputed right to seats in this Hall by a committee, who should make report of the facts and the evidence adduced in support of them. That then both parties—both sets of claimants should be permitted to appear at the bar, should be heard in defence and vindication of their respective claims—according to the language used in the British House of Commons, should deliver their cases, ore tenus; after which this House should solemnly and impartially exercise the power conferred by the Constitution of judging of the elections, returns, and qualifications. But gentlemen on the other side seemed desirous to jump over all inquiry, to reject from their view and their consideration all conflicting and adversary testimony, and arbitrarily restricting themselves to the commissions of the Governor of New Jersey, to decide that those who held them should take their seats as a matter of course, and without question. They were called upon to decide that these commissions were conclusive, as to the right of the gentlemen to take their seats, and that, therefore, the right to qualify and take seats cannot be controverted. And gentlemen had also urged, in all the previous discussions, the imperfect state of the organization of the House, as a reason why it could not enter into any examination affecting the validity of these commissions. It was boldly assumed that, although assembled here in our appropriate place of meeting, at the time prescribed by the Constitution and the law, and that although the House is to be composed of members chosen by the people of the several States, yet that any person holding a commission or return, in the form prescribed by the law of the State to be given to those elected by the people, may, of right, conclusive and unquestionable, take his seat, and participate in the organization; and that after, and not before the organization, may you inquire how this certificate or commission was obtained, and whether it has been truly given, according to the result of the election.

But gentlemen can no longer avail themselves of the difficulty arising from want of organization. We are, said Mr. D. organized; we have a Speaker to preside over our deliberations; we have taken the oath prescribed to us by the Constitution; and surely there would seem to be no obstacle to prevent us from making a full examination of all the evidence, and of deciding the case upon its merits. Although fully convinced that it was competent for the House to decide immediately, dispensing with the intervention of a committee, yet he believed that such a course would be premature, and not so well calculated to promote fairness and impartiality, as to await an examination into all the facts and evidence by a committee, and their report thereupon. With such impressions of the proper mode of action, Mr. D. said he would not then go into an examination of the whole question; but some of the propositions of the learned gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SERGEANT,] were, to his mind, so abhorrent to the principles of the Constitution, and so contrary to the current of precedents, that he felt constrained to meet them at the threshold. He understood that gentleman to maintain that he could only look to the State of New Jersey, in this instance, acting in its corporate or organic capacity. Now he utterly denied that the doctrines of the gentleman were in accordance with the Constitution, and he called upon him to look into that instrument itself to see what authority it gave for that assumption.

Before, however, going into an examination of this part of the gentleman's argument, he would premise a few remarks, in order that they might arrive at a better understanding of the subject. We often, said Mr. D. avoid much confusion, and reason with more precision, when we understand alike the terms which we use, and, in the course of debate, attach to them the same meaning. It was known to the Speaker, who, from his infancy, had been educated in the political school of the State Rights party, who had ever, with them, maintained that the States are parties to the Federal compact—that this term, "State," is used in three different senses. He would respectfully refer gentlemen to the celebrated report of Mr. Madison, made to the Legislature of Virginia, in explanation and vindication of the resolutions which had, at the previous session, been offered by John Taylor, of Caroline. The term "State," said Mr. D. sometimes meant the territory comprehended within certain geographical limits. We speak of the boundaries of a State, and we speak of going into Virginia or Maryland. It sometimes meant the whole machinery of the State Governments, through the agency of which the affairs of the State, or political community thus organized, were conducted and administered. It also meant the people composing the political communities within their respectively defined limits. The people, within the territorial limits, respectively, constitute an independent political community. In this sense, this political community is a sovereign State, and in this sense, each sovereign State is a party to the Federal compact. The term "State," therefore, was sometimes applied to territory; sometimes to the organized State Government, (and then we view it acting in its organic form,) and sometimes to the people, in their high and sovereign character. The State Governments, as such, the States in their organic forms, whatever they might have been under the articles of Confederation, are not parties to the compact, from which are derived all the powers of the Federal Government. The States of New Jersey, Virginia, and the other members of this Confederacy, in their sovereign capacity, the people, who inhabit certain defined territories, who compose free and independent communities, are parties to the Federal compact, which they, in the exercise of their sovereignty, adopted and ratified.* Do not tell me then [said Mr. D.) that we are opposed to State Rights, when we contend that the organic form of a State shall not be substituted for its real sovereignty; when we maintain that the operations of the machinery of the State Government shall not be employed to defeat or misrepresent the will of the sovereign people, in cases, in which this House, by a solemn compact, between all the parties, is constituted sole judge.

With these distinctions in view, he would respectfully invite the attention of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania to the identical language employed by the Constitution: "The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year." By whom, sir? By the States, acting as organic bodies—known to us only in the capacity of organic bodies? No, sir: but "by the people of the several States." And now, sir, take this provision of the Constitution in connection with the passage read by the gentleman, [Mr. SERGEANT:] "The number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each State shall have at least one Representative; and, until such enumeration shall be made, the State of New Hampshire shall be entitled to choose three, Massachusetts eight," &c. Here, then, it is said that the "States" shall choose Representatives; and in the passage which he (Mr. D.) had previously cited, it is declared that the members shall be chosen by the people of the several States. The term "State," therefore, is not used, as is contended by the gentleman, to denote a mere organic body; but the term "State" (in speaking of the representation to which it is entitled) means the people composing the political society, in their highest sovereign capacity—in that capacity in which the "State" became a member of the compact, and, as a member of the compact, under its terms and provisions, became entitled to its apportionment of representation. With respect to the Senate, the Constitution says "The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof," &c. Here (said Mr. D.) is shown the distinction between the two bodies. The House of Representatives is based upon the doctrine of popular representation—a direct and immediate representation of the people. This branch of the Legislature therefore constitutes a popular feature in the Federal Government, which, nevertheless, in its character, is mainly federative. But, in bestowing on it this feature of popular representation, the distinction of separate State sovereignties is still preserved, for the members are to be chosen "by the people of the several States;" thus, even in a direct popular representation, carefully excluding the idea of consolidation. He saw his venerable colleague (alluding to Mr. TALIAFERRO) smile; he hoped it was the smile of approbation, for, in former times, (said Mr. D.) he fully concurred in these great doctrines of the State Rights party.

In looking into the "returns" of the New Jersey elections, even if we should go behind the great seal, we shall be guilty neither of a violation of the Constitution, nor of the rights of the State of New Jersey; but, on the contrary, in contending for the right of the people to elect their Representatives, and in denying the power of the Governor, by virtue of commissions, even with the broad seal attached, to substitute in their stead those not "chosen," we are vindicating the rights of the State as a sovereign member of the Confederacy, and are carrying out the Federal compact in its fullest extent, and according to its true interpretation. We inquire, whom have the people elected to represent them—whom have they "chosen" as "members" of this House? and whether the persons, thus chosen as members, have been duly returned? And, in so doing, we commit no encroachment upon a sovereign State, but we exercise, on our part, a clear Constitutional power, to prevent its rights from becoming a sacrifice to the ignorance, mistakes, or frauds of returning officers. He should like to know (said Mr. D.) from the learned gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SERGEANT,) or from any other member, where it is that any authority can be found to sustain the assumption that the House of Representatives cannot go behind the commissions of the Governor of New Jersey with the great seal of State, in deciding upon the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members. He wholly denied that there was any such authority in the Constitution or laws, or in precedents found in parliamentary practice. He contended that the word "returns" was general in its import; that it embraced all the returns throughout the State, and carried with it every question properly connected with them. We have, said he, as much right to inquire into the returns of the votes of Millville and South Amboy, which were suppressed by the clerks, as into the commissions granted by the Governor. If gentlemen doubted this, he would cite for them abundant and satisfactory authority from precedents of this House. Mr. D. here referred to the case of Spalding and Meade, a case of contested election from the State of Georgia, decided in the first session of the ninth Congress. In this case, under the laws of the State of Georgia, the votes were required to be returned within a limited time. The votes of three entire counties were not returned within the time prescribed by law, and the Governor felt it to be his duty to sum up those actually returned, and to give the certificate of election to Cowles Meade, who had obtained a majority. The seat was contested by Thomas Spalding, who based his right upon the ground that it was the duty of the House to go back to the returns of the votes of Tatnall, Liberty, and Camden, which had not reached the Executive in time to be counted; that they were not precluded from so doing by the Governor's certificate, because it was not conclusive evidence, but prima facie only. The House maintained the right of Spalding, adjudged him the contested seat, because he had obtained a majority of all the votes given in the district, which fact was made to appear by procuring the returns or evidence of the state of the polls in the omitted counties. The House therefore decided that they were not restricted to the final return of the Governor, but that, under the power to judge of the "returns," they had jurisdiction of the whole subject of returns, the primary and intermediate returns as well as the ultimate. All the returns are links in the same chain; they are component parts of the whole. The laws of New Jersey require "returns" to be made from the different precincts to the county clerks. They require the county clerks to make "returns" of the aggregate vote of each county; and they require the Governor to sum up all the "returns," and to grant "commissions" of election to the persons having the majority of the whole number of votes. The House, as we have seen, gave Spalding the seat, counting the votes held back, and holding that it was their right and duty to do so, and that it was immaterial whether the omission of the State authorities was caused by the act of God, or was the result of fraud, accident, or any thing else.

In conformity with this precedent, this House will go back and look into all the "returns" from the precincts, trace them through the county "returns" into the Executive chamber, and inquire if all have been transmitted, if they have been correctly summed up, and if those having, in fact, received a majority of votes, have also received the Governor's commission.

Mr. D. also referred to the case of David Bard of Pennsylvania, decided in the first session of the Fourth Congress. It does not appear that his seat was contested; but there was an investigation into the facts of the case. The judges of elections failed to meet and make their return in November, as required by law; but they did meet in May following and make return of Bard; "held that this irregularity did not vitiate the election or return;" and the committee state, "that, in consequence of the informality of the said return, it being the 1st May, instead of the 15th November, the committee have called for and obtained the several county returns, on which the district return was founded, and have made an estimate of the votes, as they appear from those returns." According to the estimate made from those primary returns, it appeared that David Bard had the greatest number of votes; and the House sustained the report of the committee, declaring that he was entitled to his seat. Here it was decided that the failure to make return in due time does not affect the right to a seat; and that resort may be had to the primary returns to ascertain the fact of election.

Mr. D. next referred to the case of John Richards of Pennsylvania, which also occurred in the first session of the Fourth Congress. Amongst other things, it was settled in this case that "the returns of votes, though not made within the time required by the State law, are not on that account to be rejected, provided the opportunity has been allowed the State authorities to act upon them." Now, sir, (said Mr. D) according to this case, if the returns of the votes given at Millville and South Amboy ever reached the Executive of New Jersey before the time at which he was required to cast up the votes and issue his commissions, although after the time prescribed to the county officers to make return, they "ought to have been received and estimated with the other returns." And if the Governor has failed thus to receive and estimate votes, and in consequence of such failure or omission, refuses or neglects to grant a certificate to those who, by such estimate, would have been entitled to it, their rights, according to the principles of the case just cited, suffer no prejudice.

*Since the delivery of the above remarks, recourse has been had to Mr. Madison's Report, and an extract is here subjoined containing the commentary upon that part of Taylor's third resolution which expresses that the States are parties to the Constitution or compact. "The other position involved in this branch of the resolution, namely, 'that the States are parties to the Constitution or compact,' is, in the judgment of the committee, equally free from objection. It is indeed true, that the term 'States' is sometimes used in a vague sense, and sometimes in different senses, according to the subject to which it is applied. Thus, it sometimes means the separate sections of territory occupied by the political societies within each; sometimes the particular governments, established by those societies; sometimes those societies, as organized into those particular governments; and lastly, it means the people composing those political societies, in their highest sovereign capacity. Although it might be wished that the perfection of language admitted less diversity in the signification of the same words, yet little inconvenience is produced by it, where the true sense can be collected with certainty from the different applications. In the present instance, whatever different construction of the term 'States' in the resolution may have been entertained, all will at least concur in that last mentioned; because, in that sense, the Constitution was submitted to the 'States;' in that sense the 'States' ratified it; and in that sense of the term 'States,' they are consequently parties to the compact from which the powers of the Federal Government result."

Mr. D. also referred to the case of Mallory and Merrill, which occurred in the first session of the Sixteenth Congress. And in that case, amongst other matters, it was settled that "votes fairly given to a party, may be counted in his favor, though they have never been returned to the proper State authorities, the default of a return not being chargeable upon such party."

Mr. D said that he took no pleasure in speaking harshly of the Governor of a sovereign State; that he would forbear any minute examination of the duties or conduct of Governor Pennington; and that he should refrain from all censorious comment. He should admit, for the sake of argument—and gentlemen, in argument, were welcome to make the most of this admission—that the Governor, under the law of New Jersey, could not have acted otherwise, and that he was constrained to give the commissions upon an estimate made of the returns, excluding the votes of Millville and South Amboy. But he would emphatically ask, if it was not both the right and duty of this House to count the votes so excluded? There were, he supposed, at least forty cases in which it had been decided, that all the returns might be examined, and that votes regularly taken at the time, place, and in the manner prescribed by law, ought to be estimated here, although not returned in time by the State officers, or indeed not returned at all. And was it ever seriously maintained that this exercise of the power of judging of the returns was disrespectful to the States, and an encroachment upon their sovereignty? Why, the House, in such cases, interposes its constitutional power for the purpose of giving efficacy to the laws of the State and of preventing them from being disregarded. The Constitution declares that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may, at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

Now, it is readily conceded, that Congress, not having made or altered the regulations for choosing Representatives, this House is bound to observe whatever statutes may have been enacted in the several States as to the time, the places, and the manner of holding elections for Representatives. When the qualified voters have, at the times and places prescribed by law, attended and given in their votes, in the manner prescribed by law, you have then reached the point at which State legislation, in reference to elections, ceases to be absolutely binding, when it loses its character of conclusive obligation.

After the votes have been thus received according to the laws of the State, the election is completed; and it remains to ascertain the result, to learn who has been, in fact, elected. Here, then, commences the unrestricted Constitutional power of the House "to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members"—a power conferred by solemn compact between the several States, to be exercised for the purpose of preserving inviolate the right of the people of each State to choose members every second year, having the qualifications required by the Constitution. The regulations of the States in reference to returns are not enjoined by the Constitution, but are voluntary directions, on their part, for the transmission of information to this House. This House will pay a voluntary, a cheerful respect, to such regulations; and will not permit a partial or entire failure to comply with them, by State officers, to defeat an election.

It was perfectly competent for this House, said Mr. D. in judging of the "returns," to examine all the returns—all the "returns" of officers holding elections—to compare them together—to sum up and estimate all the various "returns" embraced in the election—to inquire if the State officers have accurately summed up and estimated these various returns, and whether the ultimate certificate or return or commission conforms to the very fact, to the result as ascertained and derived from a careful examination of the votes received and counted at the various places, at the prescribed time, and in the manner prescribed for holding elections, by persons duly authorized.

Sir, said Mr. D. I think I have succeeded in showing that it is the right and duty of this House, under its power to judge of "returns," to examine and decide whether these certificates or commissions of the Governor, with the accompanying broad seal, conformed to the fact, as disclosed by an accurate and full estimate and addition of the "returns" made by officers holding the elections at the time, in the place, and in the manner prescribed by law. If so, then have I shown that it is not conclusive and sufficient that these certificates or commissions, with broad seals attached, should be merely in the form prescribed by law, "letter for letter, and comma for comma," but it is requisite, also, that they should embody the whole truth—the entire result of all the "returns" of all the votes received and counted by proper officers.

If, from the act of God, from the fraud, negligence, or mistake of State officers; if, from any cause, this ultimate certificate or commission does not coincide with the result of all the returns of all the votes received and counted according to law, then may we impeach it, not for want of form, not for failing to agree, "letter for letter, and comma for comma," with the requisite form, but for want of verity, for a failure to conform with the fact apparent from an accurate aggregation of all the votes duly received and counted. If the laws of New Jersey have not been observed by her own functionaries; if all the votes have not been returned by the proper officers within the time prescribed by law; if the Governor, entrusted with and required to procure all the returns of all the votes, has failed or neglected to do his duty, or has innocently misconceived it, or has been prevented by defect of law, then his commission is a misrepresentation of the fact, is not in accordance with all the laws of New Jersey, and may be fairly set aside by this House, the judge of the "returns," may be declared defective and insufficient, or may be amended at the pleasure of this supervising and controlling tribunal.

Mr. D. next adverted to the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SERGEANT,] that this commission, with the broad seal, was "conclusive" evidence of the right to take a seat on this floor. He would be glad to know where that gentleman found the authority that these commissions of the Governor of New Jersey were conclusive as to the right of those persons receiving and bringing them here to take their seats without further question.

Where was the precedent for it? All the decisions of this House are against it. In the case of Spalding and Mead, to which reference had been before made, it was expressly decided that "the returns from the State authorities are prima facie evidence only of an election, and are not conclusive upon the House." Mr. D. said he would not fatigue the House by reading the numerous cases of contested elections, in which either the same principle was decided, or distinctly recognized as the basis of the procedure. It must necessarily be so; for if the "return" be conclusive, the House is estopped from exercising its constitutional power of judging, and that provision of the Constitution becomes a dead letter. In vain is it urged that this prima facie evidence of an election confers a conclusive right to take the seat. The right to take and hold a seat on this floor, depends upon the fact of having been duly chosen; it is consequent upon election, and therefore must necessarily be affected to the same extent and in the same degree by the same species of evidence? Who ever heard (said Mr. D.) that mere prima facie evidence of a claim gave a conclusive and indisputable right to the thing claimed? He deemed it unnecessary to attempt the refutation of such an absurdity.

Mr. D. said he would not, at that time, pretend to give an exact definition of the phrase "prima facie evidence;" he had not very recently consulted the law books. He was grossly mistaken, however, if it meant any thing else but evidence at the first blush, on its first appearance or introduction; and was good only in the absence of other testimony, sufficient to controvert and overthrow it.

If there be no opposing testimony, then prima facie evidence is sufficient; it prevails as a matter of course, and without controversy. But when adversary testimony is introduced, this prima facie evidence cannot be conclusive of right, until both shall have been considered and weighed, and decision made by the competent tribunal. In the absence of all conflicting testimony, or upon decision of its insufficiency to counteract and defeat, then this prima facie evidence, in the language employed by some of the writers on this subject, "obtains a conclusive quality." You cannot, then, when there is clear, strong, impartial testimony staring you in the face, disregard it altogether, and conclude that this prima facie evidence is sufficient, without violating every principle of justice, as well as the Constitution of the United States. This House is the judge of the matter in dispute; this matter in dispute is the right to seats here. On one side prima facie evidence is introduced—on the other side, it is proposed to rebut it by counter evidence. Those who offer the counter evidence, cannot be concluded from an examination into its sufficiency, or from a hearing of their case, without a violation of our duty to judge, without a palpable departure from the long established rules of law and evidence, and without a gross act of injustice to one set of claimants.

One word, said Mr. D. in reference to the certificate of the Secretary of State of New Jersey. In two instances, in the case of Spalding and Meade, was the certificate of the Secretary of State of Georgia received as good and sufficient evidence in relation to the election returns received and preserved in his office. He believed that this was the first time that it had ever been maintained that the official certificate and seal of an office of record was not sufficient evidence touching matters on record in said office. If there be no express statute directing such certificate, or prescribing its form, yet he thought, upon general principles, that it resulted, ex virtute officii, that the formal certificate of the officer, with his known and established seal, was evidence sufficient to prove the existence of records in his office, or of documents and papers on file.

The very learned gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SERGEANT] attempted to prove that these five gentlemen holding the Governor's commission were now actual members of this House, and had been so for a long time before the commencement of this session. Now he (Mr. D.) could not understand that there was any thing in the Constitution or laws to justify this position. Did he understand the argument of the gentleman to be, that, because these five New Jersey gentlemen, on their way here, might be discharged from arrest, under color of their privilege, that, therefore, they were members? The judge might decide, and very properly decide, that these five gentlemen were "going" to Washington to attend the session of Congress as members, and that they therefore came within the designation of persons privileged from arrest. Where did the gentleman find that the decision of a judge, State or Federal, upon a question of privilege, was proof of membership in this body? Mr. D. utterly denied that the decision of the Chief Justice himself, in connection with all his associates, was any, the slightest authority, to bind or influence this House in deciding questions of membership. This House would not permit the Judiciary, were that department so inclined, to wrest from it indirectly its own constitutional power to decide the question of membership. Why, sir, the decision of a judge granting a discharge from arrest, upon the ground of privilege, is a judgment inter alios; and, according to the well known principles of law, such a decision could not be even read as evidence upon this trial of contest.

But, said Mr. D. I deny that actual membership of this body does or can commence before the time of assembling and forming. He then referred the House to the case of Hammond and Herrick, from the State of Ohio. This case was decided at the first session of the Fifteenth Congress. Samuel Herrick, who was the sitting member, was elected to Congress in October, 1816, being then in commission as district attorney of the United States; on the 29th November, 1817, he resigned his office of district attorney, and on the 1st day of December following, took his seat in Congress. The Fourteenth Congress expired on the 4th March, 1817. On the 8th day of December, 1817, a memorial was received from Charles Hammond, of the same State, contesting the right of Herrick to be a member of the House, in consequence of having held the said commission after the 4th March, 1817; which memorial was referred to the Committee of Privileges and Elections. Mr. Hammond ranks, and deservedly, too, among the ablest jurists of the country, and had presented the question in a strong and forcible point of view; and it was understood that the rights of several other members to seats would be affected by the decision in this case. On the 10th of December, Mr. Forsyth, then a member from Georgia, now Secretary of State, offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be instructed to inquire and report what persons, elected to serve in the House of Representatives, have accepted or held offices under the Government of the United States since the 4th day of March, 1817; and how far their right to a seat in this House is affected by it."

It is a constitutional provision that "no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office." It was decided that Herrick "was not rendered incapable of being a member of the House, by reason of his having held the said office after the 4th March, and until 29th November, 1817." And so decided, because it was held that his membership did not commence on 4th March, immediately, and at the instant of the expiration of the 14th Congress, but commenced with the session of the 15th Congress. He would particularly refer gentlemen to the very able report made in that case by Mr. TAYLOR of New York. He presumed it was JOHN W. TAYLOR, for some time a distinguished member, and well known to the country as a learned and able man.

In connection with this idea, that a person can be an actual member of this House, "for a long time" before it meets, and before he attends, and is received and recognized as such, the gentleman maintains that there is no interregnum in the House of Representatives, that it is a perpetual body—and therefore he would seem to suppose that the Representatives elect of each Congress succeed each other as members of a corporation. This he, Mr. D. denied. One of the first distinctions he had learned was that the Senate was so organized and constituted as to preserve its existence perpetually; but that the House of Representatives had a limited existence; was restricted to a particular period, which it was not permitted by the Constitution to survive. On the 4th of March every second year the term of all the members expires, and in point of fact absolutely ceases to exist, notwithstanding any contrary theory which may be entertained. If the Twenty-fifth Congress had never met—if the House of Representatives had never met, or, indeed, had never been elected from 4th March 1837 to the 4th March 1839—still the present House of Representatives would be perfect in its existence and in its functions. Every second year there is, as every body knows, an entire new House of Representatives, who, together with the Senate, which has remained in existence, constitute and commence a new Congress. Members are to be chosen every second year by the people of the several States. Suppose all the States, as many do, were not to choose their Representatives until after the lapse of several months succeeding the termination of a Congress, what then becomes of your perpetual succession of membership without intervention of time, without interregnum? Mr. D. declared that he no more believed in the continuous and unbroken existence of the House of Representatives, than he did in the unbroken succession of the Popes from Saint Peter down to the present time.

Mr. D. said, gentlemen expressed great veneration for State authorities, and seemed to manifest great fear of going into conflict with State laws. He had before shown that the members do not represent the State as a mere organized government, but that they represent the people directly. When Representatives have been "chosen" according to the Constitution and laws, it is our duty solemnly to interpose our right of judgment to give efficacy to the popular choice, and to protect it from the frauds or blunders of State officers, and even from defective and unconstitutional State legislation. Here Mr. D. quoted the case of Barney and McCreery, which occurred at the first session of the Tenth Congress. The Legislature of Maryland enacted, in 1802, that Baltimore town and county should constitute the fifth Congressional district, and should elect two members, one of which shall be a resident of Baltimore county, and the other a resident of Baltimore city. Nicholas P. Moore, a resident of the county, was elected by a large majority. William McCreery, also a resident of the county, obtained the next highest vote. Joshua Barney, a resident of the city, had the next highest vote, and contested the election of McCreery for want of residence, in conformity with the law of Maryland. It was held that the Legislature of Maryland could not superadd qualifications to those required by the Constitution, and the House interposed its unrestricted power of judging of the qualifications of its members; sustained the right of the people to elect McCreery, in the face of the law of Maryland, and protected that choice against the unconstitutional enactment. It is better, sir, when it unfortunately becomes unavoidably necessary, to go into conflict with a State law, or with State authority, than to concur with them in a conflict with the Constitution, and with popular rights. If, as gentlemen contend, these certificates and seals are conclusive of the right of those who hold them, then the question of the right to a seat is settled by the form of a return prescribed by law, and the House is precluded from judging of the elections and returns, as it is solely empowered to do. Surely gentlemen perceive the absurdity to which their principles conduct them. If the doctrine of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SERGEANT.] as to the conclusive and unimpeachable character of the Governor's certificate, be a correct exponent of his opinions of State Rights, then it would seem that he maintains a species of nullification, which Mr. D. presumed could hardly obtain the sanction of his State Rights friends. The Nullification party, as he understood, (appealing to Mr. PICKENS, of South Carolina,) contended for the interposition of the States' sovereignty to arrest an unconstitutional enactment of Congress; but this nullification of a provision of the Constitution by a State enactment, as the gentleman would now have it, is going much farther than any Nullifier, of whom he had ever heard, was disposed to go. Mr. D. flattered hims If that, if true to their own principles, we should have the co-operation of all the State Rights men in preserving the constitutional powers of this House, and the constitutional rights of the people of a sovereign State from all Legislative or Executive infringement. Such a course would be in accordance with their professed doctrines, and Mr. D. said he should insist upon holding them to it.

Gentlemen had asserted and maintained that some persons must qualify and take their seats as members from the State of New Jersey, before the House can decide this controversy. Suppose this position be granted, that there must be a qualification interim, does not the question still remain for decision, who shall be permitted thus to qualify? Shall those holding the Governor's commission have this privilege, to the exclusion of those who, from an estimate of all the returns appear to have a majority of the votes received by the proper officers, and must, therefore, according to established principles, be presumed to have been fairly and legally chosen until the contrary shall be made to appear in due course of investigation?

I should like, said Mr. D. for gentlemen to produce some authority for this assumption, that there must necessarily be a qualification of some body, before there can be a decision properly made. I should like to know when or where it has been decided that a member must take his seat before it can be decided whether he is entitled to take it. He said he would lay it down as a rule of action, that when the question of a right to take his seat had been raised and presented to the House before qualification, it had been settled before qualification. He had not been able to find a single instance of a departure from this course in either House of Congress.

He referred to the case of Benjamin Edwards, of Maryland, wich occured in the second session of the Third Congress. It does not appear that his seat was regularly contested upon the ground of an adversary claim. A question was raised as to the sufficiency of the proof of Mr. Edwards's election. After debate, the letters on which Mr. E. relied to sustain his claim, were referred to a committee. The committee made an adverse report. Pending the subject, the Speaker informed the House that he had received a letter from the Governor of Maryland, enclosing the regular certificate of Mr. E's election. This certificate was signed by the Governor of Maryland, and under the seal of the State. A question again arose, whether the claimant should be permitted to qualify. Qualification was still denied; and the certificate, with the broad seal, was referred to the committee to whom their previous report was recommitted. Afterwards, the committee reported a resolution in favor of Edwards, in which the House concurred; and then "Mr. Edwards was qualified, and took his seat in the House." Now if, without an adverse claim, a question being raised before qualification, the House will insist to decide it before qualification, for much stronger reasons ought this course to be adopted in cases of contest, the question being raised and presented to the House before the qualification of either party.

Mr. D. next introduced the case of John Richards, of Pennsylvania, which occurred in the first session of the Fourth Congress. James Morris and John Richards had been the candidates for election in the district composed of the counties of Bucks, Northampton, and Montgomery. "The circumstances of this election were such as to make it doubtful to the mind of the Governor whether either party was duly elected, and he appears, therefore, to have declined deciding upon the legality of said election." Mr. Morris dying before the meeting of Congress, of course never appeared to claim the seat. On the 10th December, 1795, Richards, by memorial, claimed the seat. A committee reported, and, after debate, their report was recommitted. On the 13th January, 1796, they made a further report. After debate, it was resolved, on the 18th January, 1796, "that the said John Richards was entitled to his seat in the House;" and he was admitted accordingly. Here qualification was withheld, and the district suffered to be unrepresented from the 10th December until the 18th January following.

In this case, there was an example of delicacy and moderation, on the part of the Governor of Pennsylvania, which well deserved the imitation of the Governor of New Jersey. The latter must have known that he had not summed up all the votes which had been cast in the election, and, without a performance of this requisition, how could he and his council undertake to declare who had the majority and were, consequently, elected? If it were impossible for him to comply with this part of his duty, then he would have stood excused and justified, before an impartial public, for giving the commission to neither, not knowing who would be entitled to it, if all the votes had been summed up. Nor would he, by such forbearance, have done injustice or prejudice to the claims of either party. Both would have the same rights they now possess of claiming to qualify and take seats—upon which claims this House only can decide—and (said Mr. D.) I repeat that this book (holding up the volume of the reports of contested elections) is full of cases in which the House has counted the votes, either when the authorities of the State refused to count them, or when they were returned too late to be counted under the State laws. Mr. D. next referred to the case of Willoughby and Smith, from the State of New York, which occurred in the first session of the Fourteenth Congress. Willoughby had been, in fact, elected; "but, by reason of a clerical error of certain inspectors, in returning certificates of votes to the office of the county clerk, Gen. Smith was declared duly elected, and a certificate of election was accordingly delivered to him." From the general tenor of the argument in the present case, it would have been necessary for Smith to have qualified before his right to the seat could be regularly contested, because he held the regular return in the form prescribed by the laws of the State of New York. But, sir, Smith never claimed the seat—his right to a seat, by virtue of a regular and formal return, never attached—his certificate never had the force of a judgment operating until it had been superseded or overruled by some competent authority. According to the present doctrines, Willoughby, although certainly elected, could never have claimed the seat until Smith had qualified and the regular certificate had thereby spent its force. It does not appear, from the report, that Smith ever informed the House that he had relinquished his claim under the certificate; still, on the ninth day after the commencement of the session, without appearance and without a hearing, he was declared not entitled to the seat, and Willoughby was declared entitled to a seat; whereupon the said Willoughby appeared and took his seat.

Mr. D. said that he had briefly, and in a desultory manner, touched on the principles and questions, which he thought involved in this case, not for the purpose of endeavoring, at this time, to produce any decided impression in favor of either party, or with a view of declaring, on his part, any fixed and unalterable opinion as to the result of the contest; but for the object of persuading the House to deliberate, and not to resolve, with inconsiderate, he would not say, indecent haste, that they would not even look into the important testimony impeaching these commissions, and of impressing on their sense of justice the propriety of basing their decision upon a full knowledge of all the evidence belonging to the case. He was for going regularly into the examination, and for approaching it in a tangible form. He was for permitting both parties to be heard in defence of their respective claims, before the House passed judgment upon them.

Believing this to be the course required, both by expediency and justice, he would not, at this stage of the case, even if his mind had strong convictions in favor of either party, vote for the right to take seats; for it would not have the appearance of fair and equal justice to both; but would look like prejudging the matter, before ascertaining all the facts connected with the returns. He hoped, therefore, that it would be the pleasure of the House to have the case fairly brought before them, and then, having heard both parties, would proceed, if necessary, to discuss it calmly and deliberately, and to decide it impartially, with a full understanding of its merits.

Mr D. said, he thought that the examination should be had, in the first instance, through the medium of a committee, both for the sake of convenience, and because all the evidence could be more distinctly, and with better arrangement, brought to the view of the members. This would be in conformity with the precedent, adopted, after much debate, in the famous case of Letcher and Moore. In that case, both parties appeared in the House, and claimed to qualify; the House referred the matter to a committee, and, until that committee should report, "Resolved, that neither Thomas P. Moore nor Robert P. Letcher shall be qualified as the member from said district." Here the House distinctly and unequivocally exerted the power of refusing to permit either party to qualify until the matter had been examined by a committee. It is said, however, that this resolution was the result of an agreement between the parties; but it was expressly disclaimed in debate that it was placed upon the ground of confirming a compact between the parties. No agreement between the pasties, as every body will admit, could confer a power on the House which it did not possess under the Constitution. He believed that, without a single exception, where gentlemen present themselves to qualify, and objection is made, the matter is referred to a committee, who report upon the matter referred before further action by the House. In the Senate, he believed, it had been the invariable practice. This book of reports abounds with such cases; and he felt quite confident that gentlemen, with all their industry and research, and all their ingenuity in the application of cases, would not be able to find a single one of a contrary character. He found cases where the Governors of States had commissioned members of the Senate in due and regular form, where there was not even a contest for the seat, but a question being made by some member, they were not permitted to qualify before their credentials had been referred to a committee. None of the cases of persons holding the regular credentials, having qualified of course, and subsequently having their seats contested, are in point. In those cases, no question is made and presented to the House before qualification, and therein consists the distinction and dissimilarity. It is again readily admitted, that persons bringing the prima facie evidence of a regular return, if no question be raised, and no conflicting testimony be brought to the notice of the House, are permitted to qualify as a matter of course; but it is still maintained, that where objection is made, and the question of right raised before qualification, that it is the invariable practice for the qualification to await the decision.

Mr. D. here introduced the case of Mr. Lanman, in the Senate of the United States, in March, 1825, by which it appears that objection being made to Mr. Lanman's credentials, he was not permitted to qualify, but the matter was referred to a committee.

Mr. WISE here inquired what were the objections to Mr. Lanman's credentials.

Mr. DROMGOOLE. Not that they were informal; not that they were not signed by the Governor; not that they were not accompanied with the broad seal of a sovereign State; but that the Governor had no legal or constitutional right to grant them. In the case of Mr. Lanman, a motion was made that he be permitted to qualify, which was rejected. The credentials were referred. A debate arose, not only on the proper mode of proceeding, but on the rights of Mr. Lanman, under his commission, with the broad seal, previous to a decision, "by which it appeared to be the sense of the Senate that Mr. L's seat was vacant until the pending question should be decided in his favor." Mr. Lanman, by resolution, was permitted to be heard at the bar of the Senate, on the question of his right to a seat. The decision was adverse to his claim.

There was, he said, a long list of cases of individuals appointed and commissioned by Governors, in some of which, no question being raised, qualification was permitted as a matter of course—in others, questions being raised, no qualification was permitted, until they were decided—and the decisions were sometimes for and sometimes against the claimant. He would not consume time by a recital of all of them, but would conclude this array of authority and precedent by quoting the case of Stanly Griswold, from Ohio. He appeared on the 9th June, 1809; his credentials were referred to the Committee of Elections; and on the 15th June, the committee having reported favorably, he was admitted to his seat. These are cases produced from the Senate, in which the Governor is not made a mere returning officer, but in which he had the power of appointment or election, and the constitutional right to grant commissions; and yet these commissions, although unexceptionable in form, have never been regarded conclusive of the right to qualify and take a seat.

Mr. D. said, that if these doctrines, for which gentlemen contend, that certificates in due form, signed by the proper officer, no matter how obtained, will confer a conclusive right to a seat, should prevail, you will strike a fatal blow at the freedom of elections and the purity of Representative Government. It is the conviction of the people, that, by the invention of Representative Government, and by the choice of Representatives for themselves, by the exercise of the elective franchise, they can virtually accomplish the objects of self government, which renders them happy and contented. It is the firm belief, that through the agency of election and representation the Democratic principle may be carried out; that through them the popular voice may direct the legislation of the country; that through them those rights are secured and enjoyed which pertain to them in their character of sovereignty, and which, but for our free institutions, could only be exercised in primary assemblies; it is this belief which ensures attachment to the Government, induces a willing submission to the laws of the country, and constitutes a strong security for the peace and good order of the great body of the citizens.

But, said Mr. D. if you establish the doctrine that the credentials given by the State authorities, no matter how fraudulent, no matter how much at variance with the will of the people of the States, as expressed in their elections legally and constitutionally made, shall nevertheless conclusively prevail, you convert the elective franchise into a mockery, you inflict a vital stab upon the sacred principles of free Government, and you substantially defeat that glorious system of representation, which renders Democracy lovely and practicable. Will you expect patient acquiescence under such a system of thwarting the public will? Can tame submission be expected to a wilful and wanton violation of the most inestimable rights? And if a spirit of resistance against official impositions shall be awakened, and if, in its progress, seeking redress for injuries inflicted, and panting for the recovery of lost privileges, it shall prompt the people to turbulent impatience, or seditious deportment, on whom, I ask, will the sin be justly chargeable?

Mr. D. in conclusion, denied that requiring the claimants from New Jersey to wait until the House could examine the credentials, and other testimony, and decide understandingly who had been chosen, was disfranchising that State. A necessary and unavoidable delay in making a decision, certainly can never be construed into a denial of justice to individuals, or a disfranchisement of a State. If her members present credentials, which are impeached upon substantial grounds, and not upon slight and frivolous pretexts, if the returns of elections have been partially suppressed, or imperfectly reported, it is the fault of her officers—it is the misfortune of the people of New Jersey; but still this House must exercise the power vested in it by the Constitution over the controversy, although some time must necessarily be consumed in the investigation, and some delay consequently ensue. But is not delay preferable to an erroneous decision; to the admission of those who, upon inquiry, may be found not entitled to hold the seats? If (said Mr. D.) you decide that we must, ex necessitate rei, admit the gentlemen holding commissions, and it shall afterwards turn out that they are not entitled—that they have not been "chosen" members—that New Jersey has been falsely represented—that votes have been given in repugnance, and not in obedience, to her will—that through their agency laws have been passed detrimental to other States of the Union—he would ask, how could you atone to New Jersey, and to the other injured States, for the wrongs inflicted on them? You will have perpetrated irreparable mischief. Is it not the part of wisdom, as well as of safety, to let all these gentlemen wait, until, after a fair, calm, and impartial examination, the House can satisfactorily decide upon their claims? He would indulge the hope that, if the House were disposed, of which he would not doubt, to do equal justice to both parties, to New Jersey, and to the rest of the Union, they would not decide upon this matter with such inconsiderate haste, as to disregard all the evidence, and to overlook the important principles at issue.

NOTE.—The case of Spalding and Meade, is of such frequent reference, and is deemed in many particulars so applicable to the present case, that it has been considered, by the author of the foregoing remarks, not inappropriate to append to them the entire able and conclusive argument, by which the proceedings of the House in said case was defended and sustained.

The friends of the report remarked that the power of the House on this subject, was vested by that part of the Constitution which declares that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members;" and that this power was distinct from that which gave ultimately to the Legislature, in case they saw fit to exercise it, the power of determining the time, place, and manner of holding the elections. The words "judging of returns," were comprehensive, unrestricted and inclusive of every step incidental to making returns. The power could not be confined to the mere judging of the authenticity of the certificate of the returning officer, as that would be nugatory. It must likewise include the manner in which the votes were counted in districts; the manner in which they were transmitted; the place appointed for receiving them; and the ascertaining their aggregate number. It had been truly said that where the business of election ceases, that of the returns begins; which, therefore, must be considered as embracing every thing, after the votes were given. As soon as an election terminates, the candidate is elected; the only thing remaining is to ascertain the result, and this is done by the returns made. What, then, is the right of this House to judge? According to gentlemen, they have not a right to judge of the certificate of the officers of Georgia; they have not a right to judge how the votes are transmitted; but of all this the Governor is to judge, under the law of Georgia. But such a law would be a mere nullity, as it would be in direct opposition to the words of the Constitution, which give to this House the right of judging of the returns of its members. The fact was, that the law of Georgia could only be considered as constituting the Governor the organ of information to this House, which is the only tribunal to which the returns can ultimately be made. So considering the subject, there was no reason for the remark that the principle contained in the report went to set aside the law of Georgia. Should the power of the House, in this case, be denied, it would prevent us from investigating any case, however characterized by fraud, and would prostrate at the feet of an Executive officer the power so guardedly bestowed on each House. It is inquired whether we will set aside the law of Georgia, by the decision we are about to make; but it does not follow that the adoption of the report will have this effect.

The law of Georgia says that the Governor shall count the votes received at a certain day; but it does not say that the House shall not count those received afterwards. We, in fact, then, carry into effect the law of Georgia as far as it goes, and only in case of a failure supply the deficiency. Could there be a doubt of the principle assumed in the report, it would be removed by a denial of it, giving the power to any petty officer of the State by suppressing the votes to deprive the member legally elected of his seat. Would this be a just principle? Is it not our principle, that a majority shall govern? And is it not strange to say that a State shall have the right of violating such a principle? With regard to a return it might imply two things, the original certificate of the presiding officer in each election district and the general certificate of the whole election, the several parts of which were held in different places. It was necessary that these several certificates should be examined by some general authority.

As a matter, therefore, of necessity, some authority must reside in the States to count up the whole number of votes and to certify the persons elected. This power was vested in different ways in the several States; whoever exercised it, could be considered only as the certifying officer, whose certificate was not a decision, but simply a return, subject to the control of this House, which is made, by the Constitution, the judge of it. The Constitution says, the House are to judge of the returns. Can those returns, therefore, be conclusive, and binding upon the House? If so, the power of judging is altogether nugatory. If we cannot go out of the returns, and judge of any thing not in them, we cannot be said to possess any power over them. But the words of the Constitution are precise, giving the unrestricted power to judge. The House, then, may receive other evidence to satisfy them, than that founded on the face of the returns, and on such evidence may either allow that which is not in them, or disallow that which is. A case has been put of votes received in contravention of a State law, after the time fixed for receiving them, (see the case of David Bard of Pennsylvania,) and it has been said that these votes ought not to be received. Why? Because the time for holding elections being expressly vested in the State Legislature, in the first instance, and Congress not having changed the prescribed time, the State regulation must prevail. But let the case be pursued further: suppose such votes are not only received, but included in returns made to the Governor; he is not to judge of the legality of the votes given; the State law only directs him to count up the votes returned; whether they ought or ought not to be received, he cannot judge; of this, the House is the judge. He cannot receive evidence out of the returns; he, therefore counts up the votes, proclaims the person having the highest number, and the returns are forwarded to this body. They are in due form; but votes appear to be admitted, which, by the law of Georgia, ought not to have been admitted. Is the House concluded by this return? Are they not, on the contrary, empowered to go out of it, and receive evidence of the fact, that such improper votes were admitted? None will deny it. Further, suppose the presiding officer to have refused votes offered in time; suppose he had refused all the votes given for a candidate in several counties, the Governer could not pay any attention to these votes, for his certificate must be founded exclusively on the votes returned to him; he would be obliged, therefore, to certify as duly elected the person having the highest number of such votes, although it might be proved that the suppressed votes, if counted, would have given the highest number to another candidate. Could not the House, in this case, go out of the returns of the Governor, and allow the votes fairly given to be counted? Is the election to be effected by such omission or neglect? Clearly not. In the present case, the votes in question, according to the law of Georgia, were lawfully given, and ought to have been returned. Had that law been observed, they would have been returned. In one respect only was there a neglect of it. Can that, then, be said to be a violation of the law of Georgia, which consists in giving effect to its provisions where they have failed to be observed. The great principle in judging of elections ought to be, that the will of the people, fairly expressed, shall govern. And that construction of the Constitution and laws of the United States ought to prevail, which consists in giving effect to good votes, rather than destroying them. This is the principle of the report.

The adoption of a hostile principle would be to sacrifice the substance of election to its mere shadow. The suggestion that the principle of the report is calculated to alarm the jealousy of the States, is ideal. The judging of the election of members is a joint authority, residing in the States in the first instance, and ultimately in this House. If the controlling power does not reside here, it resides nowhere; there is a blank in the Government. It cannot reside in Georgia, for the power is not concurrent; and if not here, the States must inevitably submit to every irregularity that may be practised by subordinate agents. It has been said that the law of Georgia is in force, but it can have no force at the expense of the constitutional power of the House. But was that law complied with? If so, the present contest would not exist. It was true that the general principle is a sound one, which separates executive, legislative and judicial power. This might be an argument for the institution of a special tribunal for the trial of contested elections; but it is an abundant answer to show that this has not but that, on the contrary, the Constitution of the General Government, as well as the Constitutions of the several States, have made the legislative bodies judges of the elections of their members. The resolution that C. Meade is not entitled to his seat, was then passed by a vote of 68 to 53; and Thomas Spalding admitted by a vote of 66 to 52.

REMARKS OF MR. NISBET, OF GEORGIA,

In the House of Representatives, December 27, 1839—The question being on a motion to reconsider the vote of the House concurring in the resolution of the Senate for the appointment of a Chaplain,

Mr. NISBET rose and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: Convinced that the motion before the House involves matter of serious moment to Christianity and the country, I beg leave to offer a few reflections. I confess, although informed of the opinions of my colleague, [Mr. COOPER,] I have been taken by surprise by the debate now in progress. I certainly did not expect it this morning. I must say that I differ with my honorable colleague in the views he has exhibited. And although his searching and accurate mind, in its investigations after and elucidations of truth, rarely errs, yet I believe that he is now wrong. I know, full well, and justly appreciate, his motives. No one is to Christianity a more sincere friend than himself, and no one illustrates its precepts in practice more fully than he does. He, by sustaining the motion, intends to maintain both Christianity and the Constitution. Such are my own wishes. We differ in the mode of accomplishing the same ends.

It certainly would be to my mind a melancholy result should the House of Representatives of this great nation resolve certainly that it would not elect a chaplain—a minister of the gospel, called to throw around the legislation of the country the hallowed influences of piety—a result which would strike with alarm and apprehension the whole people of the Union; apprehension, not so much for religion or the Constitution as for that conservative influence which it exerts upon the principles of free government.

What, sir, does not liberty owe to Christianity? The history of the Colonies proves that we are indebted, in a great degree, for those noble principles of free government engrafted upon our Constitution and in our laws, to that freedom of thought and action which brought our Pilgrim and Huguenot ancestry to our shores. They fled from the religious bigotry and political intolerance of the old world for conscience sake. They came hither to worship God in freedom. And upon the shores of a new world they planted the standard of religious, and, with it, of civil liberty. That independence of mind which they asserted in matters of conscience made them alike independent as to all rights. Freedom of service to Heaven, by a very necessity of our nature, constrains men to think and act freely in matters of less consequence. The free spirit of the pilgrim impressed itself upon colonial governments, and some of the best features of our most admirable system are traced to colonial parentage. I make these remarks to show, sir, that civil liberty is too largely indebted to Christianity to permit us to endanger the former by abandening even the forms of the latter. It influences ought to pervade, and do now pervade, all the departments of Government, more or less. Into our courts of justice, our Executive offices, and our halls of legislation, it ought to send, and does send, a sanative power. It gives a healthful tone to public sentiment, and purifies the fountains of legislation. In this country it is necessary, it seems to me, to maintain, in the forms of legislation, the external ceremonials of religion. What though it is sometimes desecrated, and its ministers false? What though it seem to some to be but part of Congressional pageantry, empty, vain, and a lie? Yet still the very form of service maintains the ascendancy of morality. Those forms are the emblems of its essential purity. Blended, as they are, with the procedure of Congress, they themselves become vital. Destroy, sir, the external manifestations of Christianity, and you weaken its influence and endanger its vitality. You should observe even here, sir, the form of prayer. The voice of praise should hush for a brief moment, at regular intervals, the noise of party war, and say to the troubled waters, "Peace, be still."

The appointment of a Chaplain to this House is a declaration, by the nation itself, that the Bible is true. It is the practical recognition of its obligations. Is this no advantage? Is this not bearing evidence to Christianity? Is it not the voice of the Confederacy? Does not this act proclaim, through the length and breadth of the land, that, according to the belief of the American Congress, God reigns in Heaven and upon earth? The statesman, therefore, should not withhold this evidence. In all we do, it seems to me, we should recognise the sanctions of Christianity, and should maintain the purity both of the Church and the State by a decent regard, in our public acts, even to the forms of piety.

The manifestation of regard to religion, in the election of a Chaplain to this House, is due to the convictions and moral sensibilities of the constituency of this body. It is a just response to the requirement of that moral feeling which pervades the States. No less than this, I will venture to assert, is required by the people, whether professors or not. It is a tribute of respect to that religion which makes sweet the homes of the thousands who dwell beneath the fostering care of American legislators, and in the peace of an unobtrusive yet sustaining faith. Let it not be said that the Twenty-sixth Congress has declared of record that it will dispense with the services of the ministry. Conceding, for the argument's sake, that the power to appoint a Chaplain, under the Constitution, is doubtful, yet I know it will not be denied that a failure to appoint would shock the country. It will do violence to that fervid piety which lives and breathes and burns in the great heart of the notion.

The service with which it is now proposed to dispense, has been maintained here for years. The wise and virtuous and patriotic of other days exercised the power, and believed in its expediency. It is hoary with accumulated years. The first Congress that assembled under the Constitution, elected a Chaplain. We are scarcely wiser or better than that august body of men. They mingled worship with politics. Most of the State Legislatures, I believe, sir, do the same.

It has been objected that the worship conducted here is insincere—a form and a mockery. Admitting this to be true—and I lament that, in part, it must be conceded to be true—yet, still the general good is accomplished, and the general evils averted to which I have before referred; and these general ends are paramount; they outweigh particular objections. In all assemblies there are insincere worshippers; men will bring the cares and thoughts and feelings of the world into the sanctuary. I do not know that this body, being professedly political, is, on that account, the less devout. That distraction of mind awaits him who mingles in the stormy strife of this House, is true; and on that account it is well to bring hither the soothing, softening influences of charity and love. But I think, Mr. Speaker, that there is in this House not only a sacred regard for Christianity, but also a strong feeling of piety. Beneath the surface of ordinary emotion lie imbedded the fountains of moral sensibility. There flows through this assemblage of men an under current of piety, invisible, it is true, under ordinary circumstances, but which occasionally flashes and sparkles in the light of day. This is obvious, in the eloquent words and thoughts of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.] He gave utterance to the irrepressible feeling of respect for moral things, which, doubtless, he imbibed in his earliest formation of character. Nor can I permit myself to doubt that there are many here who meet these services with all that solemnity of manner and feeling which becomes the occasion. My colleague, and also the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GARLAND,] find a reason against electing a chaplain, in this, that they are paid—that they pray and preach by contract, and that they make this temple a place of merchandise, selling alike their consciences and their services. I find myself nothing wrong in religious or political principle in rewarding the minister. It is a volunsary contribution by the House to the necessities of those whom they invite to officiate for them. It is not a pension for the clergy, by law or from constitutional necessity, but a donation to the man. Reward, to my mind, does not necessarily demoralize and secularize the preacher, else there were no ministry—no temple—no worship. Shall not the priest live by the altar? And is not the laborer worthy of his hire? That some who wear the priestly robe have come hither, trading upon the stock of their ministerial character, and vending for a consideration the sacred ministrations of our holy religion, is perhaps true—but not all have so come. It may be conceded at once, without weakening the obligation to elect a chaplain, that there are false professors of that religion. In its purest and earliest state, among the twelve who listened to the words, and saw the works of God himself, there was one traitor.

I cannot concur, Mr. Speaker, in the apprehension expressed by my honorable friend and colleague, that the act to which he objects may ultimately lead to a union of Church and State. I think that our whole political system, as also the state of religious opinion in our country, makes such a union an utter impracticability. Such a thing could not be without an entire change in the essential elements and actual organization of the frame of Government. The very freedom of religious opinion and action guarantied to the people must operate as an insurmountable bar to such a union. I should as soon, nay sooner, look for a despotism in place of our constitutional liberty, as the result which gentlemen apprehend. The recollections of the past, the interests of the present, and the expectations of the future—religion, which seeks its its own perpetuity in the maintenance of its purity—all forbid it. Our denominational divisions constitute a system of sleepless and enterprising vigilance over the encroachments of the church. Protestant Christians have long ago ascertained, from history written in the blood of martyrdom, that their rights of conscience depend upon free Government. They are committed to maintain the separation of the Church and the State by the instinct of self defence, and by the precepts of their own faith. I think I am not mistaken when I say that the church herself would be the last to seek an unholy and self-destroying alliance with the State. Piety would die in the embraces of Government. No, sir, Protestant Christianity must stand aloof from political associations, by the law of her own existence. A loss of liberty might, perhaps would, necessarily corrupt the church; whilst liberty remains, the church will maintain its purity. Keep pure the church in our land, and the Constitution is defended with impregnable bulwarks.

In England we know, sir, that the church is part of the Government—that the articles of the established religion are held to be parcel of the common law—that the sacrament is a condition precedent to the tenure of office—that rich governmental revenues sustain the sacred aristocracy—that lands and franchises and political power, by the very principles of the British Constitution, (if Constitution Britain has, which I very much doubt,) appertain to the church; not to Christianity, sir, but to our form of church organization. Not so here. That aid which the Government can here give the church is alone in a freewill offering to the principles it professes, protecting all creeds and names equally by its tolerant and equal legislation. For myself I can conceive of no abomination more offensively abhorrent than a union of the Church with the State; and I would resist the very first approaches towards it with the sternest and most relentless hostility. But, sir, there is a union which is already, in some degree, consummated, which I hope I shall not live to see dissolved: I mean, sir, the union of religious principle with political conduct.

The leaven of moral principle should lighten the whole lump of the body politic. We should be cautious lest we divide things so happily and usefully united. We should be careful lest we invite into our legislation, and adopt as rules of conduct, the philosophy of a merely human faith. No gentleman, I know, would give his vote directly or indirectly to unhinge Christianity or in any way lessen its influences. I beg not to be understood as so charging. I only mean to say that the result at which they now aim may, in my opinion, produce that effect. The politicians of France desecrated the temples of God—burned the Bible—endowed the goddess of Reason with the attributes of Deity—and soon, very soon, the foundations of society were broken up, and anarchy reigned triumphant. The vine-clad hills and fertile plains, and crowded streets of France flowed down with blood. To a public relaxation of moral obligation, I have no doubt, may be traced those startling horrors which preceded and followed the French Revolution.

SPEECH OF MR. RAYNER,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, December 18, 1838—On a resolution that the commissioned members from the State of New Jersey are not entitled to be sworn as members of the House.

Mr. RAYNER said he had not intended to have taken any part in this debate. Having but lately taken his seat upon that floor, he had hoped that nothing would have transpired to change the resolution which he had formed—that of being a listener instead of a talker in this controversy. I am well aware (said Mr. R.) that this is no place, neither is this any time, for apologies. We all meet here with equal privileges and under equal responsibilities, and one has as much right to express his views here as another. But being a new member here, and in the presence of what ought to be the congregated wisdom of the nation; and feeling that diffidence which must necessarily result from such a position, I will claim it as one of my rights on this floor, to offer an apology for the remarks which I design to make; and that apology is, that if I say nothing which may be worth the attention of this House, I shall only be following the example which has been set me by several others. For, in the scope of this debate, the discussion has not been confined to those, only, who have approached it with calmness and discretion; but in the political battle which has been fighting here for the last two weeks, soldiers of every grade have entered the lists, from the hardened veteran to the raw recruit—from those who have wielded the sword and the battle axe, to those who have contended with bulrushes and straws. And besides, the great principles at stake in this matter, and the important consequences likely to grow out of its decision, admonish every one who feels an interest in it, to speek out fully, freely, and frankly in regard to it. And when it is borne in mind, that the rights and privileges of a sovereign State are involved in the decision of this question, I insist that it behooves every State to speak out through a portion of her representation on this floor, and to enter her protest against the attempt which is making to disfranchise New Jersey.

Sir, disguise this matter as you may, distort it as you please, still the real question is, whether the Constitution and the laws, or violence and brute force, are hereafter to prevail in the organization of this House and the legislation of this country. What sort of a spectacle do we exhibit to the people of this country? For better than two weeks have we been here, unorganized, in disorder and confusion, and the majesty of this Hall violated by the presence of men who have no more right to a seat on this floor* than had the fish-women of Paris in the National Assembly during the excesses of the French Revolution. Sir, the eyes of an anxious, an excited, and an indignant people are upon us; an awful responsibility rests some where, and I wish it to rest where it properly belongs. I do not hold the Clerk responsible, but those who advised him. I do not attach to his course that importance which has been assumed in this debate. He is nothing more than a ministerial officer, and his dicta are only binding so far as they reflect, and are in accordance with, the views of a majority here. What he says, or what he does, is authoritative so far only as it meets with the sanction, either express or implied, of the body whose officer he is. He cannot make or unmake members of Congress, by his willingness to call the names of some, or his refusal to call the names of others. And although we cannot but be indignant of the dogged obstinacy and party devotion which he has evinced, still I think entirely too much importance has been attributed to his conduct, when it is recollected that he is only the mere instrument through which this act of party tyranny is attempted to be perpetrated upon us. Suppose that the Clerk, after calling the name of Mr. RANDOLPH, had proceeded to call the names of the other regularly commissioned members from New Jersey, think you he would not have been interrupted and objection made to those gentleman's names being inscribed on the roll? If the Clerk had done his duty, think you that those gentlemen would have been permitted, without objection, to vote in the organization of this House? and to have taken the oath required by the Constitution, preparatory to their taking their seats as members of this House? Suppose, when the Clerk was advised, nay, required, to take the course which he did, he had replied, "Gentlemen, I am the officer of the House of Representatives, and not the mere tool of a party; I have taken an oath faithfully to perform my duty; one portion of that duty is to make out and call over the names of the members elect on the first day of the assembling of Congress; the duty which I owe my country, and the oath I have taken, prevent my compliance with your demand:" I say, suppose this had been the manly and noble response of the Clerk, when required to do as he did, think you this scene would not have taken place? No one who has been an observer of the party organization which exists here, the dictation of party leaders, and the inflexible determination which exists to carry their point at all hazards, can for a moment doubt upon the subject. The course of the Clerk only presented an issue a moment sooner, which would have been presented, even if he had performed his duty as a faithful officer. And as soon as objection had been made, discussion would have ensued, and after discussion, as soon as it had been necessary to test the sense of the members upon any distinct proposition, the same question would have arisen which has given us all this difficulty, viz. who should be entitled to vote? So, no matter what course had been pursued by the Clerk, "to this complexion it would have come at last" Why really, sir, from the debates which have taken place here, one would suppose that all this storm had been raised by the Clerk, and, that he had the power to allay it whenever it suited his good pleasure. If one unacquainted with our Government, and uninterested in our institutions, had heard the pathetic and eloquent appeals which have been made to the Clerk to proceed in his duty, he would have supposed that the Clerk, from his elevation there, was as omnipotent in this Hall as Jupiter on Olympus, and that upon his nod hung not only the future existence of this body, but the destinies of this nation. No such thing, sir; it is not the mere call of the Clerk that constitutes the person called an integral portion of this House; but it is the tacit acquiescence of the other members present, in recognising as a fellow-member, him who presents himself clothed with an authority as potent as theirs, which recognition they are bound in duty as well as courtesy to give.

I have made these remarks for the purpose of presenting the point which I wish to make—that the blame should attach to those who have only used the Clerk as a mere instrument, for the purpose of screening themselves from responsibility. One thing is certain, we shall be arraigned before the great tribunal of public opinion; and I wish it now to be distinctly understood that it is not the Clerk, but a band of partisans on this floor, who have prevented the organization of this House, and kept it in an uproar and excitement for fourteen days. Yes, sir, I call upon this House, and upon the people of this country, to bear witness, that while we—and when I say we I mean the friends of the Constitution and the laws—have been struggling and striving to organize this House, according to the requirements of that Con titution and those l ws, we have made thwarted in every attempt and frustrated in every movement, because we will not agree to depart from that course which is sanctioned by the Constitution, and hallowed by immemorial usage.

*It will be recollected that the contesting gentlemen from New Jersey marked their names at, and occupied seats in the Hall, without obtaining permission, during the discussion on the question.

The fourth section of the first article of the Constitution declares that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but that Congress may, at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators." Here the Constitution has entrusted the entire regulation of the elections in each State to the Legislatures thereof, until otherwise ordered by Congress; and Congress never having passed any law on the subject, the matter rests under the control of the States. Well, who made that Constitution? The people of the United States, in their character as States, each State acting and deciding for itself. The people of New Jersey, in the adoption of that Constitution, which is a part of their fundamental law, entrusted to their Legislature the enactment of all laws and regulations touching the elections in that State. In pursuance of that authority, the Legislature of New Jersey, a body which also emanated from the people, passed a law in 1807, (here Mr. R read from the law of New Jersey,) which after requiring the clerks of the several counties "to make one list of all the candidates voted for," in their respective counties, as Representatives from that State in the Congress of the United States, "together with the number of votes received for each of them," which they shall "transmit" "to the Governor" "within seven days thereafter," goes on to declare, in the fifth section, that "the Governor, or person administering the Government of this State, shall, within five days after receiving the said list, lay the same before a Privy Council, to be by him summoned for that purpose, and, after casting up the whole number of votes from the several counties for each candidate, the said Governor, or person administering the Government, and Privy Council, shall determine" "the six persons who have the greatest number of votes from the whole State for Representatives in the Congress of the United States; which six persons, the Governor, or person administering the Government, shall forthwith commission, under the great seal of the State, to represent this State in the Congress of the United States. Here, then, the people of New Jersey, through their Legislature, in pursuance of a right guarantied by the Constitution, have pointed out the mode through which their will is to be known in regard to those who are to represent them on this floor. They cannot all come here, and say to you in person, whom they wish to represent them here, but they declare to you, through their organic law, that those who present themselves with the commission of the Governor, certified under the great seal of the State, are they whom they wish to represent their rights, their interests, and their wishes here. This is a high and important trust, which they have confided to their Government, on his own responsibility; and, whether he abuses that trust or not, is a question in which we cannot inquire until we are a tribunal competent to decide—which we are not, until we are constitutionally organized, and have had the evidence on both sides of the question. And, let it be borne in mind, that the States of this Union, in the adoption of the Federal Constitution —which guaranties to each State the regulations of its own elections—have pledged themselves, each to the other, and all to each, that those credentials which each may have declared to be the evidence of its choice, shall be faithfully and implicitly respected by all the others. Well, have the members from New Jersey exhibited such credentials? We have heard their commissions read from the Clerk's table, and it is unnecessary to insist that they are in due form as required by law, for that is admitted on all hands.

But it is not only in conformity with the Constitution and the law that those members having the regular certificates should take their seats here, as a matter of right, and assist in the organization of the House, but it is also in conformity with that e tablished usage, which has become a law of Parliament, an i which has always prevailed from the origin of the Government down to the present time. It has been the invariable usage, not only in the Congress of the United States, but in the Legislatures of all the States; and although gentlemen on the other side have been called on again and again to cite a single instance in the history of American legislation where a different course has been pursued, yet no such case has been mentioned. The case mentioned by the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] is not a case in point, for there both the claimants held certificates, which were valid according to the law of that State—one being signed by the sheriff, and the other by the deputy sheriff; whereas in the case before us no one will pretend that Messrs. Dickerson, Vroom, and others have exhibited any evidence of election which is recognized by the laws of New Jersey. The case of Moore and Letcher has been alluded to, but that furnishes no precedent which is applicable to this case; for it is established, as well by the history of that case, as by the repeated declarations of gentlemen during this debate, who are conversant with all the facts connected with it, that the certificate of Moore was defective on its very face, and not in conformity with the law of Kentucky. Moore's certificate was defective by the admission of his friends; the certificates of the gentlemen from New Jersey, Messrs. Aycrigg, Halsted, and others, are made out according to law, by the admission of their enemies. That is just the difference between the two cases. And, what is passing strange, and only to be accounted for from the rabid influence of party, some of the very men who are now most prominent in leading this crusade against the rights of New Jersey, (as has been proved by a reference to their speeches,) then insisted that you could not go behind the return before organization, but that the certificate of election gave the holder a prima facie title to his seat. This principle is as sound now as it was then. It is a principle which, in common with all our ideas of free legislation, we borrowed from England, where it has been the law of Parliament ever since the rights and privileges of the House of Commons have been placed beyond the control of the Crown—ever since that House has been the depositary of the rights and freedom of the citizen. The authority read to us the other day by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIDDLE] places this matter beyond controversy. I have that authority now before me, and, with the permission of the House, I will read it again, as it ought to be conclusive upon all who acknowledge the force of precedent and law. I read from Jacob's Law Dictionary, under the head of "Parliament," vol. 5, page 79:

"If two or more sets of electors make each a return of a different member, (which is called a double election,) that return only which the returning officer, to whom the sheriff's precept was directed, has signed and sealed, is good, and the member by him returned shall sit until displaced by petition."

In reading further, I find, on the same page, the following:

"In the year 1640 it was ordered, that when some are returned by the sheriff, or such other officer as by law hath power to return, and others returned by private hands, in such case those returned by the sheriff shall sit until the election is quashed by the House."

In the case before us the certificate of the Secretary of State of New Jersey, exhibited on behalf of Messrs. Dickerson and others, is, as it were, by private hands; he is not known to the law so far as regards the issuing of certificates of election; and his certificate, in the absence of any provision by law, is entitled to no more authority than the letter of a private gentleman.

But I have another authority, which was pointed out to me by a friend this morning, and which is more conclusive, if possible, than either of those I have read. I read from Lex Parliamentaria, page 229:

"If a sheriff shall return one for Knight of the Shire who was unduly or not at all elected, yet he that is returned remains a member of the House till his election be declared void."

Now will any one attempt to evade these authorities, by saying that they are English precedents, and therefore not applicable to our country? Sir, I have heard of some pettifoggers who, after hearing cited by the opposite counsel an authority which they could not controvert, attempt to delude an ignorant jury by telling them that it was an authority from England, a country where they had a King, and not applicable to a free country; and that in rendering their verdict they ought not to recognize its validity. Will any one use that argument here? I challenge any member on this floor to rise in his place, and stake his reputation, either for intelligence or candor, by saying that these authorities are not binding upon us because they are English precedents. Will any one do it? No one will—for every one here ought to know, if he does not, that the parliamentary law of England, whenever applicable to the nature of our Government, has always been recognized by the jurists of our country as entitled to the same respect and possessing the same authority as the common law; which was the national inheritance we received from our fatherland, and which, in fact, is the common source of all our free institutions.

If, then, the members from New Jersey produce the credentials which the Legislature of their State has provided by law, and if that provision of their Legislature is in pursuance of a right guarantied by the Constitution of the United States, why will this House refuse them a participation in all the rights and privileges, as well those which are incident to organization as to legislation afterwards? If it has been the established usage, from the origin of the Government, to admit to their seats those having the certificates of election required by law, why will you now, for the first time, violate this settled principle, and innovate upon a practice which has become the parliamentary law of all free legislation? But, sir, how have the authorities which have been adduced, and the arguments which have been made, in defence of the Constitution and the laws, been met on this occasion? Have they been received and been replied to with courtesy and candor? No, sir. Gentlemen, after having received authorities which they could not controvert, and arguments which they could not answer, have attempted to evade them by sneering and ridicule. They tell us they will not be fettered by precedent, or trammelled by the forms and technicalities of the law. And I, for one, was sorry to hear that doctrine avowed on this floor. I think it must be the first time that that destructive, jacobinical principle has been promulgated in this Hall. I was aware that that doctrine had its advocates among the wretched rabble that infest our Northern cities; but never did I expect to see the day when an American Representative would openly avow it on this floor. The avowal of such a doctrine I consider to be an outrage upon the sanctity of this Hall. Yes, sir, this Hall, which was consecrated to freedom; which was designed as an ark to preserve inviolate the Constitution, amid the deluge of political strife which is sweeping over the land; this Hall, which was expressly intended to perpetuate the power and majesty of the law, has been desecrated—yes, desecrated—by the avowal of doctrines which, if carried fully out into practice, would not only sap the foundations of our free institutions, but would, in its levelling career, raze to the ground the fair fabric under whose dome we are now assembled. Yes, I repeat it, and I call upon the American People to beware, that their institutions are in danger, when it is openly declared on this floor that the forms and technicalities of the law are not to be regarded when they interpose an obstacle between a majority here and the attainment of a favorite object. And this declaration is the more alarming when it is recolleted that it comes ex cathedra; that it is made by one who has been pointed out to me as the leader of his party in this House, [Mr. VANDERPOEL, of N. Y.;] and who, I must say, has indulged in a strain of denunciation and slang that ought not to have been permitted by the senior members of this House. Why, what are those technical rules and useless forms of which the gentleman from New York has spoken? They are, so far as regards all the purposes for which they were designed, the supreme law of the land. What are your rules of order for your government here? They are the most technical of all technicalities, and yet they speak the commanding language of the law, and are as imperative and binding in their nature, and as much entitled to respect, as though you kept an army at your doors ready to enforce them. What lends the sanction of majesty to our courts of law? It is the formal and technical manner in which justice is administered. What invests the constable's staff with a power as terrible as the tyrant's sword? It is a mere technical procedure of a few moments in compliance with the forms of law. But, says the gentleman from New York, in the fury of his party zeal, the forms and quibbles of the law are not to be regarded when the rights of the people are in danger. Now, it is absurd, it is paradoxical, to talk about the rights of the people conflicting with a law which they themselves have passed, in pursuance of a right which they have reserved to themselves in the Constitution; for it is the object of the Constitution to define those rights, and of the law to enforce them. If, then, the gentleman from New York is such a friend to popular rights and to the people of New Jersey, let him prove that his professions are sincere by aiding to carry into operation the laws which the people of that State have passed for the protection of their rights. Now, I understand, the gentleman from New York is himself a lawyer; and is it possible that he, who belongs to a profession that has, in all ages, stood up for the rights and sanctity of the law against the encroachments of those in authority—a profession that has, in all ages, included in its numbers the guardians and protectors of liberty, and the defenders of the rights of man; is it possible, I say, that he will now become the derider and contemner of that very law for whose omnipotent power he is daily in the habit of contending?

But, says the gentleman, my object is to take care of the people's rights, and I will not be arrested by the forms and technicalities of the law. Now, sir, I am not to be deluded by this cry about the people and the people's rights. As to all the slang which we have heard upon that subject, I look upon it as too contemptible for notice. It has always been the language which cunning and corrupt men have used for the purpose of concealing their treacherous and sinister designs. It has always been the language of despots, when the law has interposed a barrier to their ambitious projects. Tyrants have always contended that their object was the good of the people, when violating those very laws that the people themselves may have made for their own preservation. It was the language of Cromwell when, under the garb of sanctity, he clutched at unlimited power. It was the language of Robespierre when, from a pretended hatred to tyrants, he deluged France in the best blood of her sons. It is the language of fanaticism in our own day, when whetting the knife for our thoats, and kindling the torch for the destruction of our homes. It is the language of the gentleman from New York in framing a pitiful excuse for trampling on the laws and Constitution of his country. Why, sir, I again ask, what are the forms and technicalities of the Constitution and the laws, which the gentleman from New York has so much derided? It is they whose unseen power is always in operation, and which keeps the wheels of Government in motion, not only whilst we are sitting here, but whilst we are reposing in our beds. It is they whose magic power brought us all here together on a given day—which protects us in the exercise of our duties here, and which invests with a sort of sanctity in the public eye, all our proceedings. It is they which arm your Sergeant-at-Arms with a power as "terrible as an army with banners"—which reconcile us to our labors and detention here, under the assurance that our homes and our fire-sides are protected against the assaults of rapine and violence. It is they whose "still small voice," to use the language of my eloquent friend from Georgia, [Mr. NISBET,] "speaks in a language as terrible as the thunders of heaven." It is the technical operation of the Constitution and the law which give us our existence as a representative body, and which will strip us of our power at the appointed time. It is to them that the gentleman from New York himself owes the privilege of a seat on this floor—for, without the forms of law, his constituents could not have sent him here—and the opportunity which he has had, of sneering at, deriding, and contemning the very power which clothes him with his representative character.

But, sir, we are not only bound by the Constitution and the law of Parliament to admit the members having the legal returns, but reason and common sense must suggest that we cannot depart from that course wihout becoming involved in inextricable difficulties. Before organization we can do nothing except what is incidental to organization; it is only by the act of organization that we become invested with a representative power, able and capable of enforcing our decrees. Is it not evident, then, that, upon assembling together, reason and convenience both require that no obstacle should be presented which is calculated to embarrass us in the act of organizing? I think the position has been properly taken and forcibly illustrated here, that, before we are organized, we can exercise no power except what is necessary to organization; the reason of which is perfectly plain, since the Constitution requires that we should exercise no power, either legislative or judicial, except under the sacred responsibility of an oath. And we disregard the Constitution altogether if, before we are organized—or even afterwards—we prejudge the case without hearing the evidence on both sides. In either case we constitute ourselves into a revolutionary tribunal for the purpose of disfranchising men who come here armed with the same power and clothed with the same authority that we do. The confusion and inconvenience resulting from the adoption of any other course than that of allowing the members having the lawful certificates to take their seats, was urged upon us at the very commencement of this difficulty; it was predicted by the distinguished gentleman for Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT,) who, in the forcible language of eloquent truth, foretold the very difficulties which have since taken place; and whose clear and logical mind, on yesterday, placed this matter in so clear a point of view that "he who ran might read." His argument has not been answered, and never will be answered. It will stand as an enduring monument not only of his patriotism and his intellect, but of his devotion to the rights of the States. Yes, strange as it may seem, that honorable gentleman—who, as he told us, has never been over-zealous in his advocacy of State rights—has on this occasion stood forth as their champion; while others, from whom we had a right to expect it, have deserted the post of duty.

The course insisted on by the other party will, at any time, place it in the power of a factious and turbulent minority to control the action of a majority; in fact, it will place the destinies of this Government at the mercy of unprincipled and partisan agitators. Suppose, for instance, that parties are pretty nearly balanced in this House at any time hereafter—what an easy matter will it be for a few factious partisans of the minority party to get up a pretended contest against just enough members of the majority, who, being set aside, will throw the majority the other way. And think you it will not be frequently done if the precedent is now set? And, in times of high party excitement, to what length will not this disorganizing spirit be indulged? Suppose, for instance, at some time hereafter in the history of this country, a corrupt and profligate Administration shall, by fraud and bribery, have fortified themselves in the strongholds of power; suppose that the people of this country, after having long suffered all the evils of tyranny and misrule, shall have aroused themselves, and, by a mighty effort at the ballot-box, shall have returned to this House a majority opposed to the reigning dynasty; suppose, too, this shall happen at a session previous to the Presidential election; suppose the party in power shall have become alarmed at the prospect of a system of investigation which is to drag to light their miserable corruption and hypocrisy, and expose to an indignant people the system of peculation and plunder by which the very life-blood of their prosperity has been exhausted; ay, sir, suppose that a Speaker is to be elected, and that in the election of that Speaker are involved consequences of awful import to the party in power; we will go a little further, and suppose that a partisan Clerk is to be rewarded for his compliant disposition—does it require the spirit of prophecy to foretell what is to take place, if the precedent is now set, that the contesting a member's seat is sufficient cause for excluding him from all share in the organization of the House? Who does not see that in such a case no member of the party opposed to that in power, could be sure of his seat without a contest? The only question would be, who should be sacrificed to appease the demon of party. Establish this precedent, and where is it to end? It places the majority in the power of a factious and corrupt minority. It is a bribe and a lure held out to hypocrisy and corruption; for, whilst one party might refrain from these pretended contests from a sense of propriety, all the advantage would enure to those who would not be restrained by any such correct motive. Establish the precedent that the mere contesting his seat, is sufficient ground for setting aside any member, and depriving him of all share in the election of Speaker and in the organization of this House, and I fear the time is not far distant when no one who is opposed to the tenant of the White House at the other end of this city, will ever be allowed to take his seat quietly in this Hall. Establish the principle that he is to be unceremoniously deprived of his right upon the mere complaint of some pretender, and you will soon have to provide some extraordinary power to enforce your decrees. For, I assure you, that whenever this system is attempted to be carried fully out, you will find that there are some stubborn and unbending spirits in this country, who will defend their rights at the hazard of their lives, and who will only surrender them with their heart's best blood. Establish the precedent, that party malice is to be gratified, and party vengeance satiated by this vexatious and tyrannical process, and you may as well at once organize a corps of bandits, to enforce your savage and despotic orders. Yes, sir, I fear the time is fast approaching when every friend of the Constitution and the laws who presents himself for admittance here, will be compelled to march up to that table with his commission in one hand and his dagger in the other. I say not this in idle bravado; it is forced upon me by the scene I witnessed on Friday last. When the Constitution and the laws are dethroned, violence and faction must usurp their places; and in that case there is no other alternative left the oppressed but tame and quiet submission, or a resort to physical force.

The precedent proposed to be set will not only empower a minority to overrule and control a majority, but it will enable them to prevent the organization of this House altogether. Suppose, for factious purposes, a majority of the seats on this floor should be contested on the assembling of the members. What sort of a spectacle do you then exhibit? According to the rule insisted on here, all those whose seats are contested must stand aside. And there you are; the minority cannot organize, according to the Constitution, for they would not constitute a quorum; and thus the Government is suspended, and the future existence of this body dependent on the whims and caprices of a meager minority here. What could be done in such a case? A minority could not constitutionally elect a Speaker; they would be equally impotent to pass judgment upon any of the contested seats. And you have already decided that those whose seats are contested should not vote in what you are pleased to call their own case, although the rights and interests of their constituents, and the sovereignty of the States they represent, might be involved in the issue. So you see, that as soon as you depart from the Constitution and the laws—as soon as you depart from the established usage of parliamentary proceeding—you become lost in a labyrinth of difficulties, from which the ingenuity of an Ariadne can afford you no clew of escape. And, as has already been proved in the course of our proceedings, the further you proceed the more you become involved, till finally, for the purpose of extricating yourselves you are compelled to overleap "all law, all precedent, all right."

But, say gentlemen on the other side, the fraud in this case is so palpable and evident that we must go behind the return. Well, if there be a fraud in this case—and, by the bye, I deny the fact, until it is proven—we cannot now remedy the evil; we cannot now do justice to the injured, or punish the offender; because we are not competent to try the case until the House is fully organized, until the subject has undergone investigation before a committee and all the facts reported, and until we are a jury regularly empanelled to sit upon the trial of the case. If wrong has been done, let New Jersey herself inflict the punishment where it belongs, and let it come from the source whence it ought. These gentlemen who present credentials here, come here as the representatives of the people of New Jersey. The people of that State have entrusted to their Governor the power to declare in his official character who may have received a majority of the popular vote; he is responsible to them, and if he has acted fraudulently and in bad faith, let them visit their vengeance upon him. Let it be recollected that it is the people of New Jersey, and not a mere faction in that State, whose rights are involved in the decision of this case; they have prescribed the manner in which their choice is to be expressed; they have prescribed the evidence which is to inform you of that choice; and if gentlemen here sit themselves up as the guardians and protectors of the rights of the people of New Jersey, they are bound to respect the evidence which their laws declare to be conclusive as to their choice. If you are the friends of New Jersey, do not disfranchise her on this floor, but prove the sincerity of your professions by your conduct; respect her institutions and her laws, which declare to you the credentials by which her representatives are to be known. But it is said there was fraud practised upon the people by the Governor and Council. If there was, and you as private individuals, had satisfactory proof of the fact, you certainly cannot now, when sitting in your representative character, recognize as proper evidence that information which you may have received, and by which you may have suffered your opinions to be influenced, as private men. But what evidence have you that there was fraud? Do you arrive at that conclusion from the ex parte statements of scurrilous and pensioned newspapers? Will you sit in judgment upon the case, before you have heard the evidence and the counter statements on the other side? If you suffer yourselves to be prejudiced by one sided statements, how can you approach this subject hereafter with the calmness and discretion which its importance requires? I warn gentleman now, that, by prejudging this case, they will be incapacitated from sitting in trial upon it hereafter. After pursuing this course, will they be able to say that they are ready to try the case upon its merits, free from all prejudice and bias of opinion? Certainly they cannot; and I call upon the House, and upon the country, to bear witness that if gentlemen pass judgment upon this matter now, without hearing and comparing the evidence on both sides, that they will be estopped, as well by a sense of delicacy as of justice, from sitting upon the case when it comes up for final action. For, in that case, they will be a packed jury; they will have prejudged the case; they will have formed and expressed an opinion; that opinion will be a matter of record; for the sake of consistency they will not recede; and when pride and prejudice are both aroused, what chance will feeble justice stand? None, none whatever.

But there is another objection to excluding these members from New Jersey, who come here with the legal certificates—an objection which, with me, is paramount to all others. It is trampling upon the rights and setting at defiance the laws and institutions of a sovereign State. In regard to this matter, I am well aware of the delicacy of my position; and it is in a measure owing to that, that I have been induced to trouble the House on the present occasion. I belong to that small number in the South who claim, par excellence, to be State Rights men, and who were for a long time placed under the ban of proscription by both the great leading parties in this country. And I am, moreover, one of those who stood firm and steadfast by their principles and the Constitution, when our great leader and captain went over to the enemy. And according to my view of State rights, I should prove recreant to all the principles of that school, if I could stand quietly by, and see the laws of a sovereign State passed in pursuance of a right reserved in the Constitution, disregarded and set at naught. Why, sir, what is State rights, as expounded by the fathers of our faith? It is, that all those rights and privileges reserved to the States in the Constitution are sacred and inviolable; that all laws passed in pursuance thereof are as imperative and binding as the decrees of Federal power, when backed by an army of mercenaries to enforce them; and, to carry the principle fully out, that the States "not only have the right, but that they are in duty bound, to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil," whenever those rights are wantonly violated. If I understand it, this is State rights; this is the great conservative principle of our system, which is equally well calculated for arresting the headlong career of that rabid Democracy which is sweeping over the land, as for checking the slow and cautious progress of Federal usurpation. Well, how stands the application of this principle to the case now before us? The Constitution guaranties to New Jersey, in common with the other States, the regulation of her own elections; and the Legislature of that State, in pursuance of such right, did pass a law, which I have read, declaring what sort of commissions should be evidence of election on this floor. An election has been held according to the regulations of that law; the members who present themselves produce commissions which are made out according to all the requirements of that law, and how do you treat them? Instead of treating them with proper respect, instead of recognizing them as equals—which you are bound to do, if you respect the reserved rights of New Jersey and the laws enacted in pursuance of those rights—you tell them to stand aside; you attempt to drive them contumeliously from this Hall; and some here have gone so far as to insult them, by calling them the Governor's representatives Now, if this is State rights, then I must confess I have studied the subject to but little purpose.

Really, sir after hearing this discussion, if it were possible to endue an abstract principle with the power of speech, well might State Rights exclaim, "Save me from my friends, and I will take care of my enemies." For strange as it may seem, the rights of the States, during this debate, have found advocates where they had no right to expect them; while those who were bound by every consideration to defend them, have been aiming a deadly blow at their very existence. But, says the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] sovereignty resides in the people, and not in the Governor and Council. I presume that gentleman is not likely to gain any additional credit for sagacity by this discovery; he will find no one to moot that point with him; every one will admit that sovereignty resides in the people—no one will insist that it is in the Governor and Council. But, it is an attribute of sovereignty to define the manner in which that sovereignty is to be exercised. The people of New Jersey have said that it is through the Governor and Council that their will is to be made known on this floor. And if the people of New Jersey are sovereign, as admitted by the gentleman from South Carolina, their regulations in regard to their elections, when constitutionally made, are also sovereign. The Governor is the agent whom the people of New Jersey have selected to inform this House of the choice; he is their lawfully constituted attorney; his power of attorney is registered in the statute law of their State; and that maxim of the common law, that "what one does through another he does of himself," is as old as English liberty itself.

Sir I must confess I felt mortified and disappointed at the course pursued by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina. In fact, when I think of the gallant stand which that gentleman and his compeers have heretofore made in defence of the rights of the States—when I think of the time when the chivalry of South Carolina stood up here, almost unaided and alone, battering against the legions of despotism, and now behold her sons leagued with the very men who were then urging a tyrant to put them to death— I say, when I see this, I am ready to inquire, "Is it fancy, or is it fact?" But if evidence is lacking to remove all doubt, go to the record, and there behold the names of that gentleman and his colleagues, with one saving exception, associated with the very men, a contact with whom, a short time since, he would have avoided as a pestilence. A comparison of the events of a few by gone years, with those of the present time, are sufficient to convince the most sanguine of the fading nature of human glory, and the instability of the human mind. Compare South Carolina now with what she was a short time since. When I reflect that but a few years ago that gallant State seemed to be the only place in this Union where freedom had a resting place—that in her temples alone the sacred fire of liberty seemed to be kept burning—when I think of the sublime moral spectacle she presented to the world, when, having planted her banner on the ramparts of the Constitution, she bid defiance to a world in arms—I say when I think of that time, and now behold her united with the very men who were then thirsting for her blood—and that, too, for the purpose of trampling upon the rights of a sovereign State—I am ready to exclaim, in the language which Shakspeare has put in the mouth of Cassius, when lamenting the degeneracy of his country—

"Age, thou art shamed:"
Carolina, "thou hast lost the breed of noble bloods."

I mean no disrespect to South Carolina, or those who now control her destinies. I have a right, if any one has, to allude to her position, and to speak out fully and freely upon this subject; for the time once was, when "clouds and darkness" hung upon her borders, that the sound of the first gun would have been the signal for my departure, and the first drop of blood would have cemented my destiny to her's for weal or for wo; with her I would have marched on to victory and to glory, or else I would have bleached her hills with my bones.

Why, sir, the time has been when, if this attempt had been made to trample upon the rights of a sovereign State, the honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] could not have been kept chained to his seat. He would have sprung to his feet like a tiger from his jungle, and the tones of his eloquent indignation would not yet have been done ringing in this Hall, nor the minions of power yet been done quaking beneath their thrilling influence. But "a change has come over the spirit of his dream;" and he, who once bore aloft in this Hall the tattered banner of the Constitution, undismayed by power and unseduced by the glitter of place, is now found doing "good service" in the ranks of the very men who were then for hanging him on a gallows as high as Haman's. I presume it is too late, or I would even now, unknown and obscure as I am here, make one last appeal to that gentleman. I would appeal to him by the recollection of those scenes that once bound together every true friend of State rights in the South "with hooks of steel;" I would appeal to him by the common dangers which threatened us, and the common odium which we incurred—by the chivalry of his own nature—by the fame which he has acquired, and the glory which once encircled his State—by all these I would appeal to him, to return once more to the defence of the Constitution and the laws, and to give us once more, in the struggle we are making, the aid of his powerful arm. I beseech him to turn his back upon his new political associates, who will seduce him not only to the destruction of his own fair fame, but to the destruction of the free institutions of our common country. I beseech him to quit the worship or those false idols, by which he has been seduced from the pure faith of his fathers, and return once more to worship in the temple of that faith, whose gospel is the Constitution, and whose commentary is the law,

If this deed is consummated, then, in the sincerity of my soul, do I believe that State rights will have received a wound from which they will never recover, till the States shall have arisen in the majesty of their power, and remodelled the Government upon the original basis planned and designed by the fathers of the Republic. What little vitality was left in them by the proclamation and force bill will then have been extinguished forever. A precedent will have been set, which will be appealed to in after times as justifying any outrage, no matter how flagrant soever it may be. And what is the most melancholy reflection attending this whole transaction is, that the very men who a short time since were threatened as the victims to appease the wrath of a tyrant, who sought to gratify his vengeance by the overthrow of all the barriers which the Constitution had erected around the rights of the States, are now about to officiate as the priests of the sacrifice. Carry out your contemplated object, consummate this outrage upon the privileges of the representatives of freemen, and this violation of the rights of a sovereign State and the degradation of your country will be complete. You will then have committed an act, equalled only in depravity and party malignity by a scene which took place but a few short years since in the other end of this building, when a subservient Senate, crouching like hounds beneath the lash of their master, defiled, nay, destroyed, the very record which they had sworn before their God and their country to "keep" sacred and inviolate. There is a striking similarity between the two cases. In that case, the records of the country were expunged to gratifiy the malice of a tyrant; in this case, it is proposed to expunge the representation of a sovereign State merely to effect a temporary party triumph. In this case, as in that, eloquence and argument have pleaded, and pleaded in vain. But the oracles of party have spoken, the mandate hath gone forth, and the sacrifice must now be made, even though it require the immolation of the Constitution itself. Do the deed, and the expungers will again raise their shame-stricken heads; they may then stalk in triumph through this Hall, and taunt us by saying, "You are now no better than we." I, for one, wash my hands of this business. And, as the representative in part of one of the sovereign States of this Union, I now enter my most solemn protest against it. I protest against it in the name of our common country, whose honor and dignity will be compromised by such an unparalleled act of party madness. I protest against it in the name of the Constitution, which is not only the bulwark of our national freedom, but the only guarantee of our civil rights. I protest against it in the name of those established usages which come down to us sanctified by the test of time, and the example of a glorious ancestry. I protest against it in the name of New Jersey, and of my own State, which may, perhaps, fall the next victim to this insatiate appetite of party voracity. And, in conclusion, I appeal to this House to reflect upon the act they are about to commit. I appeal to them in the name of our common country, which has such claims upon our devotion; in the name of that Constitution which was purchased by the blood and treasure of the Revolution; in the name of those time-honored usages which we received from the hands of our fathers; in the name of New Jersey—her achievements in science and in arms, the glory which rests around the names of her sons, the blood which she shed at Monmouth, at Princeton, and at Trenton; and, finally in the name of that God who will not look unangered upon injustice and fraud; by all these I appeal to you to pause, and do not stain the escutcheon of your country with a blot which time will never expunge.

NEW JERSEY ELECTION.

SPEECH OF MR. STARKWEATHER,

OF OHIO,

In the House of Representatives, January 10, 1840—On the resolution of Mr. CAMPBELL of S. C. that all memorials and papers in the possession of the House relative to the New Jersey elections be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. STARKWEATHER said it was, perhaps, embarrassing, under any circumstances, to make an apology to the House for claiming its attention; yet he must confess, that though he rose with much embarrassment when he first addressed the Chair, he was still more embarrassed now, in consequence of the interruptions to which he had been subjected. He would endeavor, however, to get back to the position he assumed when he was first up. He had then said that the question before this House was, can the Governor of New Jersey elect members to Congress? or what, in fact, amounts to the same, can he furnish evidence of an election behind which this House cannot go? He had then said that it had been proven by testimony read before this House—that it was part of the history of the country—that it had been admitted by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH,] that Mr. AYCRIGG and his associates, who brought with them the certificates of Governor Pennington and the broad seal of the State, had not received a majority of the votes of New Jersey, but that Mr. DICKERSON and his associates had; and now (said Mr. S.) I plant myself on the first clause of the Constitution, which declares that every second year the people of the several States shall choose members of the House of Representatives. That was the position he assumed; and, in examining the Constitution, he found no authority to give to the Governors of the States the power to elect Representatives in the Congress of the United States; he found no authority which gave to the Privy Council of a Governor the power to elect them, and he found no authority which gave such power to the clerks of the county courts. I assume (said Mr. S.) that the Constitution means what it says: "that the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States;" but perhaps I may be met here by the arguments of the gentlemen from Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts, [Messrs. BOTTS, SERGEANT, and ADAMS,] that they did not contend that the Governor or the Privy Council, or the county court clerks of New Jersey, had the power to elect Representatives, but that they only could furnish the legal evidence of election. I ask them, then, triumphantly, by what authority are Messrs. AYCRIGG, MAXWELL, and their associates here. It is admitted, on all hands, that they are not here under the authority of an election by the people, as the Constitution requires—that the suffrages of the people were given to others; and by what authority then, I ask, do they present themselves here? I assume (continued Mr. S.) that the power of election is vested in the people, while the gentlemen say that it is vested in the Governor and Privy Council. Let us test that question for a moment. Has the Governor of a State the power to elect representatives of the people in this House? That is the point. If he has, where are your free institutions? and what value is there in your elective franchise? Has he the power to make the evidence by which the right of membership shall be determined? Gentlemen contend that the certificate and broad seal is the only evidence. Then, I ask, where is the authority given him in the Constitution to make this evidence? If he has it, of what value is the elective franchise, and for what purpose should the people assemble together to choose their representatives? If he can exclude those elected by the authority of the people, I ask what is the elective franchise worth? Gentlemen say that this House, in determining the right to seats in it cannot go beyond the certificate and broad seal, and that if it does, it will run into inevitable error. One gentleman says that it is conclusive evidence; another [Mr. WISE] that it is prima facie evidence, behind which you cannot go, contending that if you do not give the members holding it the seats they claim, you can never organize. They tell you that the members of this House elected by the people, and whose rights no one disputes, are not competent to act until they are qualified by the solemnity of an oath; while the member from Pennsylvania [Mr. SERGEANT,] tells you that from the moment an individual receives his certificate from the Governor of a State, he is clothed with all the privileges, all the rights, and all the immunities of a member of Congress. He tells you further, that a court of justice cannot go behind the broad seal, but must admit the individual possessing it, no matter how he came by it, to all the rights and privileges of a member of Congress. Let me state that question, in order to see the extent to which the doctrine of the gentleman would lead. Suppose the Governor of New Jersey, instead of giving his certificates to six members, had given them to twelve, and that all of them, starting in the same stage for Washington, should be arrested on their way, and should be brought up before a judge on a habeas corpus. The learned gentleman from Pennsylvania would say that the judge cannot go behind the certificates; and when he has released six of them, the gentleman would bring up the seventh and demand his release on the ground that he possessed the certificate and broad seal of a Governor, behind which he could not go; and thus get the discharge of every citizen of New Jersey, to whom the Governor might choose to give a certificate. This is precisely what the doctrine of the gentleman would lead to. The gentleman lays great stress also on their possession of the franking privilege. Is it so, that the Governor of New Jersey can give the franking privilege? That is not found in the bond—it is possessed by none but those to whom the Constitution and the laws have given it—members elected by the people.

I contend, said Mr. S. that this House must go behind the certificate of the Governor when it is necessary to do so, or this Government is dissolved. Let me, said he, test that position. The Constitution provides that this House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members; but gentlemen say they cannot judge until they have taken the oath prescribed by the act of 1798. So say the gentlemen from Virginia, from Massachusetts, and from New Jersey, [Messrs. WISE, ADAMS, and RANDOLPH;] and the gentleman from Virginia, in elucidation of his position, recounted the anecdote told of the late John Randolph, that on being questioned by the Speaker whether he was qualified in regard to age, shook his long skinny finger at him, and answered: "Go ask those who sent me." Suppose, then, that Governor Pennington, in the plenitude of his power and his corruption, had given to six of the sable sons of Africa his certificates of election; or, said Mr S. I will take the highly intellectual and civilized tribe of the Hottentots—suppose he had given his certificates to six of this tribe, and they had presented themselves here, demanding to be sworn as members—the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] would no doubt be willing to receive them, while the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] would have called upon the Sergeant-at-arms to have them removed. Observe the predicament in which the gentleman from Virginia would be placed. These distinguished sons of Africa would have shaken at the gentleman the Governor's certificate and broad seal, with as much display as Mr. Randolph did his skinny finger at the Speaker, and told him, in his own words, that he could not go behind it; while he would have looked at it with as much reverence as the Jews of old did on the Ark of the Covenant, and in despite of "hide, hair, and complexion," have permitted them to take their seats. I have said, continued Mr. S. that this House must go behind the Governor's certificates, or this Government is dissolved—and, feeble as I am in argument, I challenge contradiction. If the certificate of the Governor of New Jersey is of such sanctity that you can neither go behind it, nor around it, nor pass over it, I presume that the certificate of the Governor of New York is equally binding. The Governor of New York might send on here forty representatives from the distinguished tribe of the Flatheads—no, not the whole forty, said Mr. S. for I never yet heard of a Whig Governor who refused to give his certificates to Whig members—but he gives certificates to a sufficient number of Flatheads to fill the seats of the Democratic members. These certificate members then come here, with just as much right as did Mr. AYCRIGG and his associates, and the gentleman from Virginia says that we can neither go behind, nor beyond, nor around their certificates and broad seals, and they must take their seats. According to the gentleman's doctrine you must go on in this way until you get a sufficient number of foreigners, aliens, and Whigs, to give a majority of this House; and until the Speaker is elected, and the committees appointed, you can do nothing—you are bound hand and foot—they elect their own Speaker, appoint their own committees, and then they have all that they want to continue themselves in power for the whole Congress. The time may come when there will be three candidates for the Presidency, and the votes will be so distributed as to bring the election into the House. These certificate and unconstitutional members will then make for the people of the United States their President—will make for them their laws—and for the simple reason that we cannot go behind the certificate of a Governor till the House is organized; and when it is organized, and with such members, I inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania how you can ever oust them and organize again.

Again, say gentlemen, you cannot go behind the broad seal until the House is organized; you cannot adjudicate until the Speaker is elected, and the oath administered, because there is no precedent to sanction it, from the organization of the Government to the present day. In the case of Moore and Letcher a certificate was produced from the proper returning officer, and no principle is better settled than that the return of a legally constituted officer is good until the contrary be shown. But in that case, say gentlemen, the House, before organization, adjudicated only as to the legality of the certificate, and determined that it was informal. But here, the certificate is in exact accordance with law; it is word for word, letter for letter, and comma for comma. If the House, before organized, could adjudicate as to the law of that case, why cannot we, in this, adjudicate as to the fact? The case of Moore and Letcher is an exact parallel in principle.

But, sir, suppose there is no precedent to be found, authorizing us, before organized, to judge of the "election, returns, and qualifications of members," and that precedent is the other way, is that conclusive evidence why it should not be done now? Are we to be bound down by precedents, when by following them, we bring inevitable ruin upon the country, and deprive the people of their dearest constitutional rights—the right of suffrage? When precedent points to truth, I would follow it; when it leads to errror, I would abandon it. Sir, I have none of that holy reverence for precedent that some gentlemen seem to have. Had not the precedents and usages of the Jews been broken down, by what they termed a new and strange doctrine, the first whisperings of the Gospel would have been lost in the wilderness of Judea, and the grave would now be to us an eternal night, without the hope and consolation that we shall hereafter rise from it to light, to life and glory. Where would be the wonders achieved by the mighty power of steam? Where the triumphs of the immortal Fulton, to whose inventive genius the winds and tides and ocean surrendered up their precedents? Where the Declaration of our Independence? Where our Constitution and our Republican form of Government, had we adhered to old systems, for fear of breaking down established precedents. Sir, I repeat that when precedents are based on truth, I respect them, when founded on error, I disregard them.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, I know not for what purpose, as well as the gentleman from New Jersey, and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Messrs. SERGEANT, RANDOLPH, and ADAMS,] have appealed to the sympathies of this House, and eloquently discoursed on the deeds of noble daring done on the plains of New Jersey in the days of our Revolution. But I would submit to the logical mind of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that all this does not prove that Messrs. AYCRIGG, MAXWELL, HALSTED, STRATTON, and YORKE, were elected by the people of New Jersey. For what purpose was such an appeal made? Was it addressed as an argument to this House, or was it an argument addressed to the galleries? I admit that it was eloquent in the extreme; and the gentleman, with his fervid eloquence, bore me with him over the battle fields of New Jersey. It was there I heard, or thought I heard, some remnant of '76 discoursing with his children's children. "Here," says he, "I flung my banner to the breeze; its motto was the right of representation. For that right I took part in those perilous scenes. Here the hand that grasped it was struck off. Swinging it with the other, I bore it into the very face of the enemy. Then I sunk; and the last words I uttered were, the people shall elect their representatives. But here, even in New Jersey, has, for the first time, been violated this sacred right, for which I fought?" And, as he said this, the eye that had grown dim with age kindled, and the sinews that had been worn out in his country's defence, swelled with indignation. Sir, it was for the right of suffrage, the right of representation, that the best blood of the Revolution so freely flowed.

If I recollect aright, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] delivered a very severe philippic against Mr. DICKERSON and his associates, and said that they were yet polluting this Hall with their presence. Let me reply to him that those gentlemen claiming seats under the certificate and broad seal of Governor Pennington, have been rejected by the people of New Jersey—that they come here and are rejected by the House; they then come and demand to vote in their own case, and they are yet the second time rejected, and yet he third; and when the House is organized, and the members legally elected are sworn, they are found dragging their polluted political carcases up to the table, demanding to kiss the truth—I have not said to betray it. I wonder if they use stationery. I heard it said by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] that Messrs. DICKERSON, VROOM, and their associates, had a daily supply of stationery from the Clerk, and he severely took them to task for their presumption in using it. Rejected by the people of New Jersey, rejected by this House, and rejected by common sense, I inquire of these men of wax, Messrs. AYCRIGG and Co. if they use stationery.

The gentleman from North Carolina, whom I do not see in his seat, says that the party who sustain the right of Messrs. DICKERSON, VROOM, and their associates, are not competent to act, because they have prejudged the case. Sir, I did vote that the certificate members should not take their seats, and, if I remember rightly, that gentleman voted that they should. Then has he not prejudged the case? Truly, sir, a Daniel came to judgment.

Sir, there was a question propounded to you yesterday, and propounded to you as a judge. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] asked you, if he was in possession of a piece of property, under a legal deed, which another person claimed, and you were sitting as a judge in the case, whether you would first turn him out, and then inquire into the validity of his title? Sir, the gentleman begged the question in the case supposed by him. We say, facts say, and history says, that the New Jersey certificate members never had the possession, or the right of possession. The people, who alone had the right to give it, never gave it to them. But let us suppose a case more applicable to the gentleman himself. Suppose you were seeking for your rights, and he was the judge.* You commit your case to him, and the first thing you find him doing, is being engaged in an angry debate, showing that you have no legal right—he the judge, and you the petitioner. Would you believe, sir, that he entered into that angry debate for the purpose of doing you justice? No, sir; you would rather suppose that he had prejudged the case, and therefore was not competent to sit on it. I had supposed that it was the duty of a judge and jury to act impartially, and that they should not decide upon a case till they had heard all the evidence belonging to it. Sir, the same gentleman has said that he did not charge the responsibility of this transaction on the Clerk. I rejoice that he has done so; for I have demanded, and still do demand, to take my share of this responsibility. It is a responsibility that I glory in—it is taking the part of the people in opposition to those who would deprive them of their dearest rights, and render the elective franchise a solemn mockery; and I am ready to justify it any and at all times. But still I believe that when my memory, and that of the gentleman from Virginia shall be forgotten, the memory of the Clerk will live; live in the hearts of a free people. He set himself up in opposition to the oppressions of a tyrant, on the rights of a free people, and they will hold him in grateful remembrance for the firm and manly stand he has taken in their behalf. I did vote to exclude Governor Pennington's certificate members, and I claim my part of the glory in so doing.

Mr. Speaker, I have detained this House longer than I intended when I first took the floor, but I have but merely glanced at an error here, and an error there in the various arguments of gentlemen opposed to me, that have been addressed to the House during a six weeks' discussion; and in attempting to expose those errors, if permited to borrow an idea, I would compare myself to some ancient mariner, who returns from his voyage, bringing home with him a shell from this shore, and a pebble from that, as specimens of what compose the mighty deep, and pave her thousand shoals.

*Mr. BOTTS is on the Committee of Elections.

ARMED OCCUPATION OF FLORIDA.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE,

TUESDAY, January 7, 1840.

The bill for the armed occupation and settlement of that part of the Territory of Florida overrun by hostile bands of marauding Indians, being the special order, was taken up.

The bill having been read, Mr. BENTON rose and explained its provisions, and enforced the necessity of adopting it. He said it was the same bill, with some slight alterations in details, which had passed the Senate at the last session, and that it came now recommended as one of the measures of the Administration for the pacification of Florida. From the Report of the Secretary at War he read as follows:

"The passage of the bill introduced in the Senate during the last session, and partially acted upon in Congress, for the military occupation of Florida, would, it is believed, be attended with beneficial effects; and I further recommend that authority be given to the Executive to raise one thousand men to serve during the war in Florida, who shall receive the pay of dragoons, and, upon its termination, a bounty in land. These men it is proposed to arm and equip and drill in a manner to render them equal to the Indian warrior in vigor and endurance, and to employ them in active operations during the ensuing winter. The exigences of the service, at this particular juncture, compel me to ask this additional force. It will be seen that the state of the Western frontier requires the forces there to be increased rather than diminished, and the condition of the Canada frontier will not allow the withdrawal of the troops at present stationed there."

Mr. B. said that armed occupation was the true way of settling a conquered country; it was the way which had been followed in all ages, and in all countries, from the time that the children of Israel entered the promised land, with the implements of husbandry in one hand, and the weapons of war in the other. From that day to this, all conquered countries had been settled in that way. The Northern nations bore down on the South of Europe in that way; the settlers of the New World—our pilgrim forefathers and all—settled these States in that manner; the settlement of Kentucky and Tennessee was effected in the same way. The armed settlers went forth to fight, and to cultivate; they lived in forts first, and emerged to separate settlements afterwards; and in every instance, an interest in the soil—an inheritance in the land—was the reward of their toils and dangers. The peninsula of Florida is now prepared for settlement; the enemy has been driven out of the field. He no longer shows himself in force, or ventures a combat; but, dispersed and solitary, commits individual murders and massacres. The country is prepared for armed settlement.

Mr. B. said it was the fashion to depreciate the services of our troops in Florida; to speak of them as having done nothing; as having accomplishpo no object for the country, and acquired no eredit for themselves. This, he said, was a great error. The military had done an immensity there; they had done all that arms could do, and a great deal that the axe and the spade could do. They had completely conquered the country; that is to say, they had driven the enemy from the field; they had dispersed the foe; they had reduced them to a roving banditti, whose only warfare was to murder stragglers and families. Let any one compare the present condition of Florida with what it was at the commencement of the war, and see what a change has taken place. Then combats were frequent. The Indians embodied continually; fought our troops, both regulars, militia and volunteers. Those hard contests cannot be forgotten. It cannot be forgotten how often these Indians met our troops in force, or hung upon the flanks of marching columns, harassing and attacking them at every favorable point. Now all this is done. For two years past, we have heard of no such thing. The Indians, defeated in these encounters, and many of them removed to the West, have now retired from the field, and dispersed in small parties over the whole peninsula of Florida. They are dispersed over a superficies of 45,000 square miles, and that area sprinkled all over with haunts adapted to their shelter, to which they retire for safety, like wild beasts, and emerge again for new mischief. Our military have then done much; they have done all that military can do; they have broken, dispersed, and scattered the enemy. They have driven them out of the field; they have prepared the country for settlement, that is to say, for armed settlement. There has been no battle, no action, no skirmish, in Florida, for upwards of two years. The last combats were at Okeechobee and Caloosahatchee, above two years ago. There has been no war since that time; nothing but individual massacres. The country has been waiting for settlers for two years; and this bill provides for them, and offers them inducements to settle.

Besides their military labors, our troops have done an immensity of labor of a different kind. They have penetrated and perforated the whole peninsula of Florida; they have gone through the Serbonian bogs of that peninsula; they have gone where the white man's foot never before was seen to tread; and where no Indian believed it could ever come. They have gone from the Okeefekonee swamp to the Everglades; they have crossed the peninsula, backwards and forwards, from the Gulf of Mexico to the Atlantic ocean. They have sounded every morass, threaded every hammock, traced every creek, examined every lake, and made the topography of the country as well known as that of the counties of our States. The maps which the Topographical officers have constructed, and the last of which is in the Report of the Secretary at War, attests the extent of these explorations, and the accuracy and minuteness of the surveys and examinations. Besides all this, the troops have established some hundreds of posts; they have opened many hundred miles of wagon road; and they have constructed some thousands of feet of causeways and bridges. These are great and meritorious labors. They are labors which prepare the country for settlement; prepare it for the 10,000 armed cultivators which this bill proposes to send there.

Mr. B. said he paid this tribute cheerfully to the merits of our military, and our volunteers and militia employed in Florida; the more cheerfully, because it was the inconsiderate custom of too many to depreciate the labors of these brave men. He took pleasure, here in his place, in the American Senate, to do them justice; and that without drawing invidious comparisons—without attempting to exalt some, at the expense of others. He viewed with a favorable eye—with friendly feelings—with prepossessions in their favor—all who were doing their best for their country; and all such—all who did their best for their country—should have his support and applause, whether fortune was more or less kind to them, in crowning their meritorious exertions with success. He took pleasure in doing all this justice; but his tribute would be incomplete, if he did not add what was said by the Secretary at War, in his late report, and also by the immediate commander, General Taylor. The honorable Secretary says:

"Until the operations of the campaign were interrupted by the attempt to negotiate with the Indians, they were conducted with vigor and ability under that zealous and indefatigable officer, Brigadier General Taylor, who accomplished all that could be expected with the very limited means at his command, spread out as they were over so extensive a field of operations. Throughout the whole of this disastrous war the officers and men engaged in it have endured fatigue and privations, sickness and suffering, without a murmur or complaint, and have, on all occasions, exhibited the qualities of brave and good soldiers. With untiring perseverance they have opened roads through the swamps in pursuit of the enemy, and whenever they could bring him to battle, displayed the utmost coolness and intrepidity; in every instance driving him from his fastnesses. But all these exertions and sacrifices have proved unavailing. Heretofore the Indian population of our States and Territories has been expelled by the gradual increase and advances of a superior race. Whereas, in Florida the attempt has been made, for the first time, to drive the aborigines from the unsettled wilderness, or, what is still more difficult, to catch them for the purpose of transporting them beyond its limits. If the Indians of Florida had a country to retire to they would have been driven out of the Territory long ago; but they are hemmed in by the sea, and must defend themselves to the uttermost, or surrender to be transported beyond it. To reduce them to that extremity, spread, as they are, over a space of at least forty-five thousand square miles of country, abounding in provisions suited to their habits, defended by a climate, benign to them, but deadly to the whites, and presenting difficulties to the march of armies, that have been often described and cannot be exaggerated, will require great exertions, and probably, other means than those hitherto tried."

Such is the merited eulogium pronounced by the Secretary at War; Gen Taylor thus speaks of the men and officers under his command:

"The exertions made, the labor performed, and the privations endured by our troops, although not successful in bringing the enemy to battle, have been unparalleled. By reference to the map and accompanying report of Captain Mackay and Lieutenant Blake, topographical engineers, the length of new roads and bridges constructed, the numberof posts built or rebuilt, &c. may be seen. Besides what has been done around the Okeefenokee, and of which I have no official knowledge, it will be observed that fifty-three new posts have been established, eight hundred and forty-eight miles of wagon road, and three thousand six hundred and forty-three feet of causeway and bridges opened and constructed.

"Besides which, every hammock and swamp between Fort Mellon and Tallahassee, quite across the country, has been thoroughly searched by detachments from the several columns. The troops have been constantly and actively employed, performing their duties with the utmost cheerfulness, so long as the most remote hope existed of forcing the enemy to battle.

"The volunteers, under General Floyd, made every possible exertion to dislodge the enemy from the Okeefenokee and limits of Georgia. His report has been furnished the Department and published, from which it will be seen that the regulars under Major Loomis, 2d infantry, had their full proportion of the labors and privations of the campaign.

"After the expiration of service of General Floyd's command, a battalion of mounted Georgians was called into service under Brigadier General Nelson, acting as Major, which, together the troops under Major Loomis, have succeeded in giving entire protection to the Georgia frontier.

"A few companies of Florida militia have also been called into service, from time to time, and have aided in quieting the alarm on the frontiers.

"Whether or not the campaign was judiciously planned or properly executed, my superiors must decide; but certain it is, both officers and soldiers, of regulars, volunteers, and militia, have done their duty.

"I believe those who have been with and near me, during the whole or part of the time I have had command in Florida, will bear evidence to my zeal and exertions to carry out, in the most the prompt and effectual manner, the views and instructions of the Government."

Mr. B. repeated, that the military had done their duty, and deserved well of their country. They had brought the war to that point, when there was no longer an enemy to be fought; when there was nothing left but a banditti to be extirpated. Congress, also, had tried its policy—the policy of peace and conciliation—and the effort only served to show the unparalleled treachery and savageism of the ferocious beasts with which we had to deal. He alluded to the attempts at negotiation and pacification, tried this summer under an intimation from Congress. The House of Representatives, at the last session, voted $5,000 for opening negotiations with these Indians. When the appropriation came to the Senate, it was objected to by himself and some others, from the knowledge they had of the character of these Indians, and their belief that it would end in treachery and misfortune. The House adhered; the appropriation was made; the Administration acted upon it, as they felt bound to do; and behold the result of the attempt! The most cruel and perfidious massacres plotted and contrived while making the treaty itself! a particular officer selected, and stipulated to be sent to a particular point, under the pretext of es ablishing a trading post, and as a protector, there to be massacred! a horrible massacre in reality perpetrated there; near seventy persons since massacred, including families; the Indians themselves emboldened by our offer of peace, and their success in treachery; and the whole aspect of the war made worse by our injudicious attempt at pacification. But let the negotiator himself speak; let General Macomb give the history of this savage treachery, and show how the plan of a diabolical massacre was laid in the very provisions of the treaty itself. This is what he says, taking up the narrative, at the conclusion of the treaty:

"Matters being thus arranged, I made them some presents in token of the good feeling of Government towards them; they expressed themselves greatly gratified and understood distinctly wha they promised to perform. Chitto Tustanuggee signified a wish that there might be a trading house established on Pease creek, for the accommodation of the Indians, so that there would be no necessity for going beyond the limits assigned them, to exchange their peltries and other commodities for articles essential to them, and requested that Lieut. Colonel Harney might be appointed to establish a fort and trading house accordingly, which was all promised. Chitto Tustanuggee, with his friends, under the protection of Lieut. Colonel Harney, returned to Cape Florida, and all the others departed, on the 23d, to their respective destinations, apparently with good feelings.

"This state of things continued until the 23d of July, when a treacherous attack was made, on the detachment stationed on the Caloosahatchee river, which had been sent there to establish the trading house and post agreeably to the terms of the agreement made, on the 18th of May, at Fort King. The fulfilment of this part of the agreement was, as requested, intrusted to Lieut. Colonel Harney. Lieut Colonel Harney reports, that on the day preceding the attack, he arrived at the establishment on the Caloosahatchee, intending to remain several days; on his arrival, he found that all the chiefs who were to have met him there, had not arrived. He therefore, took the opportunity to run down to Sanybel island, at the mouth of the river, where he was actively engaged in hunting wild hogs, for the subsistence of the detachment, that he returned to the camp late at night, much fatigued, and threw himself on his couch, and fell asleep. Having no commissioned officer with him, he intrusted the post to the charge of a sergeant, in whom he had great confidence; he was awakened about daybreak, by the firing and yells of the Indians, who had got possession of the camp, and killed the sergeant and more than one-half of his men. Eleven soldiers and five citizens were killed; eight soldiers and two citizens escaped. Seven of the soldiers, taking refuge in a small sail boat, then lying off in the stream in which the two citizens fortunately had slept that night, as soon as possible weighed anchor, and favored by a light breeze, slipped off unperceived by the Indians. The colonel himself escaped with great difficulty, and after walking fifteen miles down the river, followed by one soldier, came to a canoe, which he had left there the evening previous, and succeeded, by this means, in getting on board the sail boat, where he found those who had escaped in her.

"The Indians had exhibited the utmost friendship immediately previous to the attack, but Lieutenant Colonel Harney had, nevertheless, given orders to the sergeant to take the same precaution as if he doubted their sincerity; he returned to the camp on the night of the day of the attack, but found no one living; he remained, however, at the mouth of the river until the evening of the second day after the attack, in hopes of picking up some of the party who might have escaped, but in vain.

"On Lieutenant Colonel Harney's arrival at Key Biscayne, six days after, he found Chitto Tustanuggee there with his family, waiting to be conveyed to the Caloosahatchee. Chitto Tustanuggee asserted that he had no knowledge of the hostile intentions of the Indians at the Caloosahatchee, and no participation in their deeds; and after an interview with Apiaka, declared that they would have blood for blood, to revenge the outrage. Since these occurrences, however, events have taken place, which show that these professions were of no avail."

Mr. B. said that here was an instance of treachery, of which there was no parallel in Indian warfare. With all their treachery, the treaty ground is a sacred spot with the Indians; but here, in the very articles of a treaty itself, they plan a murderous destruction of an officer whom they solicited to be sent with them as their protector; and, to gratify all their passions of murder and robbery at once, they stipulate to have their victims sent to a remote point, with settlers and traders, as well as soldiers, and with a supply of goods. All this they arranged; and too successfully did they execute the plan. And this was the beginning of their execution of the treaty. Massacres, assassinations, robberies, and house burnings, have followed it up, until the suburbs of St. Augustine and Tallahassee are stained with blood, and blackened with fire. About seventy murders have since taken place, including the destruction of the ship wrecked crews and passengers on the southern extremity of the peninsula.

The plan of Congress has, then, been tried; the experiment of negotiation has been tried, and has ended disastrously and cruelly for us, and with greatly augmenting the confidence and ferocity of the enemy. It puts an end to all idea of finishing the war there by peaceable negotiation. Chastisement is what is due to these Indians, and what they expect. They mean to keep no faith with the Government; and henceforth they will expect no faith to be reposed in them. The issue is now made; we have to expel them by force, or give up forty-five thousand square miles of territory—much of it an old settled country—to be ravaged by this banditti.

The plan of Congress has been tried, and has ended in disaster; the military have done all that military can do; the Administration have now in the country all the troops which can be spared for the purpose. They have there the one-half of our regular infantry, to wit, four regiments out of eight; they have there the one half of our dragoons, to wit, one regiment; they even have there a part of our artillery, to wit, one regiment; and they have besides, there, a part of the naval force to scour the coasts and inlets; and, in addition to all this, ten companies of Florida volunteers. No more of our troops can be spared for that purpose; the West and the North require the remainder, and more than the remainder. The Administration can do no more than it has done with the means at its command. It is laid under the necessity of asking other means; and the armed settlers provided for in this bill are the principal means required. One thousand troops for the war, is all that is asked in addition to the settlers, in this bill.

This then is the point we are at: To choose between granting these means, or doing nothing! Yes, sir, to chose between the recommendations of the Administration, and nothing! I say, these, or nothing; for I presume Congress will not prescribe another attempt at negotiation; no one will recommend an increase of 10,000 regular troops; no one will recommend a draft of 10,000 militia. It is, then, the plan of the Administration, or nothing; and this brings us to the question, whether the Government can now fold its arms, leave the regulars to man their posts, and abandon the country to the Indians? This is now the question; and to this point I will direct the observations which make it impossible for us to abdicate our duty, and abandon the country to the Indians.

In the first place, it is our constitutional duty to extend protection to the people of Florida. They are a part of our Confederacy—a portion of our Union—and are entitled to protection under the provisions of our Constitution! Defence and protection were the great objects of the Union. These objects are placed in the front of the Constitution, and extend to the people of a Territory as well as to the citizens of a State. The people of Florida have a clear constitutional right to demand protection from Congress—to demand it as a right, not solicit it as a favor. The inhabitants of the five depopulated counties are in the most deplorable condition. Driven from their homes, their houses burnt, their fields destroyed, many families massacred, and this the case for four full years past. Where is the instance of such devastation—of such desolation—in almost any civilized country? There is scarcely a civilized Government in the world which has witnessed such an event; it is humiliating and mortifying to us. It is a state of things which our Constitution forbids, and which it is the bounden duty of Congress to terminate. It is the bounden duty of Congress to restore these people to their homes.

In the next place, independently of constitutional duty, we owe assistance and protection to these people from humanity and compassion. They are white people and Christians. They are of our own race; they have suffered every extremity and every horror known to Indian warfare. The mother and the babe, the father and his children, the husband and his wife, the slave and his master, all, all, have been doomed to one undistinguished massacre. No prisoner has ever been made in this war! Let that fact be remembered. Let it be remembered that, while in every Indian war which ever took place before, some prisoners were made—some lives were spared, yet, in this case, there have been none. Every thing has perished that fell into the hands of the Indian. I know that, according to the pseudo-philanthropy of the day, while people have but a poor chance for compassian against negroes and Indians. Modern compassion is too often black and yellow, not white; the tears and sorrows of many are for the Indian that massacres a family, and not for the victims of his cruelty. I know this; still I hope, that the white Christian race wil still find sympathizers in their sufferings, and the protection to which they are constitutionally entitled.

In the third place, the interests of commerce require the peninsula of Florida to be cleared of marauders, covered with an orderly population, and subjected to regular Government. Every body knows the dangers of navigation, especially at the season of the equinoxes, round that peninsula; and every body knows that the great commerce between the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic ports and Europe, passes that way. Every fall we hear of shipwrecks in that quarter, and since these Indians have been hostile, we know that every person wrecked, who speaks our language, is put to death. Yes, death to an American citizen to speak his own language in his own country! We want a population to succor, not to murder, distressed crews. We want our light-house rebuilt at Cape Sable, which has been destroyed for years. We want law and Government there to drive off the pirates, now disguised as Indians, who make that ground their haunt, and carry on their murders and robberies under the disguise of Spanish Indians. In the name of COMMERCE, I demand the passage of this bill as the means, and the only means, of protecting vessels and their crews at that cape.

In the fourth place, the interest of the whole South, and the military and naval defence of the gulf coast, and of the gulf itself, all require the peninsula of Florida to be settled. That peninsula is the salient angle of the South: it projects five degrees beyond the general frontier line of the South; it goes down to the neighborhood of Key West; and approaches the British possessions in the Bahama islands. No military eye can look upon a map of the South without seeing in this peninsula the point of attack, and defence, for all that region. Unoccupied by us, and it will be occupied by our enemy in time of war; and there the lever would find its fulcrum which is to raise the black population of the South. It is by that means only that we can have a land communication with our naval station at Key West. In a military point of view, then, the possession of this peninsula is indispensable to us. It is a link in the chain of the national defence. It is in vain to say that we are ready for a war with any foreign power until this tongue of land is occupied by us, and fortified and defended by us.

I assume it then as a point granted, that Florida cannot be given up—that she cannot be abandoned—that she cannot be left in her present state. What then is to be done? Raise an army of ten thousand men to go there to fight? Why, the men who are there now can find nobody to fight! It is two years since a fight has been had; it is two years since we have heard of a fight. Ten men, who will avoid surprises and ambuscades, can now go from one end of Florida to the other. As warriors, these Indians no longer appear; it is only as assassins, as robbers, as incendiaries, that they lurk about. The country wants settlers, not an army. It has wanted these settlers for two years; and this bill provides for them, and offers them the proper inducements to go. And here I take the three great positions, that this bill is the appropriate remedy; that it is the efficient remedy; that it is the cheap remedy, for the cure of the Florida difficulties. It is the appropriate remedy; for what is now wanted, is not an army to fight, but settlers and cultivators to retain possession of the country, and to defend their possessions. We want people to take possession, and keep possession; and the armed cultivator is the man for that. The blockhouse is the first house to be built in an Indian country; the stockade is the first fence to be put up. Within that blockhouse, and a few of them together—a hollow square of blockhouses, two hundred yards apart, and enclosing a good field—safe habitations are found for families. The faithful mastiff, to give notice of the approach of danger, and a few trusty rifles in brave hands, make all safe. Cultivation and defence then goes hand in hand. The heart of the Indian sickens when he hears the crowing of the cock, the barking of the dog, the sound of the axe, and the crack of the rifle. These are the true evidences of the dominion of the white man; these are the proof that the owner has come and means to stay; and then they feel it to be time for them to go. While soldiers alone are in the country, they feel their presence to be temporary; that they are mere sojourners in the land, and sooner or later must go away. It is the settler alone, the armed settler, whose presence announces the dominion of the white man.

It is the most efficient remedy. On this point we can speak with confidence, for the other remedies have been tried, and have failed. The other remedies are to catch the Indians, and remove them; or, to negotiate with them, and induce them to go off. Both have been tried; both are exhausted. No human being now thinks that our soldiers can catch these Indians; no one now believes in the possibility of removing them by treaty. No other course remains to be tried, but the armed settlement; and that is so obvious, that is difficult to see how any one that has read history, or has heard how this new world was settled, or how Kentucky and Tennessee were settled, can balk, or hesitate about it. Three hundred and twenty acres of land, to be selected by the settler, and the other inducements in the bill, will attract to the country the stout hearts, the strong arms, and the enterprising spirits of the States. In no way can a young man, or a man with a family, do as much for himself, by his own means, and without capital, as by becoming a settler under this bill.

Finally, this is the cheapest mode of getting the Indians out of Florida. It will cost less money than any other mode; and that is a consideration not to be neglected at any time, and especially at the present time. The main cost will be in land, which land is now useless to us, and must remain so until the Indians are removed. The peninsula contains 26,000,000 of acres; 3,200,000 of that quantity will pay the debt which we contract to the settlers. They conquer it before they get it, and at the same time they conquer six times as much more for the United States as they get for themselves. Compare this to what it must cost to undertake to cover the country with troops under pay until the object is accomplished. Twenty millions of dollars are supposed to have been expended in military operations; and that has brought things to the point where military can do but little more. They have broken, dispersed and scattered the enemy, and cannot get a fight out of them. In two years there has been no fight—none since the affairs of Okeechobee and Caloosahatchee. There has not been an Indian killed or taken by our troops, the treacherous visiters who were detained being excepted; in two years there has hardly been an Indian killed, taken, or removed. Now how long will it take, and what will be expense, of clearing the Territory at this rate? Let any one look at what has been done for two years past, and even look at the expense of these two years, and then say how long it will take, and how much it will cost, to finish at the same rate? The fact is, the military have done their part; they have finished their part; they have accomplished what it is the part of arms to do. They have cleared the field; they have broken up, and broken down, the enemy; they have whipped all they could find; there is no longer a military operation to be performed. They have also made roads and bridges, and established many posts. The country is ready, and has been ready for two years, for settlement and occupation—armed settlement, and armed occupation—for the settlement which begings in blockhouses and stations, and afterwards spreads to farms and neighborhoods. This is what the country is now ready for; and what we have to do is to offer inducements to the exiled families to return, and to new settlers to go. Five counties have been depopulated; the inhabitants of five counties have been driven from their homes; this bill is intended to induce them to return, and others along with them. The inducements are liberal; they ought to be effective, and probably will be. Such inducements have been effective in all ages, and in all countries, and can hardly fail in this instance. Armed occupation, with a donation of land to each settler, is the appropriate way of settling new countries. It is the way this whole continent has been settled. In the present case, it is the only remaining way to be tried. Armies and troops have done their part, and prepared the country for the return of its exiled inhabitants, and for the coming of new ones.

The placing 10,000 armed settlers in the country will reverse the character of the contest. Now the contest is to drive out the Indians; then the struggle will be to drive out the whites. The burthen is now upon us; it will then be upon them. They will have to go to work to dislodge our 10,000 settlers; and this they can never do. This, then, is a master stroke. It reverses the character of the contest; it reverses the labors of the parties; it puts all the labors of the contest on the shoulders of the Indians. It gives them that to do which they cannot do; and under the full sense of the impossibility of doing which, they must soon despair and give up.

Mr. B. concluded with reminding the Senate of the Roman maxim, when a colony was in danger, and the mother country wasting time in deliberating upon the means of relief. Deliberat Roma, perit Saguntum, was their expressive maxim. Saguntum perishes while Rome deliberates; and this is truly the case of Florida. That beautiful and unfortunate Territory, a prey to savage Indians and to legalized plunderers, is in the most deplorable and calamitous condition. It is, truly, the empty and bloody skin of an immolated victim.

Mr. TAPPAN rose and said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I am in favor of the object of the bill for "the armed occupation and settlement of Florida," and deem some such measure necessary to put an end to the protracted war with the Seminoles; but while I am in favor of the object of this bill, I do not approve all its details, or believe that it will be effectual for its object without considerable change in those details.

The bill proposes to establish military posts of armed settlers, to be aided by regular troops—fortified posts with from forty to an hundred settlers in each—and to keep up and maintain these posts in such number as to require ten thousand settlers to be distributed in them over Florida, and to retain possession of them until the close of the war; that is, until they shall have exterminated or driven out the present Indian inhabitants. For this service, after the war shall be ended, and after the land shall be surveyed and land offices established, the settlers may have, as a gift, three hundred and twenty acres of land; a small pittance for such services. But, sir, be that as it may, you will not get good men for it; such men as you ought to invite and encourage to settle Florida. The men you will probably obtain, under this law, will be the idle and worthless population of our large cities; men who will accept your offer for the subsistence it offers them, and not men hardy and vigorous, who will possess and till the soil with arms in their hands; they will remain in your stockades, fattening on their rations, instead of clearing the forests and ploughing the prairies.

My friend from Missouri refers to the manner in which the land of Canaan was conquered, as an example of the manner in which he wishes Florida to be conquered. Neither the gentleman's exploration of ancient history, or mine, goes back to the first settlement of that country; but if he will revise his reading as to the Israelitish conquest, he will find that it was not precisely as he proposes to occupy and conquer Florida, that that conquest was achieved.

That conquest was made like the later conquests of Timour; it was a sweeping inundation of barbarian hordes—invading and exterminating, not a few scattered savages, hiding in the hammocks and everglades of Florida, but a civilized people inhabiting walled towns, and cultivating the whole of their fruitful land like a garden. The conquerors, in reward of their service, took immediate possession, and divided out among themselves all the lands and buildings, the silver, the gold, and every convenience and commodity which their slaughtered victims had left.

You may raise an army of settlers who will conquer and hold Florida, if you will but let them fight for, and possess their own land. How this has been done, we may learn from the history of our own country. When the Pilgrims landed on the rock of Plymouth, they parcelled out the land within their first rude fortification into small lots, and divided those lots amongst the heads of families; each family had its own house and fireside to defend, and each man had allotted to him a few acres, say five or six, around the stockade, to hold as his own property, and cultivate, for his own use, beyond this circle of home lots. Larger tracts were allotted for wood land and pasturage, as well as for grain. When the population increased, or disagreed, a new town was begun at a suitable distance, in the same manner; and so the whole country was occupied and settled by men, who, in warring against the natives, were not warring for a gift in land or money, to be paid after the natives should be expelled or destroyed, but for lands and buildings, for fields and orchards, in possession and enjoyment. You may get the same kind of bold and hardy men to conquer and settle Florida, as conquered and settled New England; but you must hold out sufficient inducements for such men to undertake its conquest and settlement. It is not the idleness and rations of a stockade which will do this, but the immediate possession and ownership of a liberal portion of the soil they combat for and conquer.

I hope, sir, that this bill will be amended so as to give the settlers a part, if not the whole, of the land you design for them, as soon as they can take possession of it; and I will then support it as a measure both useful and necessary.

Mr. PRESTON said, undoubtedly, as had been urged by the chairman of the Military Committee, it was very important that this Government should place Florida in such a condition that it might be securely occupied by the white inhabitants of the United States, and it ought long ago to have been done. It was incumbent on this Government to remove the Indians from the whole of the Territory of Florida, so as to rescue the people of the United States from their depredations and murders. No one more than Mr. P. deplored the attainment of this object, and no one more deplored the inefficient and impotent measures which had been resorted to to effect the purpose proposed. And he hoped he would be permitted to say that one great reason of the lagging condition of the Florida war, and a main cause why it had cost so much money and blood, was the want of the proper attention of Congress to the subject.

Mr. P. would have been happy as a Senator if Government had performed this duty. But they had not done it, and he believed that Congress were to a great extent in fault for the failure. He believed that the interference even of Senate, in the proper manner, might enable the South to settle Florida. He believed that, if the attention of the Senate had been given sufficiently to the subject, the Florida bill of the last session would not have passed, but some more efficient measure would have been devised. Congress, he thought, ought, above every thing else, to have demanded the attention, and excited the energy, of the War Department towards this object. This war had now been continued five or six years, with an expenditure equal to the whole amount which the United States had paid for the territory of the South and West. There had been bloodshed, and treachery, and a vast waste of money, which could not have occurred if Congress had given the subject that attention which it deserved. And this want of attention on the part of Congress had chiefly occurred because the subject had been neglected by the Administration of the country. This Mr. P. said more in sorrow than in anger. The Administration, when the war broke out, and the people generally, and especially those who were well informed, regarded this contest as a trifling affair, that would soon be terminated. It was thought that the few straggling warriors would yield at once to the mere demonstration of force by the Government. Under this delusion, the late Administration terminated, and the present Administration came in; and this war came into its hands under the expectation that the Indians would soon be captured or driven out. But the war still continued, and it would do so, unless Congress should give it their attention, and call on the Department for new determination and energy. Mr. P. believed that the dilatory progress of this war, not to say the disgrace of it, was chiefly owing to the impotence of the head of the Department. It was not at all the officers and soldiers of the army to whom this failure was to be ascribed, but the want of energy in the Department; and it was incumbent on Congress to point out the course and arouse the energy of the Department. But Mr. P. believed, and he trusted he would be able to show, that the present measure was a mere measure of delay; while they were called on, session after session, to pour out the money of the country on wild and visionary projects. The Florida war had already cost $20,000,000 or $25,000,000. Besides, the Government had originally given Texas for Florida, and they were now throwing away the country itself, for all practical purposes, and had been doing so for four or five years. Mr. P. believed that, if the late Executive could only have foreseen what was to happen, he would have dragged the whole Territory as with a net, and swept the Indians to a man beyond the Mississippi. And Mr. P. now demanded that this war should be prosecuted effectually, and terminated at once. It was demanded by the South, by the interests of commerce, and by all the duties which we owe to humanity and civilization, that it should be done at once, with the whole force and power, if necessary, of the United States.

This bill was a proposition for military colonization; for the settlement as well as the armed occupation of Florida. The conquest was to be made, not by an army, but by settlement. Mr. P. was averse to such a principle. The conquest of the country should be made at once by an adequate force, or the war should be terminated by treaty. Congress had not the power to make armed settlements. Certainly it was not to be found in the war power of Congress; and therefore, if they had a right to make armed settlements, they had an equal right to make unarmed settlements. Mr. P. believed the bill itself to be inefficient, and worse than inefficient; but, even if it were not so, was it within the power of Congress to pass it, or to provide for the armed occupation and settlement of any portion of the country? If it was so why should they not extend the principle? Why not draw a cordon of military settlements all round the frontier? The Senator from Missouri had estimated that it would cost about $4,000,000 thus to settle the Territory of Florida. Were the Senate prepared to decide that they would terminate their purely military system, and grant, in lieu thereof, one-eighth of the territory of the United States to military occupants? If this was done for Florida, Mr. P. saw no reason why it should not be done elsewhere; and he would, moreover, show that every argument which had been used by the Senator from Missouri applied not at all to Florida, but to other portions of the country.

This country had been generally settled by hardy emigrants, carrying the rifle in one hand, and the hoe in the other. Government had protected them as far as it might by its purely military powers, and had occasionally waged war on their account, The whole West had been obtained from the savages, either by war or by treaty, and the Indians, under military coercion, were compelled to observe the faith of treaties. This very practice was going on every day; and one of the heaviest items of expense to the Government, was the subsidies to the Indians for the relinquishment of their lands.

But mark the condition of Florida now, in comparison with that of the whole Western frontier. Florida lay in a low southern latitude, chiefly below thirty or thirty-one degrees. It was mostly covered with swamps and sand banks, with small intervening portions of land fit for cultivation, low and dangerous to the health of the Anglo-Saxon blood, and inviting only to those who had slaves to perform their labor. Now mark the difference between this and the Northwestern country. When settlements were made in that region, it was done by farmers, a man and his wife, who would take possession of a small productive farm for making breadstuff more than for profit. But it was not so in Florida. Who was it that would go to that country? It was not those who were willing to defend their handful of ground, and fight for it inch by inch, but those who had large property in slaves; men of wealth, who would neither have the will nor the power to defend and fight for their extensive possessions. But, in the Northwest, each family settled on a half or quarter section of land. The settlements were thus made compact, and their practice and their habits made them hardy, daring, resolute men. This was the sort of men with whom to make military settlements, if they should be made at all. But those who would go to Florida were speculators, men expecting a bounty rather than desiring to make permament settlements; and Mr. P. would now venture the prediction that if this bill should pass, a thousand even of such could not be obtained in ten years.

What, then, could be expected from a measure of this kind, and in what time could it be carried into effect? And suppose you should now call for settlers, how many (said Mr. P.) would you get within the year? You would not get five hundred. What is become of those who had gone there already? Sir, five or six counties have been deserted and desolated. And why? Because they would not hazard themselves and their moveable property in that country. Estates that were bringing in $10,000 and $12,000 a year have been abandoned, though they had the United States troops to protect them. And those who were fit to go there would not go to such a scene of robbery and murder. But if you could advertise for such a war in the West—proclaim, for instance, that Ross and his men were to be driven out by military settlers, and you would find the tide of emigration quite rapid enough to take possession of that country, while nothing in this way could be done in Florida. It would languish under a system not adapted to it, while other portions of the country were rapidly settling.

Sir, to prolong the time of effecting this object is a matter of the highest consideration. Will any one say that Florida cannot be conquered? If the head of the War Department will say so, very well. So let it be; and we can then devise some method of settlement. But I believe that it can be conquered, and that it can be done now. And I will go further. If Congress had taken the right course at the last session, the result would now have been otherwise. And if the gallant General who figures so lagely in the pacification of this contest—I believe if he had not been sent on his errand of peace and mercy, peace and security would have been now restored. But no one, says the gentleman from Missouri, proposes any other than this measure, and it is, therefore, this or nothing. Sir, I believe this is nothing, and worse than nothing, because it will serve as a pretext for avoiding more vigorous measures.

General Scott was first sent into that country; but there was a gentleman who superseded him, and that gentleman, having operated in his own way for some time, at length came to the conclusion that the original project formed by General Scott was the true and only one which could be effectual. And I believe the people generally fell into the notion that if Scott had not been superseded, the war would have been terminated at most by one or two campaigns. His plan was the establishment of a multitude of posts, with flying squadrons, who should hunt up and drive the Indians from the country. And I believe this is the true and only effectual plan. Those Indians are now, and they have been always, more or less subject to no particular chief, or to no order or discipline. They are now, especially, dispersed, and subject to no particular chief. They are irregular bandits, and the object, therefore, is to clear from these bandits a country of difficult access. A campaign can last only from October to April, and this time is to be taken advantage of, and they are to be cleared from the country as were the bandits of Italy.

Sir, I will not go so far back as the Senator from Missouri, for I am not so well versed as he or the Senator from Ohio in the history of the Jews But I have known a case of more modern date, in which the bandits of Italy were driven out by Bonaparte. He beat up the Pontine marshes, and every man of them fled, or was captured. This is what ought to be done in Florida.

General Taylor adopted the plan of posts and marching squadrons; and was apparently on the point of success, when our General-in-chief was sent with the olive branch. He had forty posts north of the head waters of the St. John's, and they had possession of the whole of that country. The plan thus devised had been adopted by the Administration, and it was arrested only by the mission of General Macomb. And it is the only method that can successfully be resorted to by the United States. It is not for me to make suggestions, except such as appear on the face of the proceedings in that country. This plan was once adopted; and no one can say that it has failed, for it was arrested by General Macomb. Let it be again adopted, and if there is not force enough, send on ten, fifteen, twenty thousand men, and it will cost but a tithe of what this system requires. Put them under the command of an efficient General, Taylor or Clinch, or the General-in-chief; send him there, and, instead of the forty posts taken by General Taylor, let him establish two hundred if necessary, with marching squadrons. Place such a cordon of posts across the peninsula of Florida, and the country would be swept by ten thousand men, so that there would not be an Indian left in the Territory. And this would permanently be the case, if, in addition to these, there should be some in the rear kept up with small forces.

These fastnesses of Florida are now filled by a strange intermixture of negroes and savages. It is an asylum for runaway negroes; and do you propose to send a slave population there, who will have every inducement to join the Indians? Sir, you must first clear the country as with a military net, and then will settlements be made, and not till then; and I believe, if 10,000 men were entrusted to Generals Taylor or Clinch, this project would be immediately carried through.

Sir, I am disposed to infuse energy into this enterprise, and assist it to the utmost, by the whole country, if necessary. I am willing to aid the Department in any way. I believe this measure did not originate with the Department; but, wherever it originated, it is too inefficient. Having already spent from $20,000,000 to $30,000,000, let us now put an end to it, at whatever cost. I would have humanity extended to the Indians in the utmost degree that is compatible with the interests of the country. Our object is not to kill, but to catch them. This process must be gone through; and if lands are to be given, it is better to give them somewhere else, to those who will catch these Indians.

Mr. P. concluded with the declaration that he did not oppose this bill as giving too much power, but as inefficient and impotent. He was sorry now that this bill was rejected at the last session, for otherwise its inefficiency would, by this time, have been practically proved.

RED RIVER RAFT.

IN SENATE, Jan. 8, 1840.

The bill making appropriations for the removal of the raft in Red river, was read a third time; when

Mr. CRITTENDEN was understood to object to the bill that the measures heretofore reported to for the destruction of this raft had been very inadequate. Only a very narrow channel had been made, and consequently new obstructions were continually occurring.

Mr. SEVIER said that he would reply to the Senator, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] and he hoped to be able, in a few words, to satisfy him that this bill should pass. The Senator labors under many mistakes in regard to this work. It is not, as he supposes, a small affair, a narrow and a short channel. The original length of the raft was about one hundred and fifty miles; and the whole of it has been removed, and that, too, at an expense to the Government of some two or three hundred thousand dollars only.

What has been the consequence of this removal of the raft? That river has been made navigable for steam boats of a large class. The Government has been enabled to supply their military post at Towson in the Indian nation, at a saving in the item of transportation of supplies alone, of more than the whole cost of the work. That post, sir, can never be abandoned. It protects our citizens against Indian aggressions on the one hand, and against the lawless citizens of a foreign power on the other. And any officer of this Government who should manifest so utter a disregard to the public interest of this country, as to recommend an abandonment of that post, let it cost what it might to support it, could never atone for his madness and folly. Sir, that garrison must be kept up at any expense. And I am happy to state on this occasion, that this military post is deemed as important to the public interest by the Secretary of War as it is by me. And before I take my seat, I shall ask to have his communication to me upon this subject read to the Senate. By that communication you will learn that he urges Congress to pass an appropriation immediately to remove the late formations in Red river, at the head of the raft, and states that the expense of supplying the post with provisions, &c. this spring, by land, will cost the Government more than it will require to remove this raft. Unless the raft is removed, he will have to supply the post by a land transportation of 140 miles, and to do this, he estimates the cost at $45,000, and he urges the appropriation to be made without delay. And why? Because if not done immediately, the sum of forty-five thousand dollars will have to be expended in hauling the supplies by land from Fort Smith, on the Arkansas, to Towson, on Red river; and the Senate will please bear in mind that this expenditure of forty-five thousand dollars is only for one delivery of supplies. A similar expenditure will be required annually, unless the raft is removed.

The Senate will also recollect that, the river being choaked up by drift wood at the head of the raft, every log which floats down that river will add so much more to the expense of removal. The annual increase of the raft is from one to three miles. We must also recollect that the raft is in a southern latitude, and after the month of April or May you cannot get hands to work in the water. Such work, at a late period of the year, invariably produces disease and death.

As I before remarked, the whole length of the raft is about 150 miles, and, of this distance, nearly the whole of it has been opened as wide as the bed of the river. Where it has been thus opened, the navigation is good, and there are now no longer any impediments to the navigation; and all of it would have been opened as wide if the engineer had had money enough. He opened it as wide as he could with the means he had at his disposal. And has the Government lost any thing by this enterprise? Far from it. In consequence of the removal of the raft, you have reclaimed from inundation at least 1,500,000 acres of the best cotton land in the world—land which, before the removal, you could not have touched with a ten foot pole, has been drained, sold and settled. The returns from your land offices will show you that you have received, from the sales of this reclaimed land, upwards of a million of dollars; which goes to show that this is one of the few works of internal improvements which has been a source of profit to the United States.

Sir, in the midst of the raft, one of the most flourishing towns in the State of Louisiania has grown up, containing now, I have understood, a population of several thousands. This town is Shreeveport. Sir, this is not all. The removal of the raft has enhanced the value of all the lands above it, and where there was before but a sparse population, we have now dense settlements of the wealthiest citizens of my State.

They, sir, are interested in this work as well as the Government; so much so, that when this narrow channel at the head of the raft, of which the Senator speaks, was first obstructed with drift wood, they raised and advanced, as he tells you in his report, seven or eight thousand dollars, to enable him to remove it, so far as to enable four steamboats, which was then ladened with their cotton above the raft, to get back through it. And, sir, with the money thus raised, the Government boats, ladened with supplies below the raft, were enabled to get up to the garrison and back again.

Since then, sir, which was last spring, this narrow channel has again filled up; and has, in a manner, cut off supplies to our troops, and prevented my constituents from getting their cotton to market. I hope, sir, with these hasty explanations, that the Senate is now satisfied.

The bill asks an appropriation of $85,000—the sum estimated by Capt. Shreeve, which is to be found in our documents. A part of this, say $11,000, is to reimburse the expenditure of that sum over and above the last appropriation, being the $7,000 advanced by my constituents, and $4,000 by the superintendent himself; the sum of $5,000 to repair the boat, &c.; and there are several thousand more for tools, and for stopping bayous, &c. to render the work permanent. A detailed estimate of all these doings will be found in the report to which I have referred.

In conclusion, sir, I will ask for the reading of the letters of the Secretary of War, and of Generals Jesup and Gibson.

[The letters were read.]

Mr. PIERCE said he did not rise to oppose the bill, but he desired information. When the appropriation was made in 1838, he certainly understood that it was to finish the work, and such was the language of the act. Still, if that was not sufficient, more should be appropriated. The removal of the obstructions in that river was of vast national as well as local importance, and he desired to see the work completed in such a manner as to make the improvement permanent, and secure the greatest utility. But how long were appropriations to be asked? What amount was to be expended there? Either the original estimate was singularly erroneous, or it would be difficult to render a satisfactory account of the amount already expended. If gentlemen would turn to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, on harbors and rivers, made at the first session of the Twenty-fourth Congress, they would perceive that "a careful examination of the part of Red river which includes the raft," was made during the summer of 1829, and the cost of the removal estimated at $25,000. That sum was accordingly appropriated. In 1832, there was another appropriation of $22,628. In 1833, fifty thousand dollars more was appropriated; in 1835, fifty thousand more; and on the 30th day of September, 1835, the excess of appropriations beyond the original estimate was $122,688. In 1836, forty thousand eight hundred dollars was appropriated. The estimate must have been very accurate then; they regarded even hundreds; but in 1837 they came back to round numbers, and the appropriation was sixty-five thousand dollars. In 1838, there was appropriated seventy thousand dollars "for the complete removal of the great raft in Red river." Thus upon a work, the original estimate for the completion of which was twenty-five thousand dollars, there has already been expended three hundred and seven thousand four hundred and twenty-eight dollars; and now, at the expiration of ten years, after the expenditure of this enormous sum, eighty-five thousand dollars more was demanded. With regard to the past, Mr. P. had nothing to say, except to state the facts. What was the prospect for the future, he was curious to be informed. It would be no satisfaction to him to be referred to the engineer's estimates. All experience proved that they could not be relied upon. To support this assertion, he referred to every river and harbor for the improvement of which appropriations had been made, from Plymouth beach, Mass. to Red river raft, La. The difference between the estimated and actual expense of the last named work would be found to be a fair sample of most of the others. He had not taken the trouble to ascertain by whom these various surveys and estimates had been made, but a clever Yankee would guess better than these gentlemen had estimated, in many instances, from their surveys. That the interests of the Government, to say nothing of the region of country where the raft is situated, required that something should be done in this case, was sufficiently obvious; and he thought it equally clear that an inquiry ought to be instituted into the causes of the very extraordinary discrepancy between the estimated cost and actual expense of the twenty-five different works named in the document before him. The reports, so far from having served as a guide and a safe basis of action, had been calculated only to mislead.

Mr. SEVIER said he would say in reply to his friend from New Hampshire, [Mr. PIERCE,] that he had never had occasion to examine in detail, to ascertain whether, generally or always, the cost of completing works of internal improvement exceeded the estimates. These examinations more appropriately belonged to committees, to which it had never been his honor to be a member. They might, or might not be, as he stated, so far as he knew, and there might, or might not be, good reasons for the discrepancies, if any existed. But in regard to the performance of the work now under consideration, he would say, if he would allow him the privilege of a Yankee, that he would guess that this appropriation would be large enough to make the work permanent. The timbered part of the river above the raft, was short; about 400 or 500 miles. The river above this run generally through immense prairies, where there was little or no timber. The timber on the banks of the river was disappearing every day in the progress of settlement. The settlements are made upon the bank of the river, and the timber which adjoins the habitations of the settlers is used by them for houses, rails, fuel, &c. and, of course, the timber used for any of these purposes so far diminished the quantity of timber that can descend the river. The settlements are rapidly forming, and will in a few years be contiguous to each other, and then the timber will measurably disappear. But, sir, should I be mistaken in this, I tell my friend now, and will tell him again, that so often as the navigation of Red river is obstructed, that I, sir, shall rise here in my place and ask for money to remove the obstructions. Do not let him, or any other Senator, suppose that I accept this appropriation in full of the demands upon the Treasury for this purpose, should a further sum be required. I make no such bargains.

Mr. MOUTON said that the appropriation also made provision for the constant employment of a boat, wite adequate means to keep the raft from forming.

Mr. KING said he entirely agreed with the Senator from New Hampshire that the estimates had failed of accuracy in both Houses of Congress, and they had been led into vast expenditures in consequence of false estimates. In general, that Senator would find Mr. K. with him in endeavoring to save the public money. But in regard to this work, no correct estimate could be made at the commencement. It was necessary to feel the way. The engineer was asked how the work could be done, and at what expense; and his first success had astonished the country, had opened the commerce of the river, and greatly increased the value of the land. But the channel having been narrow, it was difficult to keep it open, and the raft had also extended higher up. Mr. Shreeve was now about to attempt to make the opening permanent, and the estimate before the Senate for that purpose was $70,000, including a reimbursement for what had been done by private enterprise.

In addition to clearing away the raft, perhaps they would stop up the bayous to help the river to force its way. The whole estimate, including this, might be set down at $85,000. The committee had reported the bill under the full conviction that the work could be made permanent at this expense.

Mr. DAVIS said he was not in committee when the bill was accepted; but he had no objection to it. He had, however, understood that the last appropriation would complete the work; and he now hoped this would do it. The matter had been well explained by the Senator from Arkansas, and Mr. D. hoped, when the subject of the Lakes should come up, he would make as good an argument for them as he had done for his own river.

Mr. D. stated that he had four years ago moved a call on the Department on the subject of the public works, and a document had consequently been published, showing the estimates and expenses from year to year. From this it appeared that some were below, and some vastly beyond, the estimates. But Mr. D. regarded as the principal cause of this, that the estimates had often been made by one set of engineers, and the work performed by another; the original plans having often been altered and made more expensive. Mr. D. was also understood to say that the Secretary of the Treasury had objected to any restraint on the Department on this point. The views of engineers differed very greatly, and it was doubtless sometimes best to modify the original plan.

After a few more remarks to the same effect by Messrs. PIERCE and DAVIS, the bill was passed.

SPEECH OF MR STRANGE,
OF NORTH CAROLINA,

In Senate, Friday, January 10, 1840—On the bill for the armed occupation and settlement of that part of Florida overrun and infested by marauding bands of hostile Indians.

Mr. STRANGE rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I do not know that I should envy the stoicism of one who could address this august body with perfect composure. For my own part, it is one of the severest trials I am ever called on to encounter. It is especially so on the present occasion, formally called upon, as I have been, by the honorable Senator from South Carolina.

When that Senator did me the honor to make his special call, he doubtless supposed that I was an opponent of the bill. The expectation of the Senator was not groundless. I shall be compelled to vote against the bill solitary and alone, I fear, so far as the friends of the Administration are concerned; and, I greatly fear, with the whole body of the Opposition. Under circumstances so appalling, I trust I shall be excused for trespassing a short time upon the Senate.

For a man to find himself in some vast terra incognita—some wide, dense forest—some dark, unfathomable cave—might excite some feelings of apprehension; but to be suddenly surrounded by a body of men, in whose principles he had no confidence, and on whose benevolence he had no claim, would excite emotions in the stoutest bosom; and one anticipating such an event, might be excused should he forearm himself. I refer, of course, to the political principles of the gentlemen of the Opposition; neither my convictions nor my politeness would allow me to go further.

It is always distressing to find one's self voting against his friends and acting with his enemies; and on such occasion explanation is necessary. I am not ambitious to be found an actor in a politico-dramatic representation of a scene which is said to occur in heaven over a sinner that repenteth. Nor would I have my friends suppose that I am posting to that half-way house, the pathway to which, like that to the lion's den, exhibits footprints but in one direction. Why, then, it may be asked, have I not fallen into the current, and united with my friends in support of the bill? I answer, that I feel but little responsibility in opposing it, believing, as I do, that it will pass without my vote; and should the experiment succeed, I think I shall not be denied a participation in the family jubilee; and no one will enjoy the triumph more than myself; and should it fail, as I believe it will, I shall enjoy that privilege for which many are willing to participate in ruin produced by the plans of others—a privilege gilding, like a rainbow, the cloud of adversity of every opposition—the glorious privilege of saying, "I told you so." But were it otherwise, and my vote would defeat the bill, I should tremblingly assume the responsibility, and consign it to that capacious tomb where the Capulets repose.

My reasons are sufficient for self-justification, and I will submit a portion of them for the judgment of others.

Surprise is confessed on every hand at the duration of the war in Florida; and all acknowledge with a sigh that a stain has fallen on the national glory. Florida, that beautiful land, whose name is music, and which calls up so many poetical associations, has, for four years past, been swept by the besom of destruction. Millions of money have been expended, and thousands of noble hearts have bled to arrest the plague. It still rages with unabated fury, and the inhabitants of middle Florida, though far removed from the scene of war, dwell in precarious safety. Our feelings have been harrowed day after day with some new tale of cruelty and blood. The unsuspicious settlers are broken in upon—the cradled infant is torn from its repose—its little neck is writhed by savage hands, or its brains scattered abroad in fragments. The heart's blood of the mother is poured out on her own hearth-stone; the gallant father hath already perished in a fruitless effort to bar the entrance of the intruders, while the savage retires to his lair deriding the power of the United States.

Has the bird of heaven lost the lightning of his eye, or the strength of his talons, that a loathsome reptile should creep to his nest and devour his offspring, even beneath the shadow of his broad wing? He seems hardly conscious of his bereavement—his plumage is scarcely ruffled with indignation, and the gorged reptile is suffered to glide away in safety.

It was not always thus—some sad change has come over us—the atmosphere is infected—it is unfit for respiration—and patriotism gasps for existence. What is this pestilence—this malaria? It is luxury and the love of gain; these have ever driven out valor, honor, and patriotism, where they have entered. The downfall of Sparta takes its date from their introduction by Agis the first. In Athens, Pericles enjoys the bad eminence of having fully introduced these evils with their train of consequences.

A learned commentator, on the history of that people, has written what I beg leave to read to the Senate:

"There is no mark which so surely indicates the reigning manners of a people at different periods as that quality or turn of mind which happens to be the reigning object of public applause." * * * * * "Thus, in the infancy and rise of the Grecian Republics, when necessity of self-defence had given a manly and warlike turn to the temper of the people, and the continuance of the same necessity had fixed it into a habit, the love of their country soon became the reigning object of public applause. As this reigning object consequently became the chief object of desire to every one who was ambitious of public applause, it quickly grew to be the fashion. The whole people in these States glowed with the generous principle of public virtue to the highest degree of enthusiasm. Wealth had then no charms, and all the bewitching pleasures of luxury were unknown or despised."

How descriptive of the former and present condition of our own country!

The same causes operated on the decline of Rome, which may be dated from her conquest over Antiochus the Great. Upon this subject the same commentator, to whom I have before referred, remarks:

"Public virtue and the love of their country, which had raised the Romans to the empire of the universe, were extinct. Money, which alone could enable them to gratify their darling luxury, was substituted in their place. Power, dominion, honors, and universal respect, were annexed to the possession of money. Contempt, and whatever was most reproachful, was the bitter portion of poverty, and to be poor, grew to be greatest of all crimes in the estimation of the Romans."

Alas! how rapidly are the people of the United States hastening from the former to the latter state of public sentiment.

In modern history Spain, chivalric Spain, presents a sad picture of the debilitating effects of wealth on patriotism and public virtue.

John Taylor of Caroline, (one of the greatest American statesmen who has ever lived, and whose works should be in the hands of every youth in the country, and for a republication of which Congress had better make an appropriation, than for many less worthy objects,) speaking on this subject, has prophesied a similar destiny for our country, as the fruits of our funding and paper system, the only hope of defeating the fulfilment of which prophecy, is in arresting its cause. But it is not merely the effects of effeminacy and indolence, flowing from luxury and the love of wealth, of which I speak. Those effects are as numerous as the forms which Proteus could assume. The most important effect of luxury and eagerness for wealth, is a perfect monopoly by the latter of the public mind, whether that mind exists among the people at large or in the Government. The acquisition of wealth engrosses the mind of each individual, and all his powers, both physical and intellectual, are tasked to work to the best advantage that mighty engine, the paper system.

At an early period of its history, the Government was called upon for assistance by those for whom the machine did not operate to their entire satisfaction. They called upon Hercules, and like its good natured prototype in heathen mythology, the Government came to their assistance. Its gigantic muscles were exercised for their benefit until they began to insist that, neglecting all other business, it must devote itself exclusively to their service. Even in this Chamber it has been urged that one of the most important duties of Government is to provide a sound paper currency. For many years the Government kept on tinkering, as some would call it, with the currency until it began to find that it was only benefiting a few brokers and shavers, to the injury of itself and the people at large; and that if a sound paper currency was ever formed, it could never be by any joint operation between itself and individuals or corporations. It then attempted to withdraw itself, but had become so entangled in the complexities of the machine that this was found impossible. It had caught a Tartar, and however willing to let its captive go, found itself, in turn, a prisoner. With a wise and valiant spirit, however, it continued the effort, and during the whole period of the Florida war the chief business of the Government has been to disengage itself from the embraces of the paper system with as little injury as possible to the community. What wonder, then, that with all its powers and resources so fully engrossed, many important matters should have been totally neglected or badly executed?

In connection with this, was the tendency of these causes to centralization. In the eager pursuit of wealth, and the regulation of the paper system, both individuals and the Government naturally looked chiefly to those places where money most did congregate. The monetary pole and the pole of the earth pointed in the same direction. Like some huge animal, the United States, stretched out from north to south. In the former direction was its head, and from thence extended southwardly its vast chest, vitals, and bowels.

Whatever danger might threaten these, or seem to threaten, excited at once his sensibility, and put him in the attitude of defence. From thence far to the southward, stretched out a long insensible tail. It might be trodden upon—it might be wounded, or even cut off, and the only indication of suffering exhibited, would be a groan, or at most a surly snarl.

He would not rise from his recumbent posture, lest the delicate operations of the credit system might be incommoded.

These influences were felt among all classes of people, and paralized the heart and the limbs of the nation. They affected alike the Government and its agents, and it was not to be expected that the army should escape its influence.

"It is a far cry to Lochow," is a saying among the highlands of Scotland, by which is signified their security in the remoteness of their mountain fastnesses from the vengeance of the Lowlander, for deeds of violence. It is a far cry to Florida—it dies away in the distance, ere it can reach the national sensorium, under the lethargic influences to which I have referred. No voice reaches to inform us of the real state of affairs, and every one was evidently laboring under a gross delusion at the beginning of this war. It was believed to have had its origin in the insubordination of a single savage, and to depend for its continuance upon his skill and valor. Could Oceola be either slain or taken, it would terminate at once, was the general impression. When the idle Athenians anxiously inquired, "is Philip dead?" some one would reply, "No; but he is very sick." Then would the indignant Demosthenes exclaim, "What avails it to us whether Philip be either sick or dead? Were Philip dead to-morrow, your own folly and supineness would quickly raise up another Philip." And such has been the illustration in our own story. Oceola has been long since dead, and leader after leader has sprung up, until every naked savage among the wilds of Florida is an Oceola!

Yes, Oceola is dead, and in his death has disclosed another of the fatal effects of the paper system, imparting a fierceness to party strife, and severing in twain the different portions of the nation, and so arraying them against each other, that when the traitor, crimsoned with the blood of our women and children, is taken, and dies in confinement, he is mourned over in this hall as a patriot and hero, the victim of perfidy and oppression. How can the soldier fight when his arm is thus held back—when he is kept halting, as it were, between two opinions, doubtful whether it is his duty to retreat or advance upon the foe; conscious that if he strikes and is successful, he will be charged with perfidy and cruelty; and if he does not, he will be accused of indolence or cowardice. Similar to this has been the condition of the Government. If supplies are called for to carry on the war, the Government is charged with extravagance and profligacy. If supplies are not called for, it is accused of incompetency or disregard to the groans of the dying, and the welfare of the living.

All these things cannot fail to produce their effect on the army. It is composed of men who must, consequently, be subject to all those influences by which men are affected. It cannot be denied that the war in Florida has reflected discredit on our arms. The Seminoles ought to have been conquered. No adequate cause presents itself for such entire failure, without reflecting some discredit on those who have been engaged in the war. My friend from New Hampshire, [Mr. PIERCE,] has referred to similar occurrences in La Vendee and Circassia. But those cases appear to me to be totally dissimilar to the one under consideration. La Vendee was a fine, thickly settled province of France, containing people civilized and intelligent, regularly organized in military bodies, and boasting of La Roche, Jacquelin, and others, among the most distinguished leaders in France. The war against that people was simply to subdue, not to destroy or remove. Our own Revolutionary war has shown how difficult it is for a greatly superior force to subdue men determined to be free, unless actual extermination is resorted to. To use a homely phrase, you may whip them, but they will not stay whipped. Our assault on Florida ought not to have been for the mere purpose of subduing; it was a war of defence. There was no reason why it should not be carried to extremity. We have no purpose to suffer the Indians to remain in the country. Our design was to drive them out alive, or drag them out dead; and the work, once effectually accomplished, required no repetition.

The Circassians inhabit a peninsula, it is true, somewhat resembling Florida, but they have defended themselves by presenting an impregnable breastwork at the very entrance of the peninsula, and driving back their enemies, or retiring merely to rally, but never permitting the foe to gain a foothold behind them. Thus their internal affairs have been conducted with but little interruption. Far different has been the case with the Florida Indians; they have fled before us, and suffered us to traverse the peninsula at pleasure. Their mode of warfare has borne a much stronger resemblance to that of the ancient Scythians than any other. They have exposed our troops to perish by the climate and by natural causes, rather than by their arms. Yet the difference between ourselves and those who made war on the ancient Scythians is very striking. The difficulties with which they had to contend were real; ours are almost imaginary. The Scythians led their pursuers through interminable deserts, where there was nothing to sustain existence, being themselves prepared, by long habit, to endure almost incalculable privations, by the half of which their adversaries perished. The climate, too, was one to which their pursuers was altogether unaccustomed, and were, therefore, ill able to bear.

In Florida, the country, it is true, is difficult to pass, but not impenetrable; it is neither desert nor destitute of food; its climate is such as is embraced in a part of our own land, but a degree or two further south than other portions of our country, which have long been inhabited. The climate may be unfriendly to the health of our troops, but there is no reason why it should be considered fatal. It is far from my purpose to cast any unjust censure upon the army or its officers, but it is my duty to treat this subject boldly and plainly. I would not willingly wound the feelings of man, woman, or child. But this matter must be honestly probed, and, as far as possible, the cause of the disease laid open. And I cannot but think, and, therefore, cannot but say, there has been some gross mismanagement on the part of those who have been engaged in this war. A partial apology may be found in the total ignorance of the country in which it was to be waged, when the war commenced. But that apology is daily losing its force. The main cause of failure I believe to exist in the unsuitable character of the force employed.

This has not been a war for regulars; it should, in my judgment, have been conducted by undisciplined, or but partially disciplined, volunteers. Our whole experience seems to me to be in favor of this position. Nearly all our successes against the Indian tribes have been by militia forces. Going back as far as Braddock's defeat at Fort Duquesne, the superior fitness of militia to regular troops for Indian warfare, was exhibited; and you, Mr. President, well remember the effective character of volunteer troops at the battle of the Thames. In support of this opinion, I am fortified by conversations with intelligent men from Florida, both in and out of the army; and I have a letter to the same purport, received from a quondam member of Congress early in this session. It is very obvious that this must be the case. Each class of troops is fitted for its peculiar field. The Macedonian phalanx in ancient times, presented to a foe an impregnable front on level ground, but was totally inefficient among hills and valleys.

I have thus glanced at some of the causes of the existing evils, preparatory to a consideration of the remedy. It is a classical maxim, "Happy is the man who is able to discover the causes of things." I may be wrong in my view of the subject, but I believe the paper system, paralyzing the heart and limbs of the body politic, has given rise to secondary causes which have produced the sad effects we have so long deplored. But a glorious light is breaking in upon us, and the clouds are dispersing. The Government will have soon disengaged itself from the paper system; the political atmosphere is returning to its native purity, and patriotism will once more breathe freely. Gulliver has nearly succeeded in breaking the threads by which the Lilliputians have bound him to the earth. Sampson is disengaging himself from the embraces of Delilah, and rising in his strength. Separated from the maddening influence of pecuniary interest, party spirit will become calm and rational. The golden apple of discord will no longer be found in this hall to disturb our councils, and prevent their efficiency. We shall come to the calm consideration of the interests of the people at large, and pursue it with undivided aim. Let us, then, seize the first moment of this auspicious era for adopting the most effectual means for the relief of Florida. Let us give to the matter the most earnest examination; and, having considered it in all its bearings, decide promptly and wisely. The bill under consideration presents to us one plan; and the first question to be decided is, shall we adopt it? To those who believe it is the best within our reach, I would say at once, give it your support; but believing, as I do, that it is not only not the best, but will be totally ineffectual, I should be a traitor to my country, and a traitor to my party, were I to give it my support.

The bill, I confess, meets me with a prejudice against it. My constituents, I believe, are opposed to donations of the public lands in every form; and it would be difficult to convince them that this was not, in fact, a donation. But the people, whom I have the honor to represent in part, are a generous and patriotic people, and would be willing to surrender not only the public domain, but their private fortunes, and even their very lives, rather than an insulting foe should be permitted to maintain his footing on their country's soil.

Passing by, then, this matter of prejudice, I come to others more important in the consideration of this bill—its efficacy and its economy.

If it is not the most economical, unless it be decidedly the most efficient, it should not be adopted. And unless the most efficient, however economical, under existing circumstances, it should receive no favor. For my own part, I fear it is neither economical nor efficient. In the first place, I am led to doubt its economy, because the title of the United States to the lands proposed to be settled, is at least doubtful. That whole country, to use a common phrase, has been shingled over with Spanish titles. Some of them have already been tried, and all of them so tried, have, as far as my information reaches, been decided against the United States. The Alagon title, I believe, covers the very land particularly described in the bill; and as I wish to have no concealments, but am perfectly willing to lay open my heart, that every one, if possible, may see the springs of its action, I, frankly confess that I have myself a small claim under the Alagon title. This has made it my interest to give that title some examination, and I must say that I am unable to perceive its defects. My impression may be erroneous, but I believe, on examination, it will be found that the United States has no title to the land covered by the Alagon grant.

In this state of things, the price we may be paying to armed settlers, is exceedingly doubtful; the period at which the title may be settled, is uncertain, and no one can say what at that time may be the value of each settler's location.

Whatever it may be, the United States must warrant to him its possession, or will have failed to fulfil her engagement with him. Who can say what sums the settler may have expended in its improvement? And all these he must be reimbursed, or injustice will be done him. He will justly exclaim, you have put but a barren sceptre in my gripe, and cheated me with promises, which you have not fulfilled, unless he is fully indemnified for the increased value of the land he may lose, and the expenditures he may have put upon it. Again: The measure is not an economical one, if the Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLAY] is right, as I believe he is, in saying the conquest of the country can be achieved upon much better terms. I believe with him that there are plenty of gallant spirits in his own, and others of the Southern States, who would obey the call of their country, and drive out the Indians for no other rewards than those of glory, patriotism, and the consciousness of having performed their duty.

The measure further strikes me as being deficient in economy, inasmuch as it preserves no just proportion between the service rendered and the compensation paid. There is no means of computing the duration of the war,. It may terminate immediately, or, like the maroon war in Jamaica, may continue for three quarters of a century. In the one case, the compensation will vastly exceed the labor and privation to which the settler would be subjected; in the latter, it would fall incompably short of it. Economy consists in some just apportionment between labor and compensation. A spirit of gambling must be the inevitable result of the uncertainty of the labor and privation by which a certain reward is to be gained. And that is the very spirit which our country has every reason to deplore, as poisoning its political and moral health. Lastly, upon the score of economy, I fear, if this measure succeeds at all, it will only be through the aid of an army, as large and expensive as would be sufficient to drive out the Seminoles without it.

But, as I said, if the measure is the most efficient let us adopt it without much regard to its economy. But I fear, even in this particular, it will be found grossly deficient. That it will prove efficient is an affirmative proposition which he who lays it down should prove. I have listened to the Senator from Missouri in his effort to establish this position, but he has failed to convince me. I have too often witnessed his powerful array of facts and figures, to be unconscious of his capacity of supporting his cause when on the side of truth. I have too often sat by and looked with triumph at the sturdy blows he has dealt on the heads of his enemies and mine, to underrate his reasoning faculty. When, then, with his effort and his powers, I have not been convinced, I am satisfied that nothing convincing can be said on that side of the question. Nor is this all. With all my deference and respect for the opinions of that Senator, when I find him standing almost alone against the rest of the world, I am forced to doubt the firmness of the ground he occupies. It is true others vote for this bill, but no one else seems to urge its claims to favor with much confidence. Out of this chamber I have conversed with many intelligent men, and I have heard no one express the belief that it would prove efficient. Many have expressed a belief to the contrary; and this very morning I have received a long letter from a gentleman in the army to the same purport. But I am told it has received the approbation of the Administration, and is recommended by the Secretary at War. This, I confess, would be with me a strong argument in its favor. No one in this Chamber has a higher respect than myself for the talents and patriotism of that officer. But, as I read his notice of this measure, I rather take it as an authority against than for it.

"The passage of the bill introduced in the Senate during the last session," says the Secretary, "and partially acted upon in Congress, for the military occupation of Florida, would, it is believed, be attended with beneficial effects." If this is to be taken as an endorsement of the bill, I must say that it appears to me to be in characters so faint, that they are scarcely legible; and should an attempt hereafter be made to hold the Secretary liable for the success of the measure, it would, I think, be exceedingly difficult to establish the handwriting. Had he heartily approved the plan, or reposed much confidence in its success, we should have seen more of his characteristic zeal and firmness in its advocacy. But he has, as it were, damned it with faint praise, and withheld from it the decided sanction of his name. In this he has acted wisely, for the measure is obviously an experiment, which, so far as I know, has never before been tried during the history of the world. With great deference to the Senator from Missouri, it is, I think, altogether unlike the case of the Jews, or the former settlements in our own country. The case of the Jews can never fairly be drawn into precedent. They were emphatically a peculiar people. God himself was their leader, and with his own arm drove out the heathen from before them, as he had previously promised. Their successes were not the ordinary results of human means. So far, however, as human means were used as secondary agents, they were, according to my understanding, very different from those proposed by this bill. The whole Jewish nation proceeded en masse in their conquests; and, as was remarked by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. TAPPAN,] they found houses ready built, and fields and vineyards cultivated, (and such grapes, by the way, have never since been seen,) of which they took possession. By the command of Heaven the former inhabitants of the land were destroyed, and a curse fell upon whomsoever was backward in the work of destruction. One tribe only who, by subtlety, obtained assurance of safety, was permitted to live. But even that tribe fell under the curse of Heaven, and was made slaves to the Hebrews. After taking possession of their land, the Jews dwelt like other nations, pursuing the ordinary occupations of life. Not in armed husbandry, but frequently called upon, like other people in early times, to defend their land against invasion, returning again when they had driven off their enemy to their fields and vineyards.

There is, perhaps, more resemblance in the case of our Western settlers. But even there the difference is great. The face of the country in which our Western settlements were formed, was very dissimilar to that of Florida. There continuous and boundless extents of fertile lands stretched out, and settlements could be formed compact and of any size. The necessaries of life grew almost spontaneously—at least very little labor was required to produce them. There was no desire to capture the natives, or to destroy them; all that was wanting was to keep them at a respectful distance. This was readily enough done, for there was a vast country behind upon which the savages could fall back, and very willing were they to avail themselves of it. The white men, wherever they came, spoiled their hunting grounds, and it required no force to induce them to go where game was more abundant: Thus rolled back, like the successive ocean waves; the natives were but little in the way of the advancing settlers. The reverse of all this is the case in Florida. That country, if I am correctly informed, consists of swamps, hammocks, and poor pine ridges. The former of these require draining, at considerable expense, ere they can be made useful, and I do not know that it has been ascertained that they are sufficiently fertile to repay this expense. The hammocks, the only land certainly valuable, are, I am told, not sufficiently large to admit of any considerable settlement in one body, and that, besides this, the timber is so thick and heavy as to defy the efforts of any single laborer to place the land in a state of tillage in the course of one season; so that, so far from being able to fight, and feed himself, too, it would be more than the laborer could accomplish to draw from his land a lean support with the utmost toil. The remaining lands or pine ridges would not, I suppose, of themselves, hold out temptations to any settlers. The object of invading Florida is not to occupy and maintain it in the face of the natives, but to force them out of it—a very different operation from inducing them to fall back. The latter would be impracticable if it was desired, for there is no country for them to fall back upon; no choice would be left them but victory or death, by famine, or the sea surrounding them on every hand. It is this, probably, which already renders them so ferocious, and causes them so frequently to break in upon the settlements. Nothing short of forcing them from the country would answer any purpose, or at least the great purpose in view—the safety of the present white settlements.

But if the proposed plan could succeed at all, it will be altogether too slow in its operation. It would take months, in the first place, to procure the necessary number of settlers, and several more to get them to the scene of operation; and many more, I fear, under the most favorable view of the subject, before the anticipated effect would be produced of forcing the Indians to capitulation and removal. In the meantime, Middle Florida would continue as now the scene of alarm and butchery. Your posts would still be passed by ways known only to the savages, and plunder and bloodshed be visited upon the settlements. What we want is an immediate remedy for the pressing evil. Some plan that will keep the Indians constantly engaged in their own defence, so as to leave them no time for rapine, until their overthrow is completed.

I may be asked, why not give the plan proposed a trial? If it can do no good, it may be said, it will do no harm. That is what I cannot admit. No plan will now, in my judgment, prove entirely neutral. It is a maxim in philosophy, that no two bodies can occupy the same space at the same time. And if this plan is attended with no other evil, it will serve, to some extent at least, to displace a better. It will consume, in an experiment, precious time that should be energetically devoted to the deliverance of Florida.

There is a certain mode which I believe cannot fail, and I am therefore for adopting it at once. It is the good old plan of opposing thews and sinews to thews and sinews. I am no friend to expedients. I have been opposed to substituting paper for gold and silver; and I have no confidence in any substitute for the usual materiel of war. I am for employing at once a sufficient military force to explore the country, and pursue the Indians into every nook whither they may fly for refuge. This, I believe, can be done. Our soldiers may plant their footsteps wherever they shall plant theirs. I have no idea that they possess any faculty of travelling without leaving a trace by which they may be pursued. They have no such powers as the Scythians would intimate for themselves to Cyrus, (I think it was,) when pursuing them, by sending him a frog, a bird, and a mole—signifying that unless he could swim like the first of these animals, fly like the second, and burrow like the third, the pursuit of them would be vain. But I would employ in this pursuit volunteer militia. Regulars, as I have said, I do not think adapted to this service, for reasons which it would be tedious to explain. The maroon war in Jamaica more nearly resembles that in which we have been engaged with the Seminoles in Florida than any that occurs to me, of which we have any account in history, whether we look to the character of the persons against whom, or the circumstances under which, it was waged. An interesting account of that war is furnished by Mr. Edwards in his History of the West Indies.

"In the year 1655, (says that writer,) Jamaica was conquered from the Spaniards by the English, under the command of Amiral Penn and General Venables. The Spaniards are said to have possessed about one thousand five hundred slaves, who escaped and retreated to the mountains, from whence they made frequent incursions to harass the English. Major General Sedgewick, in a letter to Secretary Thurlough, predicts that these blacks would prove a thorn in the side of the English. He adds that they give no quarter to his men, but destroyed them whenever they found an opportunity, scarce a week passed without their murdering one or more of them; and as the soldiers became more confident and careless, the negroes grew more enterprising and bloody minded. Having no moral sense, and not understanding what the laws and customs of civilized nations mean, we know not how to capitulate or treat with them. But be assured they must either be destroyed or brought in upon some terms or other, or else they will prove a great discouragement to the settling of the country."

How much does this seem like a picture of our case, and how apposite is the conclusion to which Gen. Sedgewick comes to our circumstances. These Maroons, (or as the word signifies, these hog hunters) continued to annoy the British settlers in Jamaica for upwards of forty years, during which time forty-four acts of assembly were passed, and £240,000 in money expended, and lives without number sacrified. And here allow me to remark that this is a sufficient answer to such of the English as choose to flout us with the great duration of the Florida war. About this time were fought two battles:

"Which (says the historian) so reduced the strength of the Maroons, and filled them with terror, that they never afterwards appeared in any considerable body, nor dared to make any stand; indeed, they had never once ventured a pitched battle, but skulked about the skirts of remote plantations, surprising stragglers and murdering whites by two or three at a time, and when they were too few to make resistance. By night, they seized the favorable opportunity that darkness gave them of stealing into the settlements, where they set fire to cornfields and outhouses, killed all the cattle they could find, and carried the slaves into captivity. They knew every secret avenue of the country, so that they could either conceal themselves from pursuit, or shift their ravages from place to place, as circumstances required."

How like, in all respects, the conduct of the Seminoles! In 1733, a new mode of warfare was adopted against them. Troops were employed to scour the roads and mountains and destroy the provision gardens and haunts of the maroons. "Every barrack was also furnished with a pack of dogs, provided"—by whom do you think? By the church-wardens—"provided by the church-wardens of the respective parishes"—it being foreseen that these animals would prove extensively serviceable, not only in guarding against surprises in the night, but in tracking the enemy. This was a decided improvement upon their former mode of fighting; but the settlers had not yet discovered the most effectual plan of warring with these savages. "About the year 1737, the assembly resolved on taking into their pay two hundred of the Musquito Indians, to hasten the suppression of the maroons." These troops, with others of the same description, made it a practice to observe the most profound silence in marching on the enemy's quarters, and when they had once hit upon the trail, they were sure to discover the haunt to which it led. "They," says the historian, "effected considerable service, and were, indeed, the most proper troops to be employed in that species of action which is known in America"—by what name do you suppose?—'bush-fighting" Within one year after this bush-fighting was introduced, the Maroon war was over; the Maroons "were reduced to so miserable a condition by famine and incessant attacks, that they afterwards declared that, if peace had not been offered them, they had no choice left but either to be starved, lay violent hands on themselves, or surrender to the English at discretion." Thus it is I am for assailing the Seminoles in Florida. Following the light of history, I am led to this course; and even those who may differ with me cannot deny that I speak upon good authority. The only way of bringing such a foe to terms, is by constant and ceaseless pursuit; giving them neither time for rest nor for the gathering of food, while, at the same time, you deprive them of opportunity for rapine and destruction. This can only be done by scouting parties, accompanied by dogs. Without these, the whites may almost pass over them as over a partridge in the heather, without perceiving them. But the dog destroys their conscious security, and his instinct is ever exposing them to their pursuers. Yes; I am for resorting to the bush fighting volunteers, and for employing the dogs also. And I go still farther. When I had assembled my volunteers and my dogs, I would make proclamation that every Indian warrior who came in by a certain day should be spared, humanely treated, and transported to the land originally promised beyond the Mississippi; but that all taken afterwards should be hung upon the gibbet. This threat should be executed. I am aware there is a mawkish sensibility prevailing upon this subject, entitled, in my opinion, to but little respect. Thus, when the gallant Hernandez captured Oceola, sensibilities were felt in this Chamber, not for the victims of the ruthless Indian—the women and children he had butchered—the widows and orphans newly made by his murders—but for himself and his comrades, who had providentially fallen into the pit they had digged for others. When will men learn to look at things as they really are, and not suffer themselves to be carried away by mere prejudices and unmeaning distinctions? One great name will mislead a thousand unthinking followers; and I doubt not that the Earl of Chatham has given currency to many false notions of humanity in conducting war, by his famous speech upon the employment of Indian allies against us in our Revolutionary struggle. For his opposition to that measure, the noble lord merits the gratitude of every American; and had he been a little more consistent in other acts with his virtuous indignation on that occasion, would have justly challenged the admiration of the world. But even Lord Chatham, in that celebrated speech, so far from urging any thing against the employment of bloodhounds against the Indians, rather, I think, furnishes me with an argument in its favor:

"Against your Protestant brethren, (said he,) to lay waste their country, to desolate their dwellings, and extirpate their race and name with these horrible hellhounds of savage war—hellhounds, I say, of savage war. Spain armed herself with bloodhounds to extirpate the wretched natives of America, and we improve on the inhuman example of even Spanish cruelty; we turn loose these savage hellhounds against our brethren and countrymen in America."

Lord Chatham considers the employment of Indians by the British, against their Protestant brethren, an improvement upon the use of bloodhounds by the Spaniards in pursuit of the harmless natives of America. The Indians he describes as hellhounds, and places them in ferocity far beyond the bloodhound. He could not, of course, object to the employment of the bloodhound against the hellhound, laying, as he does, the stress of his argument, in his appeal to his countrymen, on the savage cruelty of the Indians, classing them with the inhabitants of the infernal regions. But we have not only the argument, but the example of Lord Chatham for the employment of what he considers worse than the bloodhound, when occasion requires. In a note to his Statesmen of the Times of George III, Lord Brougham remarks:

"A circumstance attended Lord Chatham's eloquent invective against our employment of the Indians in the American war, which we have not handed down to us along with it, but which could hardly fail to be noticed at the time. The very same thing had been done in the former war carried on in Canada by his own authority and under his own immediate superintendence; the French had arrayed a tribe of these savage warriors against us, and we, without scruple, arrayed another against them. This he thought fit to deny in the most positive manner, although the ministers offered to produce documents, written by himself, that proved it, from among the papers in the Secretary's office. A warm debate ensued, and at length Lord Amherst, the General who had commanded our troops in that Canadian war, was so loudly appealed to on all sides, that it compelled him to rise and most unwillingly (for he greatly respected Lord Chatham) falter out a few words; enough, however, to acknowledge the fact—a fact admitted generally, and even assumed by the Lords who spoke afterwards. Upon hearing what had passed in the House of Lords, Lord Bute exclaimed with astonishment, Did Pitt really deny it? Why, I have letters of his still by me, singing Io Pæans over the advantages we gained through our Indian allies."

Thus it is abundantly proved that Lord Chatham employed means on one occasion which he denounced on another, and I do not know that there was any reprehensible inconsistency in his so doing; and I doubt not that those who now profess a sickly sensibility upon the subject of means to be employed against the Seminole Indians might easily be placed in circumstances to prove themselves just as inconsistent. But Lord Chatham's denial of the fact is without explanation and without apology.

How absurd is it for one who has witnessed the cruelties inflicted upon the unoffending inhabitants of Florida, the destruction of their property, and the murder of their women and children, to object to any mode of protecting them, from a sickly apprehension that the mode proposed might bring his humanity in question. Every species of warfare is cruel, and can only be justified upon the great principle of self-defence, and the justification extends to every case where the principle applies; and never was the principle of self-defence more strictly applicable than in the case under consideration. Indeed, judging by experience, I am much inclined to think that the use of dogs may be advocated upon the very ground that it is the most humane mode of warfare under the contemplated circumstances—the least productive of suffering and death. In proof of this, I will resort again to the Maroons. In 1795 another Maroon war broke out in Jamaica. The Assembly naturally set about devising the most speedy mode of bringing it to a termination.

"It was natural for them [says the author which I have before cited] to recur to the experience of former times, and to inquire into the measures that had been successfully adopted in the long and bloody war which, previous to the treaty of 1738, had been carried on against the same enemy. The expedient which had been resorted to, of employing dogs to discover the concealment of the Maroons, was recommended as a fit example to be followed in the present conjuncture."

He proceeds to say that they determined to engage a sufficient number of Spanish dogs and huntsmen from the island of Cuba. The author remarks, that

"The Assembly were not unapprized that the measure of calling in such aid, and urging the canine species to the pursuit of human beings, would probably give rise to much observation and animadversion in the mother country. Painful experience on other occasions had taught them that their conduct in the present case would be severely scrutinized with all the rigid and jealous circumspection which ignorance and hatred, and envy and malice, and pretended humanity and fanaticism, could exercise."

To this it was replied, that the safety of the island, and the lives of the inhabitants, were not to be sacrified to the perverse misconstruction, or the wilful misrepresentation, of the mother country. Mr. Paley, the great moral philosopher, was cited, who declares:

"If the cause and end of war be justified, all the means that appear necessary to that end are justifiable also. This is the principle which defends those extremities to which the violence of war usually proceeds; for since war is a contest by force between parties who acknowledge no common superior; and since it includes not in its idea the supposition of any convention which would place limits to the operations of force, it has naturally no boundary but that in which force terminates, the destruction of the life against which force is directed."

It was, therefore, justly concluded, that humanity was no way concerned in the expedient proposed, or in any other by which the enemy could be most speedily extirpated. The enemy was not an unarmed, innocent, and defenceless race of men, but a banditti of assassins, and tenderness towards them was cruelty to all the rest of the community: a reasoning, by the way, which seems conclusive in the case now under consideration. The dogs were sent for, which being known among the Maroons, such was the terror it inspired, that within a very few days afterwards, and before any of the dogs were actually employed, the Maroons all surrendered at discretion, and were shipped to Halifax, as we propose to do the Seminoles to the westward of the Mississippi. And thus was an expedient, denounced as cruel, made a second time instrumental in putting a termination to war and bloodshed. I would adopt it again, in connection with the volunteers and martial law, and I have no question but it would prove effectual. In the execution, or rather the threatened execution, of all the warriors taken after the proclamation, I have much confidence, as I understand the Indians, in common with ourselves, have a special horror of that mode of death.

This is a general outline of the plan I should devise; the details and the number of volunteers to be employed, I leave to the proper department in which I have every confidence. My province is not that of a general, or the head of a Department. I speak as an American statesman—an humble one it is true; but the duties of that station have devolved upon me, however incompetent I may be for their fulfilment. In an effort to discharge those duties, I express my belief that the bill under consideration will not serve for the relief of Florida, but that a plan, something like the one I have suggested, will. But I call upon my country to do something. Adopt the bill under consideration if you think it best; but if not, adopt some other, and that speedily. Let the wounds of bleeding Florida be staunched. And let it not be said in the language of the Senator from Missouri, "deliberat Roma perit Saguntum,"—while Congress deliberates, Florida perishes.

ARMED OCCUPATION OF FLORIDA.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, January 9, 1840.

The bill for the occupation of Florida by armed settlers being again under consideration,

Mr. CRITTENDEN rose and said: The Florida war has become a matter of distinguished importance, and the measure which is now under consideration is therefore entitled to our soberest and most deliberate regard. In the various disappointments which have been experienced of our hopes of the termination of these hostilities, we have cast about our minds for the reasons of this protracted hostility, and for the means by which it might be brought to an end. Notwithstanding these disappointments, I had indulged the hope at one time of the quiet settlement of the Territory by some means within the usual and legitimate powers of this Government. But from this measure I do not believe that there is one good result to be anticipated, and I think the bill ought not to pass.

Mr. President, every consideration of economy, of humanity, and of honor, requires that this war should be speedily terminated by the most effectual measures within the power of this Government; and there will be very great danger that ineffectual or slow measures will have a tendency to prevent the adoption and prosecution of measures more effectual. The adoption of an inefficient measure, therefore, would be unfortunate, not only on account of its positive uselessness, but on account of its diverting the Government of the country from means which might be used successfully to terminate the war.

How far, then, Mr. President, is this bill calculated to effect the attainment of this object? An invitation is here to be sent out to 10,000 settlers able to bear arms, and they are to occupy—what? Is it the forests, the hammocks, the paths, or even the most secure portions of the country in its natural state? No, sir; they are to occupy places of defence; they are to put up in block-houses, and even there they are to be aided by the military forces of this Government. They are to receive, even in these garrisons, the protection of the military of the United States. The number of settlers in each garrison is not to be less than 40 nor more than 100. Suppose you get 5,000 settlers; it will require one hundred garrisons and fastnesses to be occupied by them; and they are to construct these defences by the aid of the troops of the United States, with special protection from them at first, and general protection afterwards. You are first to bring these companies of armed settlers into existence; then you are to construct 100 fortifications for them by the aid of your military, and you are to protect them by means of the military. Sir, can all this be done in twelve months? To effect this measure, therefore, the war must be suspended for one year, while you prepare the means of fortresses and garrisons, and carry on the war after that. Heretofore, the military have acted to protect the frontiers of the settlements. Now, in the heart of the settlements, you are to build 100 fortresses. And what military will it require? Will the whole be more than is necessary? You have devoted their services to a new object altogether. Will it require the whole force now to guard the settlers shut up in garrisons?

By the first section of the bill these individuals are called settlers. But in what sense? They are required by the terms of the bill to inhabit garrisons, and to carry on a savage warfare under the protection of your military, in perfect security, in impregnable fortresses, with the addition of a military force. And they are thus to remain in idleness and security—till when? Till the termination of the war. And the whole time they are to be fed and clothed at your expense. And to do what? Nothing; absolutely nothing. They are to be given the free use of the land adjacent for cultivation. But to what extens will they cultivate it? What is the inducement for them to labor even without danger? Sir, you have taken away the only inducement which civilized men ought to have. You have agreed to feed and clothe them, and for what else will they labor? Will you send them into a dangerous wilderness, and hold out to them the inducements of merely raising productions for a profitable market? What motive to action have you left to such a settler? You feed and clothe him, for which he is required to perform no service. Sir, will he fight? Will he pursue the savage either to catch him or to drive him out? No, sir, no, sir; they will all occupy their garrisons, receiving as a gift their food and clothing, and there they will do no hing till the war is ended. They will remain under a consciousness of perfect security. They are required to do nothing. Why then should they seek the Indians? They will not be required to do so by the law, and why should they do it? If they do it at all, it will be from a mere spirit of voluntary adventure.

Sir, it appears to me that we should make a great miscalculation if we should suppose these garrison citizens of yours to resemble, in any degree, the hardy and resolute pioneers of the West. They drove out the savages; but what was the inducement there? In the first place, while receiving no bounty or supply from the Government, with a determined spirit, they entered the wilderness, with wife and children, without any means of subsistence but the rifle and the plough; and if they cleared and cultivated fields, it was necessary to war with he savage even beyond their bounds. In that way, with the rifle and plough together, they subdued and settled that great wilderness. But you have not therefore any right to expect that men secured in garrisons, shut up and protected, fed with public provisions, clothed at the public expense, taken care of by the public arms, and even with the hopes of reward for all this passive security and sustenance—sir, you have no right to expect from them any thing like the efficient services and gallant achievements of the pioneers of the West. You throw away at the outset all the inducements which led to such results, and you have therefore no right to expect them. Sir, I believe in my heart that this measure will fail to accomplish any useful and patriotic object.

Sir, whoever was the author of the bill, it will naturally tend to the results which I have named. It may be a question, indeed, whether any thing effectual can be done for the prompt and quiet settlement of Florida. Perhaps it cannot be settled as the West was settled; but whether it can be, or not, I am perfectly persuaded of the inefficiency of this measure. It is far worse than idle and useless. The inducements which you hold forth for settlers are such as will address themselves most strongly to the most idle and worthless classes of our citizens. And when you get them there, you cannot, by the method you propose, alter their character, except for the worse. What men of industry and enterprise will engage for twelve months, with the hope of clothing and food, to be collected into squads, to be immured in garrisons, shut up from all those salutary influences which arise from good order and morals in society? Sir, what can you expect from those that are brought together by such inducements, and to live such a life? There is more reason to believe that they themselves will be converted into savages, than that they will drive the savages from the Territory.

Sir, I would not exaggerate; I would utter nothing from party prejudice. But what do you expect from this measure? Let gentlemen ask themselves this question; and then let them ask further, do you expect any service from these men adequate to the expense? If to be shut up in garrisons, to be fed and clothed twelve months at the public expense—if this is public service—then public service will doubtless be done. And what are you to pay for it? You are to give to each of these men 320 acres of land at the conclusion of hostilities; and, if there are 10,000 of them engaged in this sedentary service, their whole compensation will be 3,200,000 acres of land. And what will be its value? Will it be less than from five to ten millions of dollars? Sir, the privilege of selecting 3,000,000 from 30,000,000 acres of land—is not this itself a privilege worth $10,000,000? Is this the best way to apply the public property? If it is not, you ought not so to apply it. You are the guardians of the public interests; and you are therefore called upon to decide whether this is the best way to apply this amount of property.

But let me take another view of the subject. If this bill could be carried out, and if each of these men would make a settlemen on his land as his resource and future home, there would be at least some consolation for this loss of the public property. We might, at least, thus help in raising up useful and respectable citizens. But do you remember, sir, that in your last war with Great Britain you offered as a bounty to each of your soldiers 160 acres of good land, all fit for cultivation, to be surveyed and laid off at the expense of Government? And what became of the land? Did your soldiers after the war retire to the homes you had thus provided for them? Did they become freeholders, converting their arms into ploughshares? Did they go to work on their bounty lands? No, sir; every gentleman here knows that almost the whole of this portion of the public domain was squandered and given away by these prospective settlers, through speculation and fraudulent bargains, from one end of the country to the other. These claims were to be had in any number you pleased, at any of the auctioneers' or brokers' shops in this city, at from $20 to $50 each. That was then the result, and depend upon it, these 320 acres which you are to give to each settler in this case will be swallowed up in the vortex of exactly the same sort of speculation. Had we not then better adopt another mode? Let us pay them as we pay our regular soldiers. The pay in money is fixed and certain; but here you give land which is uncertain; and, in the mean time, the soldiers, or rather the speculators, will, on the whole, always get the advantage of us. Why then, adopt this mode? Are you unable to raise money for this war? Can you get enough neither of the constitutional currency nor of Treasury notes to keep up a strife with 600 or 700 miserable savages? Is that the condition to which we are reduced? Sir, if this system is adopted, and these men must be paid, without any service in return, let them be paid in money; it is but equal justice to them and to the rest of your soldiers; and you will know then what you are giving, which now you do not. On this plan, one settler may get what ten more will not get. And the measure is unjust to the Republic, because the expense will, on the whole, be more than if paid in money. It is unjust, further, because it will result in an advantage to the monopolists of land. While your own lands are settled at the usual price, these 3,000,000 will be within the grasp of speculators for some $40 or $50 or $100 a patent for 350 acres.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] has said nearly all that can be said on this subject. I believe, with him, that this measure will not be successful in the termination of the war. The war has been now in progress four years, and to this day there is no end of it to be seen; and unless this, like all things earthly, must end, we might say that we are now as far from the end of it as ever. Yet we have already spent $25,000,000, and how much of life and blood I cannot sum up. During the whole period, Congress has done every thing that has been called for. Sir, has the Department made a single demand of money or of men which has not been granted? Of money and of military no amount has been asked for that has not been promptly granted. Under these circumstances, has not the nation a right to ask whether the war shall still go on at yet more than this disgraceful length? We have given all that the Executive authorities asked, as much and as soon as they asked it. Why, then, have they not finished the war? Have the troops failed to maintain their character in the view of the country, or to perform their duty to the Government, through want of spirit, bravery, or perseverance? Can you attribute this failure to the troops? Sir, no country ever had a braver soldiery, and braver have never been in the American service. Distant, inglorious, and obscure as is the scene of action, they have gone on through difficulty and danger; not a murmur was heard; and they have endured and died in your service without a groan, cut off by the climate and the enemy; falling unknown and unheard of, obscurely swallowed up in that vortex. Your soldiery now and heretofore have done and endured enough to weave a laurel worthy of the brow of this Republic. They have there shed their blood and deposited their bodies on the soil; and what do we find for such a sacrifice? Where are now the public laurels? Are there any of them? Not a leaf. and what is the reason? If we have given all that has been asked; if the soldiery have well and bravely done their duty, where are we to look for the responsibility for all this disgrace? Who is accountable for this disastrous war—for this long-protracted public ignominy? Sir, I know of no other than the Secretary of War. We are not competent to determine on the movements and operation of the war, or of the skill of this or that manœuvre, or of the qualifications and conduct of one and another General; and we cannot look to them; we must look to the head of the Department, who manages and regulates all. I look not to this or that action, or the army or the particular year; but I look at the general aspect and progress of the war; and I look to the Secretary of War as responsible for these general results. In his hands we have placed the means of the war, plenty of men and money; he has had the Treasury and the whole military power of the country at his command for four years. And what has he done? Look at the report of the Secretary of War. He there says 45,000 miles of your territory is in the possession of the savages, and the enemy retains it after a four years' war. You are staggering, exhausted, under what will not bear the name of a war—a skirmish with 600 savages. And are the means not enough? If they are not, why not ask for more? If the means are insufficient, we ought to have known it; it is a matter which not we, but the Secretary of War is to determine. If four or five thousand men were ineffectual, was it not his business to know it? If 20,000 men were wanted, we ought to have known it from the Secretary of War. Why, then, did he not call upon us? Would not the expense have been less in a few months, with 20,000 men, than to continue thus feebly and ineffectually to squander your treasure? Sir, I speak of this as a national misfortune, not unmixed with shame and dishonor, which never existed to such a degree since we were a nation. This war is unexampled in point of expense and bloodshed, with an enemy so small, and not only with no glory, but public disgrace. I desire that the whole history of this war may be given, so that it may be shown whether there is any apology for the Secretary of War; and, if it should appear that his conduct is justified by the circumstances, give him at least that advantage. There is no nation that would not do it. But we ought to weigh this matter well before we take it into our own hands, and out of those of the Executive, to relieve him of the disgrace and responsibility, and bring them upon ourselves. If the Secretary of War has regarded this matter as a trifle for four years, is he now awakened to a consciousness of his past error? And is he now prepared with plans to put an end to it?

And what are those plans? Sir, his explanation of them is about equal to the war itself. He says, before the war is brought to a conclusion, it may require other means than have yet been tried. But what are they? Under this vague communication what does the Secretary propose? Has he yet any definite idea on the subject? Or, by his ambiguities and oracular mysteriousness, does he mean to keep the way open for other schemes and other means, which he fears must yet be tried before the war will end? In that conclusion we will all concur with him; but we should like to have known what those other means are. Sir, I would not dictate what he is to do in this war, but I demand his plan, and I say the nation has suffered enough by these vague and irregular proceedings. What is his plan? And how many men and how much money does he want to carry it into execution? Let him take them, and be responsible for the results. This is the way in which all Governments proceed.

His other means are yet locked up as the arcane of state. There is, indeed, a suggestion in the message, that he will want 1,000 more men. But these are not other means. He says, furthermore, that from this bill he expects very beneficial results. And that is all. Beneficial results! and he wants a thousand more men, and other means may be raised!

Sir, believe me that it affords me no pleasure to make imputations on any person; but I do not hesitate to make them where it seems to be required. Still I would rather now deal with the subject than with the Secretary. But we can look only to the Secretary for the loss of $25,000,000, for the great amount of national character that is gone, and for the much blood that has been shed. Sir, the Secretary tells us that 45,000 miles of our territory is in the enemy's possession; and so far from our making any encroachment upon them, they ravage and ruin our settlements, with murder and fire, along the whole frontier. Is not this a disgrace? And ought we not to wipe it out as soon as possible? I believe this bill is not the most adequate means of doing it. The exigency demands other means, which we ought to apply. I will not say but it would be better to adopt the mode of catching, instead of killing; and, in that case, I would advise you to offer $1,000 reward for every one of the Indians that shall be taken as a prisoner. That would be an inducement; and, though I pretend not to prophesy, I am not afraid to venture that such a measure would be very effectual. Men would then engage in the enterprise of the exact character required. They would inhabit no garrison; they would not sleep in peace and security, furnished at the public expense with provisions and clothes. They would hazard their lives to seek the enemy, and their whole object would be to find them, without which their whole labor and peril would be lost. And, if they caught them all, it would be at a public expense of only some thousands, instead of millions.

Sir, I beg pardon of the Senate for the time I have occupied on this subject; but I have been impelled to it by a sense of duty; and I have spoken from no personal spirit of asperity toward any human being, but merely out of feelings of sorrow and regret at this unhappy and unfortunate warfare. We are all equally intent to adopt the best mode of ending it, the friends of the Administration no less than others. They were almost simultaneously commenced, and almost the whole of Mr. Van Buren's term has been consumed upon this war. And those who regard this Administration like a bright luminary, shining on the footsteps of those who have gone before, must at least admit that this Florida war is a black and bloody spot upon it; nay, that it surrounds it like a black line, blotting it out, according to the doctrine of some—a consummation which the friends of the Administration will think is most devoutly to be avoided. I therefore think it best to call on the Secretary of War for his plan as to this war, and let him tell us how many men and how much money are wanted, and thus leave the matter to the proper Department, taking the just degree of responsibility by suggesting a plan and asking for the means to carry it into effect. I think it the more appropriate and judicious course.

Mr. PIERCE said: Having determined to support this bill, not without some hesitation, it was my intention, after the full and minute exposition made by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. BENTON,] to give a silent vote; and I should have done so, but for the extraordinary course of argument pursued on the other side, and the sweeping denunciations of the Executive in which gentlemen have chosen to indulge—denunciations which I cannot but regard as wholly unwarranted and unjust. If Senators will withdraw their thoughts from these general charges of a want of zeal, forecast, and energy on the part of the Executive—lay aside all prejudices which such charges may be calculated to engender—and consider for a few moments the nature of the territory in which our troops have operated, and must continue to operate—the character of the foe—our present means, and the condition of that country—they will be more likely to do justice to the distinguished individual now at the head of the War Department, whose conduct in relation to the operations on that ill-fated peninsula, I have, during this debate, heard censured for the first time, and much more likely to adopt those legislative measures which the exigencies of the case, with a full view of all the difficulties and embarrassments with which it is surrounded, may require. There is much truth in a remark of Gen St. Clair in the introduction to the history of his own disastrous Indian campaign. He says: "In military affairs, blame is almost always attached to misfortune; for the greatest part of those who judge (and all will judge) have no rule to guide them but the event." Now, sir, in this country, there has never been a case where the event of military operations was so much calculated to lead the mind to erroneous, unjust, and uncharitable conclusions as those which we are now considering. That the Florida war has, in all its aspects, been most disastrous and melancholy, many of us feel—all are ready to admit. The blood of our patriotic citizens has been poured out there like water, the lives of many of our most able officers and faithful soldiers have been sacrificed, and the resources of the nation have been drained in a hitherto fruitless attempt to remove cruel, artful, and treacherous bands of savages, whom no treaty obligations can bind, and whose tender mercies are manifested in the deliberate and indiscriminate murder of helpless infants and defenceless mothers. Now that portions of our army, varying from four to ten thousand men, should have been, during the last five years, within our own territory, in a conflict with remnants of savage tribes, not embracing at any time, it is believed, more than twelve or fifteen hundred warriors; and that, with the exception of the roads and improvements which have been made, the geographical knowledge that has been acquired, and the experience gained, which, I trust, we shall not be disposed to disregard, we are in a condition hardly better than that which called our troops there in the first instance, is certainly very extraordinary upon the face of it; and yet, if gentlemen, here and elsewhere, will carefully examine this map, make themselves acquainted with the topography of the country, and notice the fact that, below a line drawn from Tampa Bay to a point near New Smyrna, nothing was known to any white man of this immense territory; that it was wholly unexplored except by the savage, who was familiar with all its recesses and fastnesses; that in almost every direction it was impassable for troops, and especially for baggage trains; that for long distances together a column could not advance, without constructing corduroy roads; that, in consequence of the deadly climate, the active campaigns could only be continued from October to April; that the foe would show himself but at places where he could not be reached, except at the greatest disadvantage; and that his force has always been divided and scattered over this extent of 45,000 square miles, their wonder at this want of success will cease. They will see that it has arisen from natural causes, from causes which no human sagacity could foresee, turn aside, or overcome. The Senators on the other side, I have been pleased to notice, have done justice to the officers and soldiers who have served in those campaigns. Never was commendation better merited. Never were men sent into such a deadly climate, upon such disheartening, thankless service. There is, and has been, nothing to stimulate individual ambition, and the dangers of the climate alone have equalled all the dangers of active campaigns under ordinary circumstances. Still the spirit of our countrymen has not been wanting, even there. A single instance of shrinking from duty or from danger; a single instance where the fight has not been sought when there was a prospect of bringing on an engagement; a single instance, in a word, where a soldier's duty has not been performed in a manner becoming a soldier of the Republic, has not come to my knowledge. No, sir: surrounded by disadvantages, and environed by circumstances chilling to military ardor, there has been on all occasions an exhibition of bravery, of cool, determined courage and patient endurance, not surpassed in the history of any warfare Here, at least, we concur in ascribing no fault, in passing no censure.

It would have been gratifying to me if Senators could have regarded the conduct of the Secretary of War in a similar spirit, because, to any generous mind, it is painful to be forced upon subjects of censure; and in this instance, I believe the foundation of the charges to be entirely imaginary. If the Secretary is to be held accountable for the disasters of that war, it is important to him and to the country that these denunciations assume a form somewhat more specific; that the charges be made so definite as to admit of a definite answer. Now, sir, I call upon the Senators from South Carolina and Kentucky [Messrs. PRESTON and CRITTENDEN] to inform us where they find the evidence of the Secretary's impotence and want of energy; where and on what particular occasions has it been manifested. From the date of his first official letter to General Jesup, in March 1837, to the present time, do gentlemen find any thing to censure in the instructions given to the different commanding officers in Florida? If so, what instructions? Do they object to the suggestions of the Secretary in his various reports, except that in relation to the measure now under consideration? If so, let them be indicated. We shall then have something to direct our inquiries, something upon which the judgment can rest. But now we can only meet these general charges by as broad and general denials, and support such denials by calling the attention of the Senate to what the Secretary has done. To this, without reading copious extracts from the documents on your files, I shall briefly advert.

Soon after he entered upon the duties of his office, he received from General Jesup intelligence that the war in Florida was over, unless renewed by the imprudence of the inhabitants. This hope proved like similar hopes previously indulged—illusory. In the August following, propositions were again made by several of the chiefs for peace; but the Secretary, as the correspondence and public documents abundantly show, was not turned aside for a moment from his purpose of terminating the war in the campaign of 1837-'38, if a strong force, abundant supplies, munitions promptly furnished, and all the facilities for prosecuting the campaign with vigor and effect, could accomplish the object. As early as September, arrangements had been made for six hundred volunteers from Tennessee, six hundred from Louisiana, six hundred from Missouri, with three hundred riflemen, spies, and an Indian force to co-operate with the Florida militia, and the strong regular corps of artillery, infantry, and dragoons, already at the disposal of the Commanding General.

Although the Secretary had always manifested the strongest desire to spare the further effusion of blood, and to save that deluded, faithless, and cruel people from extermination, he still declared, from the first, that his only hope was in an active and vigorous prosecution of the war. When the Cherokee delegation went to Florida, with the avowed purpose of persuading the Seminoles to the treaty terms, General Jesup was expressly advised that the mission was not to delay for a moment military operations. There was, on the part of the Secretary, no procrastination, no delay. Munitions of war were transmitted in season; supplies were forwarded in abundance, and the troops were in the field, ready for active operations, at the time proposed. General Jesup was at the head of about ten thousand men, and his force was certainly sufficiently diversified in character. There were regulars and militia, artillery, infantry, dragoons, marines, and riflemen, spies, and Indians; and with this strong, and, as was at that time supposed, well appointed force, the General commenced his campaign, to the event of which the country looked with hope and confidence. He attempted, as the Senator from South Carolina would express it, to drag the Territory as with a net; and with what success? Our hopes withered, and our hearts sickened at the result. The commanding General, I believe, put forth all his energies, and his troops furnished to him no ground of complaint; but he shared the fate of his predecessors. The foe was neither caught, conquered, nor killed. I institute no comparisons between the different Generals who have commanded in Florida. They have been alike triumphant whenever they have met the foe, and alike unsuccessful in expelling him from the country. These failures are, and will continue to be, attributed to different causes. I find the paramount obstacles in the climate, the nature of the country, and the character of the enemy; and my belief is, that unless you make Florida passable in every direction, and can march a column extending from the Gulf on the one side, to the Ocean on the other, this process of sweeping the Territory as with a net must prove fruitless. It is a very easy thing to discourse here of sweeping a country, embracing forty-five thousand square miles, situated in the tropical regions, with a climate genial to the savage, but deadly to the white man—portions of it, still unexplored, abounding in provisions suited to the habits of the Indian, and furnishing secure retreats, known and accessible to him alone—but to do it is an impossibility. Experience proves it to be so; it has been tried again and again, with regular troops, with militia, with infantry, with mounted men, with Indians, and with one uniform result. Twenty thousand men, for such a purpose, in the then state of the Territory, would have been no more effectual than five hundred. But gentlemen will perceive, by glancing at the face of the country, as delineated on this map, that, although all has not been accomplished, much has been done to make the provisions of the bill under consideration operative and effectual. You will observe that our troops, at different times, under the different Generals, in various columns, and in almost every direction, have marched the entire length of the peninsula, from Okefenokee swamp to the Big water, at the head of the Everglades; but while they were passing down, the Indian was sleal hily threading his way up; and while they were beating up the marshes and searching for his trail in the region of Kissimmee river, murder and rapine announced his presence in the fertile and settled Alachua country. At the close of 1838, such had been the results. The Secretary of War had tested the inefficiency of mounted men—they could not operate in that country; the enormous expense of the militia had been abundantly demonstrated, and the total failure of the whole was painfully obvious. Under these circumstances, what were the duties of the head of the Department? This is a question which I shall answer only by stating, further, what was his action, and leave the country to judge of its propriety. When Gen. Jesup was permitted to return to his appropriate staff duties in this city, all the troops which could be spared from our exposed and unsettled frontiers in other quarters were left in the Territory under the command of that vigilant, energetic, and able officer, General Taylor. In prosecuting any campaign, it is well known that much must, of necessity, be left to the judgment and military genius of the commander, to be exercised on the spot. In October, 1838,* the Secretary gave General Taylor general instructions as to the manner in which the succeeding campaign should be conducted. In these instructions the protection of Middle Florida against the incursions of the Seminoles was made the first object. To attain this, the establishment of an interior and exterior line of posts, to extend across the peninsula from the Gulf to the Ocean, was recommended. These and various other suggestions, contained in the letter of the Secretary of October 8, 1838, formed the basis of General Taylor's instructions for that campaign. Unfortunately, the great and first object of the Secretary was not secured, and the exposure encountered, and the immense labor performed by the columns of the army, under the direction of General Taylor and Colonel Davenport, were crowned with no better success than that which had attended similar attempts before. In the mean time, the wisdom of Congress interposed. Military operations were suspended, and negotiations substituted in their place; not upon any suggestion of the Secretary, be it remembered, but against his known and expressed opinions. The result of the negotiation is written in blood. The obligations of the treaty were not regarded for a moment; they were not intended to be observed on the part of the Indians at the time of its execution, as is proved by the burnings, robberies, and murders that immediately followed—some of them within four miles of one of the oldest, if not the oldest town within the limits of the United States.

Such is the very brief and imperfect outline of what the Secretary of War has done, and for his full, complete, and triumphant vindication against the general charges preferred, I refer to the public documents and correspondence upon your files, embracing the details of the history to which I have thus cursorily adverted. The eye of the Secretary could not be expected to reach where it is not given to mortal vision to penetrate. He could not be expected to accomplish that which it is not given to man to achieve. I believe, with all the difficulties of the case, he has made the best of the means in his power. In considering the measure now proposed, it is material to remember not only the failure of the large armies, with the immense expense incurred, and the disastrous terminations of every attempt at negotiation, but also to bear in mind the very important fact that there is no war in the Territory, and has been none for a long time, in the proper acceptation of the term. There has been no fighting for more than two years. The Indian force now remaining does not probably exfrom three to five hundred men, scattered in small bands over this extended area. That they should be expelled as soon as practicable, by all reasonable means, is universally conceded; but the Secretary who would sanction a recommendation to saddle this country with the expense of an army of twenty, fifteen, or ten thousand men, as has been suggested, to hunt these three hundred savages, would not only find little support for his recommendation here, but less before the people, who are wisely and justly jealous of large standing armies. To expel the last vestige of these banditti, and to give peace and security to the whole of that peninsula, must be the work of time. In the meanwhile, the settler in his home, and the shipwrecked mariner upon the coast, must find protection in our arms, and feel that there is security from Indian barbarity. To attain these objects, the instructions already given for the disposition and employment of the force now there, and the legislative measures we are considering, are well adapted, and, in my judgment, sanctioned by sound policy, drawn from past experience and present knowledge. Troops are now stationed along the Atlantic coast for the protection of commerce at New Smyrna, St. Lucie's Sound, at Jupiter Inlet, and other convenient and commanding points. Protection, too, is afforded on the Gulf. By the exertions of Gen. Taylor's force, now actively employed, as I notice by a letter of the 11th ult. the settled portions of the Territory will soon be relieved from every individual of this murderous race. What more, then, is proposed to be done? For the protection of the coast, as we have seen, provision has already been made. That the settler may cultivate his fields by day, and repose in peace with his family at night, a cordon of posts, at short distances from each other, is to be established from the mouth of the Withlacoochee, by Fort King, to a point near New Smyrna, connected by good roads, when necessary, and the intermediate spaces guarded by constant patrols. In addition to this, the Secretary, in his report, asks that the Executive may be empowered to raise one thousand men, who are to be armed, drilled, and equipped expressly for this service, and to serve during the war. Judging from the spirit of liberality recently manifested on the other side, I anticipated no objection to this recommendation. With the regular army stationed on the coast, and at the cordon of posts before indicated, such a body of men can hardly fail to prove, in the highest degree, serviceable in their active operations between Fort King and Cape Sable. They will, undoubtedly, in conjunction with such regular troops as can be spared from the posts, be able to keep some of the small bands of marauders in constant motion, and so to harass them, by pursuing their trails, and disturbing them in their places of retreat, as to make emigration, which they so much dread, preferable to such a life. The Indians will soon learn that, while they are effectually shut out from the coasts and the white settlements, this is a force which is to be permanent—to remain there as long as they remain, and to be constantly in motion. To carry out, to a certain extent, Gen. Taylor's idea of "covering the whole country," this bill proposes ten thousand armed settlers, instead of the armed force of mere soldiers, which has been tried and failed. As was intimated at the opening of my remarks, I cannot indulge the sanguine hopes with which some of the most ardent friends of the bill seem to be inspired; but there are, undeniably, many strong considerations by which it is recommended. The expulsion of the savage must, at best, be the work of time. The establishment of ten thousand hardy settlers, considering the geographical position of the peninsula, and its vast importance in any future war to all the southern country as a point of attack and defence, would, in itself, be an object richly worth the 3,200,000 acres of land provided for the whole number, should so many settlers be obtained. The bill is well guarded, both for the Government and the settler. An important provision is, that the pay is to depend upon the success of the project. The bounty is not to be granted until the work is performed.

Now, sir, I take our own experience in this war as my guide. It is idle to go abroad for illustrations to enforce our peculiar views. The Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] to show what may be done with a competent force in Florida, called the attention of the Senate to the expulsion of the formidable banditti from Italy by the energetic measures of Napoleon; but the gentleman should recollect that the arms of the conqueror, which could easily and effectually beat up the narrow Pontine marshes, could have done nothing in the unexplored, impenetrable hammocks and deep morasses of our broad peninsula. I might ask the Senator what was the success of the French arms in their own district, La Vendee? Were they equally triumphant there? No, sir. Notwithstanding that peculiar country of yet more peculiar people presented a most terrible and sanguinary theatre of war, literally covered with fire and blood, they rose, as it were, from every conquered field with new energy and fresh power of resistance; and although, in December, 1793, the Vendeans were apparently left to perish in a body between Savenay, the Loire, and the marshes, by the bayonets of the French soldiers, the war was not terminated, but broke out afresh in the following spring. It became merely a war of devastation. The whole insurgent country was enclosed by the camps of the Republican armies, under the command of General Turreau, from which incendiary columns were sent forth to burn the woods, the hedges, the copses, and frequently the villages themselves; they seized the crops and drove away the cattle. And yet we are informed that the Vendeans resisted this kind of warfare in a manner to render it everlasting. Now, sir, where was the secret spring of power on the part of these people to resist this vastly superior numerical force? It was in the country, in its configuration, and in their skill and courage to profit by it.

Look at the interesting country of Circassia, the fervid patriotism and wild gallantry of whose people are now attracting the attention and wonder of the world. It presents at this moment the astonishing spectacle of a free population which has preserved its independence and its individuality in an almost barbarous state, though surrounded by more civilized nations.

Russia has exerted its enormous military power

* Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to General Z. Taylor, dated October 8, 1838.

"At the same time, it will be necessary to secure the frontier of Middle Florida against the incursions of the Seminoles. I would suggest that this may be done best by the establishment of an interior and exterior line of posts. The first immediately in advance of Col Gamble's plantation, which is, I understand, the extreme settlement which has not been abandoned; the second to extend from the Withlacoochie to the Atlantic, at or near New Smyrna. In establishing the latter, every encouragement should be held out to the former inhabitants of the Alachua country to return to their settlements, receiving them into the service of the United States, and forming them into battalions for the defence of the line; each battalion having a central depot on which they can rally. Let these men be employed partly in cultivating their fields in corn and other crops, for the subsistence of themselves and the troops, and partly in patrolling from post to post. In pursuance of this plan, it is my intention to propose to the President to ask of Congress authority to offer land to settlers, upon condition of military service until the Territory is pacified: but in the mean time something may be done by holding out inducements of a ready market and certain protection to those proprietors of the soil who have been driven from their settlements by the dread of the savage incursions of the Indians. Such portions of the line as cannot be defended in this manner, must be protected by posts placed as near to each other as circumstances will permit, and connected together by good roads. After these preliminary arrangements are made, the disposable force may penetrate to the lower part of the peninsula, in as many columns as you may deem it safe to break it into. A similar line of settlements and posts as that proposed to be established from the Withlacoochie to New Smyrna, may be made as low down as the nature of the country, and your success in driving the Indians into the narrowest compass, will admit; but too much ought not to be attempted at this time; and it will be wiser to secure all the country north of the country indicated, from the danger of future invasion, than to overrun a great space, which will have to be abandoned on the approach of summer. It appears to me of the last importance that the posts should be so situated that the entire chain across the peninsula may be preserved unbroken during the whole year; and for this purpose they should be garrisoned, in part, at least, by the inhabitants of Florida or Georgia, who are acclimated in the low country of the South."

to reduce these tribes, inhabiting the borders of the Black Sea and the strong defiles and fastnesses of the Caucasian mountains, without ever gaining any considerable advantage. The war upon the Circassians cannot have been sustained by the Russian Government at an expense of less than from five to ten thousand men annually since 1805; and yet they not only defy the Russian power, but, if recent reports are true, are signally victorious over the Russian armies.

Sir, to what do you attribute the success of the wild people upon this isthmus in maintaining their independence? Not surely to their means of warfare, nor yet to their numbers, but undoubtedly to the singular topography of the country and the daring bravery and indomitable fortitude of its hardy and fierce population. I make these references in reply to the Senator from South Carolina, remarking, at the same time, that I place no reliance whatever upon the historical authorities introduced in the course of this debate, either for or against this bill. The cases are not parallel. If you will determine what a given military force can accomplish, you must take into the calculation the circumstances by which they are to be surrounded, and the obstacles they are to encounter, the topography of the country in which which they are to operate, its climate and productions, and the character of the enemy to be subdued. In all these particulars Florida stands by itself, and a large force having proved unavailing, I am disposed to try a smaller one, to be raised expressly for this service, and the armed settlers.

Mr. PRESTON said: I am very glad, Mr. President, that the attention of the Senate has been called to this bill, and from that fact at least I hope good will result. We are all anxious, and I am happy to say it with great sincerity as to myself, to bring this war to a satisfactory termination, that Florida may be open to quiet settlement by the white inhabitants of this country. Sir, I have no other views whatever than to effect this object; and I would not oppose any measure, even this, if I believed in its success, or merely in its harmlessness. But this measure cannot but result in injury, which we are all anxious to avoid. It tends to an entirely different purpose from that assigned, and to an indefinite protraction of the war, involving new measures to be adopted at a distant time, with an expenditure of more money.

Mr. President, the project is for the settlement and armed occupation of Florida, thus gradually taking possession of the lost territory. But let us reflect on the peculiar attitude of affairs in that country at the present moment. We have been at war there since December, 1835, to protect our frontier and drive out the Indians. At that time Florida had long been a territory, with settlements advanced far into the interior, and at that time it was necessary for the Government to remove the Indians out of the way of the progreesive settlement of the territory, which was pressing on the Indian territory in East Florida. It was on this occasion that the war broke out, and it consequently became necessary to employ the military force of the United States to protect the settlers. A cordon of posts of United States troops was established to protect your actual settlements, all round the northern frontier of the Indians. Sir, did your project succeed there? Did all your military power prevail in protecting the settlers? So far from that, the irruptions and ravages of the Indians expelled the inhabitants of the Territory, so that the Indians conquered Florida in spite of the United States. So far from that, the Indians of that Territory conquered even that portion of the land which the United States had sold and settled, and expelled our citizens who were actually in possession of it. Sir, this is a melancholy commencement of the settlement of that country by individuals by whom the land had been purchased and paid for, and whom you guarded to the utmost extent, or at least ought to have done it; and now you propose a project for settlements, though those settlements were all broken up. Though those settlements could not be maintained, or at least were not, yet it is now supposed you can conquer that country by settlements.

The gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY,] with whom I do not concur in this measure, has fallen into some mistakes which I consider of consequence. There has been a good deal of military experience in that country, by men of worth, whose opinions are entitled to great weight. One of them is General Taylor, in reference to whom, as well as others, the gentleman has mistaken me. The truth is, Taylor is an authority on whom I rely; and so far was he from recommending this blockhouse plan, this war in disguise, mixed up of the sword running with the ploughshare and the ploughshare with the sword—

Mr. CLAY, (interrupting.) I did not say that he recommended the plan of the bill; that was not Taylor's plan; but I said it was his opinion that the war ought not to be renewed as heretofore.

Mr. PRESTON. Taylor was not in favor of the post (agricultural) plan, but entirely against it. And it is a fact, as far as I can ascertain, that, by all the gentlemen who have been actually engaged in Florida, military or civil, a plan of this kind would not be deemed efficacious; and many of them assure me that it is utterly delusive. I am aware that there are opinions in favor of it; but I have not known of one individual in Florida, who thinks that it would be attended with success, unless it is attended with other measures; for example, it may be efficient, if with all the power of the Government we scour that country; and when this is done by the army, there may be protection for those who are settled in Florida. Such is Taylor's opinion, who says: "If the war is renewed, which I do not hope, the only way to bring it to a successful issue is, in my opinion, to cover the whole country so as to prevent the Indians from hunting and fishing." As the war is to be renewed, it is therefore his opinion that the only way to a successful issue is to cover the whole country so as to prevent the Indians from hunting and fishing. And this is precisely the project which I have proposed. It sounds largely, this covering the whole country; and yet I believe it may be done without any great display of military force. And why has it not been done? The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIERCE] asks for specifications against the Secretary of War. I will now give them. This war is disastrous at the end of five years. And what power had the Secretary of War to prevent it? I will now tell you. He has had every thing that the Department has asked for. This is my answer. And it is a matter of charge against the Executive Department that, having all the power of the Government to accomplish this end, it is not accomplished.

The gentleman from New Hampshire says, and says truly, this has been a most disastrous war, with a vast expenditure of treasure. And has Congress ever refused any amount of means? It has opened its doors wide enough for any power, and here has been a war of the whole United States from Maine to Missouri; a war of 15,000 000 prosperous people against a miserable band of naked savages; a war of the whole territory, army, and military of the Union, against a few bandits in Florida, and with all this the war is disastrous. It may be that the Department is not enlightened as we are, and has not foreseen these results. But what is the Department for but to foresee? And whose fault is it that the war is not terminated?

It has been said that we can only estimate measures by the result, (a method censured by Mr. PIERCE and General ST. CLAIR.) And what other means have we here? He who has small means is, perhaps, not to be censured for failing in great achievements. But where there is a command of all and adequate means, then this method of judging is a test of all such matters. And what, in this case, caused the failure? Was it the want of physical or moral power, one, or both? They have had $25,000,000, and with that sum the Territory might have been filled with roads and forts. And I believe, by an appropriation of $5,000,000, rightly applied, the war might be entirely extinguished. If the Secretary would adopt more enlightened measures, I believe the Territory would be swept entirely clean of the Indians at that expense; and if men and money can do it, they would be given by us.

Mr. President, General Taylor, in his report, says he hopes the war would not be renewed; and I now ask gentlemen, is this a measure of peace or war? Which is it? If it is of war, we are not capable of projecting plans of that sort. But if it is a measure of peace, let gentlemen say so, and that we are not called on but for a pacific measure. [Mr. P's voice was here lost to the Reporter, but he was understood to refer to the case of a Frenchman who accompanied some nostrum with calomel and the lancet to make it effectual.] Such, he said, was the exact case with Florida. Accompany this measure with a military force of 10,000 men, and this measure might then be very clever if it should induce some settlement on the land. But who are those settlers? The gentleman from Alabama says that they can send hardy and resolute men to that country, and that these men, cultivating the ground with arms in their hands, will be always ready to pop down on the Indians. But who are they that are thus suddenly to pop down on the appearance of an Indian? Sir, does the settler kill the Indian, or the Indian the settler? The settler is at his plough, and it is he who is killed, and the soldiers are drummed out in a vain pursuit of the runaway murderer. And is not this a matter of every day experience in Florida? But my view of the subject, expressed the other day, is not answered. Ours is a slaveholding population, of rich and extensive planters, and Florida will be cultivated only by slaves. And is it expected that slaveholders will, for a bounty, fight the Indians and free negroes? The supposition is preposterous. How has it happened that an individual most distinguished has failed to verify this supposition? The land was given up by General Clinch, who was a settler there, as well as by others of respectability; all fled; and these are the only kind of individuals who make settlements in Florida. [Mr. P. here stated some facts to show that Florida, like South Carolina and the South generally, could, from its staples, cotton and rice, and from its generally low and unhealthy character, be cultivated only by slaves, and not by small landholders, depending on their labor for the direct means of support.] And what, said Mr. P. is now demanded is to put the country in a condition to be settled by Southern men. And we have the right, having stipulated for the land, to say to the Government, you shall give us the land and prepare it for that kind of population by whom alone it can be cultivated.

Mr. P. proceeded to show that the arable lands of Florida were of such a character that they would generally be purchased, not by poor men, of whom he admitted there were some in the South, but by those who thought the land worth more than $1,25 per acre for the production of rice and cotton. He further stated that nearly the whole of the public land there now in the possession of the United States was covered by Spanish grants, which poor men could not run the risk of contesting, and which would therefore go into the hands of rich men and speculators. He objected also that good public land, with an undisputed title, could not be found in Florida to carry this bill into effect, so that, when the land should be thus prepared for settlement, there would be no more to be settled. And all that would be settled by this measure Mr. P. would venture to say would go to an idle population, instead of good, useful, and respectable citizens.

Mr. P. also further objected to the length of time which this measure would require. He thought it would require five or seven years. Instead of this, he insisted that the South had a right to demand, and did demand, that all the power of the country, if necessary, should terminate the war at once, and open the Territory for settlement.

He also objected to the bill, that men with families would, in the mean time, have no means of supporting and taking care of their families. The project of paying for military service in land, he thought had been fully proved to be the worst and most expensive. Soldiers were a class of men who would be better satisfied with a less amount of ready money; and few of them, after all, would settle on the land. He further insisted on the plan of General Taylor as the best and most efficacious, and urged anew the propriety and expediency of throwing the whole responsibility on the Department.

He condemned, in unqualified terms, the proposition to hunt, in the Spanish manner, the Indians with blood hounds. He would be severe in any case only for the sake of humanity, killing, in no case, women and children, but making salutary, and even humane, though severe, examples of marauders and murderers.

Mr. PRESTON having concluded, and Mr. STRANGE expressing his desire to speak on the following day,

The Senate adjourned.

SPEECH OF MR. BENTON, OF MISSOURI,

In Senate, January 6, 1840—On Mr. BENTON's resolutions against the constitutionality and expediency of assuming, or providing for the payment of the State debts, or diverting the land revenue to that object, viz:

"Resolved, That there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States which can authorize the legislative power of the Union to assume the debts of the States which have been contracted for local objects and State purposes.

"2. That the assumption of such debts either openly, by a direct promise to pay them, or disguisedly by going security for their payment, or by creating surplus revenue or applying the national funds to pay them, would be a gross and flagrant violation of the Constitution, wholly unwarranted by the letter or spirit of that instrument, and utterly repugnant to all the objects and purposes for which the Federal Union was formed.

"3. That, besides its flagrant unconstitutionality, such assumption would be unjust, unwise, impolitic, and dangerous, compelling the non-indebted States to incur burthens for others which they have refused to incur for themselves; diverting the national funds from national objects to State objects, and thereby creating a necessity for loans or taxes, or issues of Federal paper money to supply the place of the funds so diverted; prostrating the barriers of economy, moderation, and safety, in the creation of State debts by separating the function of contractor from that of payer of the debt, extinguishing the sense of responsibility in the contractor, and making the Federal Government the ultimate payer of all the obligations contracted by the States for their own purposes; establishing a dangerous precedent which must soon be followed up by new debts on the part of the States, and new assumptions on the part of the Federal Government; invading the rights and mortgaging the property of posterity, and loading unborn generations with debts not their own; creating a new national debt of large amount at the start, and of a nature to increase continually its own amount, and to perpetuate its own existence; begetting a spirit in Congress which must constantly cater for new distributions by preventing necessary appropriations, and keeping up unnecessary taxes; laying the foundation for a new and excessive tariff of duties on foreign imports to fall unequally on different parts of the Union, and most heavily on the planting, grain growing, and provision raising States, to their manifest injury and propable great discount; involving disastrous consequences either to the Union itself or to its members, as tending to the consolidation of the States, and their ultimate abject dependence on the Federal head as the fountain of their supplies; or, tending to the annihilation of the Federal head itself by stripping it of all its means of national defence and self-support, and reducing it to the hepless imbecility of the old Confederation; giving a new impulse to the delusive career of the paper system, already in a state of dangerous overaction; ensuring the establishment of another National Bank; and, finally, begetting a passion for periodical distributions of lands and money, and extensions of Federal credit, which could find no limit to its demands until the national domain was exhausted, the Federal Treasury emptied, and the credit of the Union reduced to contempt.

"4. That the debts of the States being now chiefly held by foreigners, and constituting a stock in foreign markets greatly depreciated, any legislative attempt to obtain the assumption or securityship of the United States for their payment, or to provide for their payment out of the national funds, must have the effect of enhancing the value of that stock to the amount of a great many millions of dollars, to the enormous and undue advantage of foreign capitalists, and of jobbers and gamblers in stocks, thereby holding out inducement to foreigners to interfere in our affairs, and to bring all the influences of a moneyed power to operate upon public opinion, upon our elections, and upon State and Federal legislation, to produce a consummation so tempting to their cupidity, and so profitable to their interest.

"5. That foreign interference and foreign influence, in all ages, and in all countries, have been the bane and curse of free Governments; and that such interference and influence are far more dangerous, in the insidious intervention of the moneyed power, than in the forcible invasions of fleets and armies.

"6. That to close the door at once against all applications for such assumption, and to arrest at their source the vast tide of evils which would flow from it, it is necessary that the constituted authorities, without delay, shall RESOLVE and DECLARE their utter opposition to the proposal contained in the late London Bankers's circular in relation to State debts, contracted for local and State purposes, and recommending to the Congress of the United States to assume, or guaranty, or provide for the ultimate payment of said debts."

The resolutions having been read,

Mr. BENTON rose and said:

MR. PRESIDENT: I am an enemy to abstract resolutions, and if those which I present were of that character, I should not have offered them to the Senate. They appear to be abstract, but they are not. They appear to be mere declarations of principles; but they are, in reality, so many issues presented on great questions now occupying the public mind, destined soon to occupy the legislative halls, and the prompt decision of which is necessary to our successful action on other subjects.

The assumption of the State debts contracted for State purposes has been for a long time a measure disguisedly, and now is a measure openly, pressed upon the public mind. The movement in favor of it has been long going on; opposing measures have not yet commenced. The assumption party have the start, and the advantage of conducting the case; and they have been conducting it for a long time, and in a way to avoid the name of assumption while accomplishing the thing itself. All the bills for distributing the public land revenue—all the propositions for dividing surplus revenue—all the refusals to abolish unnecessary taxes—all the refusals to go on with the necessary defences of the country—were so many steps taken in the road to assumption. I know very well that many who supported these measures had no idea of assumption, and would oppose it as soon as discovered; but that does not alter the nature of the measures they supported, and which were so many steps in the road to that assumption, then shrouded in mystery and futurity, now ripened into strength, and emboldened into a public disclosure of itself. Already the State Legislatures are occupied with this subject, while we sit here, waiting its approach.

It is time for the enemies of assumption to take the field, and to act. It is a case in which they should give, and not receive, the attack. The President has led the way; he has shown his opinions He has nobly done his duty. He has shown the evils of diverting the general funds from their proper objects—the mischiefs of our present connection with the paper system of England—and the dangers of foreign influence from any further connection with it. In this he has discharged a constitutional and a patriotic duty. Let the constituted authorities, each in their sphere, follow his example, and declare their opinions also. Let the Senate especially, as part of the legislative power—as the peculiar representative of the States in their sovereign capacity—let this body declare its sentiments, and, by its resolves and discussions, arrest the progress of the measure here, and awaken attention to it elsewhere. As one of the earliest opposers of this measure—as, in fact, the very earliest opposer of the whole family of measures of which it is the natural offspring—as having denounced the assumption in disguise in a letter to my constituents long before the London bankers' letter revealed it to the public; as such early, steadfast, and first denouncer of this measure, I now come forward to oppose it in form, and to submit the resolves which may arrest it here, and carry its discussion to the forum of the people.

The resolves which I offer, six in number, are not the decrees of a party, or even the result of a council, but the opinions of an individual Senator. I speak for myself in these resolutions. They contain the declaration of my sentiments on the momentous points to which they refer; and I am not authorized to say that they speak the sentiments of any other Senator. This declaration I think it proper to make, in order to exclude erroneous conclusions, and to prevent undue importance from being attached to my proceeding.

Let no one suppose that I am premature—that I begin too soon—and should wait until the friends of assumption shall bring forward their measure, and show us the shape and form they intend it to wear. If any one should so think and intimate, I must answer as I did to a similar objection ten years ago. I must answer as I did when it was objected that I had brought in my resolution too soon against the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States. Many Senators then thought me premature, and objected to entering upon the question until the stockholders should present their memorial and ask for an extension of their privileges. I refused to yield to this objection. I then said, if we waited till the Bank presented her application, we should wait till we were defeated; that she would never apply until she had organized victory; that she would see her majority before she asked for the vote—and would be ready to gallop through her bill for the recharter the day that she presented it. This is what I then said; and subsequent events proved its correctness. The country was saved, and barely saved, from the dominion of that institution, by beginning the contest when we did—by giving instead of waiting to receive the attack; by carrying the question to the people, and rousing up the public mind, and preparing it for the contest which soon began, and which seven long years have hardly seen terminated. So of this assumption, disgused as it may be with a proposition to divide the land revenue among the States. Immediate discussion, direct issues, and prompt action, is what we want. The assumption party will not bring on the question, except at a time, and under a form, to favor their own wishes. They will not move here until they have first acted elsewhere. The State Legislatures will be the selected theatres of their operations; and anticipated judgments will be the object of their policy. This will be their course; ours should be the reverse. What we need is public discussion, prompt action, and a reference, before decision, to the judgment of the people. The adoption of the resolutions which I have brought in will give us these advantages; they will give us the advantages which we secured by precipitating the contest with the Bank of the United States.

This is one reason for prompt action in this case; but there is another of great weight, and which some experience in the business of legislation requires me to present, and to commend to the deliberate consideration of the Senate. It is the effect which a measure proposing to divert the land revenue from the current service, (for that is the form, I apprehend, which the assumption will take)—it is the effect which this proposition will have upon the legislative action of Congress upon other subjects. Assuredly its pendency will have a most pernicious influence on other bills; on the bills for the national defences, for the pacification of Florida, for the reduction of the price of the public lands, for granting pre-emptions, for abolishing the salt tax; and, generally, on all the bills which go to make adequate appropriations for national objects, or to get rid of unnecessary and burthensome taxation. The diversion of some annual millions from the Treasury will prescribe stinted appropriations for essential objects, the sacrifice of others, the retention of all our present taxes, and the speedy imposition of new ones. This is the language both of foresight and of experience. It is what a reasonable degree of forecast authorizes us to look for, and what the experience of our own body enables us to recollect in our past history. We have experience on this subject, bitter and recent experience, of the effect which the pendency of distribution projects exerts upon our legislation. I speak of the long session of 1835–'6, when two bills for distribution passed this body, one of which became a law; and when, in a session of seven months, the current bills for the public service were still lingering on the calender, and many of a most important character were totally lost. As late as the 18th of June, in the session of 1835–'6, we had done little more than growl and wrangle for the spoils of the Treasury. On that day I felt it to be my duty to present to the Senate a view of the mischievous effects upon legislation which the distribution spirit had brought upon us; and this I did in the following words:

"Thus it is already; distribution has occupied us the entire session. A proposition to amend the Constitution, to enable us to make the division, was brought forward in the first month of the session. The land bill followed and engrossed months, to the exclusion of all national defence bills. Then came the deposite scheme, a variation of the former, which absorbs the remainder of the session. For nearly seven months we have been occupied with distribution, and the Senate has actually passed two bills to effect the same object and to divide the same identical money. TWO bills to divide money while ONE cannot be got through for the great objects of national defence named in the Constitution. We are now near the end of the seventh month of the session. The day named by the Senate for the termination of the session, has actually passed by; the day of adjournment agreed upon by the two Houses is close at hand The year is half gone, and the season for labor is half lost; yet what is the state of the general, the national, and the most essential appropriation bills? What is their state? Not a shilling is yet voted for fortifications—not a shilling for the ordnance—nothing for filling the empty ranks of the skeleton army—nothing for the new Indian treaties—nothing for the continuation of the Cumberland road—nothing for rebuilding the burnt down Treasury—nothing for the custom-house in New Orleans—nothing for extinguishing the rights of private corporators in the Louisville canal, and making that great thoroughfare free to the commerce of the West—nothing for the Western armory—nothing for arsenals in the States which have none—nothing for the extension of the circuit court system to the West and Southwest—nothing for improving the Mint machinery—nothing for keeping the Mints regularly supplied with metals for coining—nothing for the new marine hospitals—nothing for the expenses of the visiters now gone to the Military Academy—nothing for the chain of posts and the military road along the Western and Northwestern frontier. All these, and a long list of other objects, remain without a cent to this day; and those who have kept them off now coolly turn upon us, and say the money cannot be expended if appropriated! that it has become too late to use it, and that, on the first day of January next, it must fall into the surplus fund, and be divided! So much for the bills not passed. Of those passed, many of the most essential character have been delayed for months, to the great damage of individuals, and to the injury of the public service. Clerks and salaried officers have been borrowing money at usury to support their families, while we, wholly absorbed with dividing surpluses, were withholding from them their stipulated wages. Laborers at Harper's Ferry armory have been without money to go to market for their families; and some have lived three weeks without meat, because we must attend to the distribution bills before we can attend to the pay bills. Disbursing officers have raised money on their own credit to supply the want of appropriations. Even the annual Indian annuity bill has just got through! the Indians even—the poor Indians as they are wont to be styled—even they have had to wait, in want and misery for the annual stipends solemnly guarantied to them by treaties. All this has already taken place under the deplorable influence of the distribution spirit; but this is not all that has taken place," &c.

This is history, copied from the facts. This is the experience of the Senate itself of the baleful influence of the distribution bills on the legislative action of Congress. While such bills are depending, all others are suspended, and many are sacrificed. They are a veto upon our legislative faculties. This we have seen and suffered; and this we must see and suffer again, unless assumption, in all its forms and disguises—assumption of State debts, which is the fruit of the policy, and the consummation of the policy, of tempting and seducing the States with distributions of public money—all this we must see again, and worse than this, unless assumption is rebuked and repulsed, and its fell spirit exorcised from our legislative halls. The first step towards doing any business, is to expel this intruder—to drive off this bird of evil omen—to chase away this harpy, which is come to flap its foul wings over our Capitol, and to croak its glutton notes for the spoil of our Treasury. This is our first duty. When we have got rid of this intrusive monster, we can then go on with the public business; until that is done, we can do nothing but growl and wrangle for the spoils of our country.

I trust, Mr. President, that I have now shown sufficient reasons for proceeding at once upon this subject—for moving thus early, and bringing in broad and direct resolutions; and for pressing the Senate to speedy and final action on the momentous subject of assuming or providing for the payment of the State debts. I feel that this preliminary point is made clear. What I next wish to show is, that I myself have some little right to take a lead in this business—that I am the earliest and most steadfast opposer, on this floor, of the policy out of which this crowning measure of mischief has grown—and that, in now opposing ASSUMPTION, I am only opposing the CHILD of DISTRIBUTION, which I was the first to oppose here, and that on the first day of its appearance in this chamber; and have continually made head against it since, regardless of personal popularity, and undismayed by the small minorities in which I was often left. This assertion, sir, is no poetical license; it is no rhetorical flourish; it is no fictitious or assumed self-commendation; but a history of the facts of the case from the journals of our proceedings. It is now twelve years, less one month, since a Senator from New Jersey, no longer a member of this body, brought in a bill for distributing money from the Federal Treasury among the States. On my motion, and the instant the author had resumed his seat, that bill was laid upon the table, there to lie during the remainder of the session. The ensuing session it was brought in again, and I was then one among several Senators who took the floor, and spoke against it. In company with the Senators HAYNE, BRANCH, BERRIEN, SMITH of Maryland, JOHNSTON of Louisiana, MCLANE of Delaware, and KANE of Illinois, I spoke against that bill; and the temper of the Senate was then such that it was easily disposed of, and without the test of a vote upon its merits. I deem it material to the present state of the question to look back to this origin of the distribution policy—to see the original naked bill for that purpose—and to mark how easily there has since been accomplished, under a disguised form, what could not then be countenanced in a naked proposition. This is the bill brought in by Mr. DICKERSON at the session of 1826–7, to distribute among the States a part of the revenue of the United States.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and required, under such regulations as he may think proper to prescribe, to divide annually among the several States of the Union, in the ratio of direct taxation, all moneys in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, on the first day of June next, and on the first day of June in every succeeding year.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, of the annual sum of ten millions of dollars, appropriated to the sinking fund by the second section of the act of the third of March, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, entitled 'An act to provide for the redemption of the public debt,' five millions be appropriated to the fund to be divided among the States, as by the first section of this act, annually, after the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-nine; and that so much of the residue of the said annual sum of ten millions of dollars, as shall not, on the first day of June of any year, have been applied to the redemption of the public debt, shall be appropriated to the fund to be divided among the States as aforesaid."

In the brief debate to which this bill gave rise, I took part, not in a formal speech—for I was then, comparatively, a young member—but in a few remarks, which I propose to read now, for the double purpose of showing what my sentiments were then, and also to show, from history, the disastrous consequences of the funding system, now adopted by so many of our States, in creating debts for posterity to pay, and to exhaust, with annual interest, the resources both of the present age and of unborn generations. These were my remarks:

"Mr. BENTON rose, not to make a speech, but to read some extracts from a debate in the British House of Commons, about one hundred years ago, on a proposition of the same kind as that which now occupied the deliberations of the Senate. England then had a small debt, not much larger than the debt of the United States was at present; she had a sinking fund also, under the operation of which her debt was annually melting away; and she enjoyed a season of peace—the long peace under the timid administration of Sir Robert Walpole, in which the debt might have been paid off. The circumstances of the two countries, with respect to their debt, were as alike as possible; that is to say, the condition of England one hundred years ago, and that of the United States now. In these circumstances, Sir Robert Walpole made a motion to divert £500,000 from the English sinking fund, as the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DICKERSON, who Mr. B. was sorry to name in company with Sir Robert Walpole] now proposes to divert five millions annually from our sinking fund. The motion of the English minister was supported by all the common place arguments in mitigation and in favor of the public debt, as, that a debt increased the wealth of a country, and gave stability to the Government; that the then debt of England was inconsiderable, and might be paid at any time; that the public creditors were in no hurry to receive, and that the money, for the present, could be used more beneficially for other purposes. The opposition members, however, from whose speeches I propose to read extracts, were opposed to all these doctrines These members were the Iron Barons of the day, such as Lord Chatham afterwards contrasted with the Silken Barons of a later period. They had the best of the argument, and their prophecies, unhappily for their country, have become its history. But the minister had the best of it at voting, and his motion prevailed. He succeeded in violating the sinking fund—in diverting one-half of its amount from its proper object, to objects of transient interest and subordinate importance. The consequence were such as had been foretold by the Iron Barons.

The season of peace passed away; the long and timid administration of Walpole itself passed away; the debt was unpaid; successive wars came on; and the debt, which was then made so light of by the minister, rapidly grew up to a frightful amount; soon overwhelmed the country with taxes, and banished all idea of ever seeing it paid. The example, Mr. B. hoped, would not be lost upon the United States, the child of England. The experience of the mother, he humbly trusted, would not be lost upon the daughter, as the experience of parents too often is lost upon their children. History was said to be philosophy teaching by example; he hoped this moral and sublime teacher would not lavish her lessons in vain upon the American Senate.

Mr. B. joined in the wish expressed by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAYNE,] that the debt of the United States might be paid off under the ensuing Administration. He concurred] with that Senator in the measure of the new fame which such a consummation would confer upon General Jackson.

Observing some Senators to smile, Mr. B. spoke up with animation and vehemence, repeating what he had said, and even going so far as to say that the new President would have as hard, or harder work, in baffling the enemies to the payment of the debt, than he had in vanquishing the British at New Orleans; for there he had his enemy in front, and saw what he was at, but here he would have his opponents on his flank and rear, covered up in masks and disguises, laboring to accomplish what would not be avowed. No one would now stand up and say, 'a public debt was a public blessing,' but many would practise upon the maxim, and endeavor to perpetuate ours, by withholding the means of paying it; by abolishing duties beforehand, and preventing the acquisition of revenue, or by squandering it upon all sort of objects.

Mr. B. then read the following extracts from the debates to which he alluded:

SIR WILLIAM PULTENEY.—"The Sinking Fund, that sacred deposite for extinguishing the duties and abolishing the taxes which lie so heavy on the trade, and on the people of this nation, ought never to be touched; no consideration whatever ought to prevail with us to convert that fund to any use, but that for which it was originally designed. It has, of late, been too often robbed—I beg pardon, sir, robbing is a harsh word, I will not say robbed—but I must say, that, upon several occasions, there have been considerable sums snipped away from it."

SIR JOHN BARNARD.—"The creditors of the public are, perhaps, at present unwilling to be paid off, because they have a greater interest for their money from the public than they can have any where else. But, let their inclinations be what they please, it is certainly the interest of the nation to have them all paid off; the sooner it is done, the happier it will be for the nation, and, therefore, no part of what is appropriated to their payment ought to be converted to any other use. Their unwillingness to receive payment is so far from being an argument against paying them, that, on the contrary, it shows that they have a better bargain from the public than they can, in the same way, have from any other person."

SIR WILLIAM WYNDHAM.—"The Sinking Fund is a fund I have always had the greatest veneration for; I look on it as a sacred fund, appropriated to the relieving the nation from that load of debts and taxes it now groans under. * * * * * * I have, indeed, been always afraid that some enterprising minister might be tempted to seize upon it, or some part of it, in time of war; but I little dreamt of seeing any attempts made upon it in a time of the most profound tranquillity. It is to me a melancholy consideration to think of the present vast load of the national debt—a debt of no less than forty-five millions and upwards, and that all contracted since the Revolution, (1688.) This must be a melancholy consideration to every gentleman that has any concern for his country's happiness; but if the motion now made to us shall be agreed to, how dismal will this consideration be rendered, when we reflect upon the little appearance there will then be of this debt's ever being paid. Is the public expense never to be lessened? Are the people of England always to pay the same heavy and grievous taxes? Surely, sir, if there is ever a time to be looked for of easing the people of this nation, the present is the time for doing it. * * * * * * To this the motion now made is directly contrary; for, the not paying off an old debt is the same as contracting a new one, and subjects the nation to the same expense with respect to the payment of the interest."

Mr. TAYLOR, member for Petersfield, observed, "That there are some people in the nation, who, the more they owe, the greater advantage they make, and the richer they grow—such are the bankers; that by the motion made to the House, one might imagine that some gentlemen took the case of the nation to be the same; but, for his part, he could not think so, and, therefore, differed from the motion."

I repeat it: I read these brief remarks, made so many years ago, for a double purpose—for the purpose of showing my early opposition to public debts, and to distributions of public money, and to show the extreme danger of permitting a public debt to take root in the policy, and fasten itself upon the resources, of a country. Both the States and the United States have need of this admonitory lesson at present; the former, to check them in their flying career of debt; the latter, to warn it from encumbering itself with the new debt, which is sought, under a British lead, to be thrown upon it.

I now proceed to the consideration of the resolutions which I have submitted, and shall pass over the first one, which declares the unconstitutionality of the Federal assumption of State debts which have been contracted for State purposes. I shall pass over this resolution, and dispense with all argument upon the proposition which it contains, because naked assumption is not the form in which we shall have this danger to meet. It is disguised assumption we shall have to encounter. It is the national domain which is to be made the cloak for the operation; and this is what I declared to my constituents, in the month of June last, in a letter written three hundred miles beyond the Mississippi, and six months before the letter of the London bankers had revealed the scheme to the American public. This is an extract from the letter:

"I have many other objections to this unconstitutional, demoralizing, debauching, and oppressive scheme of dividing the proceeds of the public lands; too many for bare enumeration in a letter, and I can only mention one of them; namely, that it is a disguised assumption of the State debts! Unfortunately, eighteen States of the Union have gone one hundred and seventy millions of dollars in debt, principally to England, under the delusive idea of clearing the interest by banking and railroad making, and with the unjust view of throwing the payment of the principal upon posterity. If this immense sum had been received in gold and silver, I should still deem it an unfortunate business for most of the States, especially for all the new ones. But it has not been so received. It has been received (generally) in British dry goods, which are worn out and gone; and in Eastern credits and paper money, which last about as long as a summer's snow. The bonds are usually sold to Eastern banks for British capitalists. Drafts are drawn upon those banks, and sold to merchants, who pay for the draft in current paper, and receive the amount in British dry goods in Eastern cities, which are sold to the people and worn out. This is the general history of the sale of State bonds; a mere delusion as to borrowing money and obtaining capital; a sad reality as to loading the State with debt. The thing borrowed is gone; the State debt, and its exhausting interest, remain; and now this distribution project is a disguised assumption of those debts. When General Hamilton proposed the assumption of the debts of the indebted States in 1791, he did it openly, and arrayed the two parties (Federal and Republican) upon it, and carried the measure by an open bargain in Congress, (in locating the permanent seat of Government.) Mr. Jefferson has described that transaction in colors which should make every Republican shudder; but here is a disguised attempt at the same thing, without one single extenuating circumstance which was then pleaded. But I pause. I quit this subject until I shall meet it in Congress."

This is what I wrote six months ago, and now we are in the presence of the danger which I then announced. Disguised assumption is the enemy we have to combat. Breach of the Constitution by elusion and circumvention, not by direct invasion, is the danger that threatens us. Both forms of violation are equally viticus and reprehensible, and the former far the most common and successful. Of this we have signal and recent instances in our own body, and on the very subject which now occupies our attention. When a Senator of New Jersey, fourteen yeas ago, brought in a bill for a direct and naked distribution of public money among the States, it received no manner of countenance, and was quickly, and almost unanimously, disposed of. When the same object was afterwards proposed in the shape of a land revenue distribution bill, it made its way through both Houses of Congress, and was only arrested by the firm hand of President Jackson. Finally, when the self-same scheme made its appearance in the garb of a deposite bill, it not only passed both Houses, but passed the President's hand also, and became the law of the land. Thus elusion and circumvention are the most common, and far the most successful, mode of getting rid of constitutional inhibitions. They are, besides, far the most ancient. As far back as history goes—as long as fundamental laws and constitutions have been known—just so long the practice of evading them has been familiar and notorious. Majorities have been found in all ages and in all countries to elude what they could not attack, and to circumvent what they could not surmount. Of this the history of the Athenians furnishes the finest example that I have any where seen. That ingenious people were able to excel in many things, and, among the rest, in the art of trampling under foot their most sacred laws, while professing towards them a derisory fidelity and a mock respect. The instance to which I refer is that of the admission of Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, into all the degrees of the Eleusynian mysteries in a single day, when the laws required a whole year for the consummation of the admission. Demetrius demanded to be admitted in a day; the laws prescribed a year; so that here was a great difficulty. To satisfy the Prince, then all powerful in Greece, and to comply with the sacred laws which they were sworn to observe, seemed to be impossible; but, by an ingenious conception, the difficulty was evaded, sacrilege avoided, and Demetrius gratified. The invention was simply to change the name of the month at each successive degree of the initiation. This was done. Twelve months were compressed into a few hours; the admission became legal; and the happy inventor of the expedient received from the poets of the day the significant title of Chronos-porthetes, which signifies, I believe, time-expunger. Plutarch, in his Life of Demetrius, thus describes the operation:

"When Demetrius was preparing to return to Athens, he wrote to the Republic that, on his arrival, he intended to be initiated, and to be admitted immediately not only to the less mysteries, but even to those called intuitive. This was unlawful and unprecedented; for the less mysteries were celebrated in the month Anthesterion, and the greater in the month Boedromion; and none were admitted to the intuitive till a year at least after they had attended the greater mysteries. When the letters were read, Pythodorus, the torchbearer, was the only person who ventured to oppose the demand; and his opposition was entirely ineffectual. Stratocles procured a decree that the month Munychion, which they were then in, should be called Anthesterion; after which Munychion was changed again into Boedromion. By these means Demetrius was admitted to the greater mysteries, and to immediate inspection."

It was thus, Mr. President, that Athenian ingenuity, some two thousand years ago, by a transposition of names, disembarrassed a sacred college of its constitutional difficulties; but it required Athenian ingenuity to contrive an expedient so delicate and intellectual. Nothing so refined and spiritual can be expected in these prosaic and money-making times, and in this country, where so much of the genius of the age is directed to the literature of banking, and to the accurate descriptions of the alternate "tightness" and "looseness" of the money market. We can expect nothing like Athenian wit here. The nearest approach that I have seen to it was in this enlightened chamber, and on a recent occasion, when a division of the public money among the States being admitted to be unconstitutional undert he word distribute, that word was gently deposed, and the word deposite enthroned in its place; after which the division of the money took place in the same manner as if the change of words had not been made.

I repeat, Mr. President, we are not to expect Athenian wit in our attempts to get rid of constitutional difficulties. Compared to their refined and spiritual inventions, our contrivances must appear coarse and bungling; and such, in fact, in too many instances, they have actually been. We have often bungled most clumsily in our attempts to circumvent our Constitution, and we can expect no better in future; and, of all the rude attempts of this kind which I have witnessed, none are more awkward and clumsy than that of undertaking to substitute a distribution of the land revenue among the States, for a distribution of the revenue generally, or for an open assumption of the State debts. It is all the same thing, and all ends in the same result. Sir, this whole scheme of dividing the public land revenue among the States is an indirect assumption of their debts. It is disguised assumption; and it is only another move on the chessboard of that distribution policy which has haunted our councils for so many years, in such a variety of forms, and which found its first success in the passage of the act to deposite the surplus revenue, as it was called, with the States of the Union.

The scheme which now occupies the capitalists, bankers, and stockjobbers of London, Paris, Amsterdam, Philadelphia, and New York, to obtain from the Federal Government the assumption, or a provision for the payment of the State debts, is the natural offspring of the distribution policy which infested this chamber for fourteen years, and finally succeeded, in the form of a deposite of surplus revenue with the States. In company with a small minority of half a dozen Senators, I made head against distribution in the disguise of a deposite, and delivered the history of the transaction, on the passage of the act, as accurately as it can be written now. I then said:

"At the end of some years, the nominal transaction will be rescinded; the certificates will all be cancelled by one general, harmonious, unanimous vote in Congress. The disguise of a deposite, like the mask after a play, will be thrown aside, and the delivery of the money will turn out to be, what it is now intended to be, a gift from the beginning. This will be the end of the first chapter."

This is what I said on Friday, the 18th day of June, 1836, the day on which the deposite act passed—dies infaustus, as the Romans would call it—unhappy day which witnessed the immolation of the Constitution, and the consummation of a policy big with the fate of this federative Union. I then said the nominal transaction of a deposite would be rescinded; the month of September, 1837, saw it rescinded. The deposite has become in form what it was from the beginning in substance—a gift of the money; and this conclusion is, what I called in my speech against it; the end of the first chapter. Assumption is the beginning of the second one; and here I am, standing on my old ground, to make head against the offspring of the measure which I opposed, in its seminal principle, fourteen years ago, and have continued opposing it ever since in all its successive stages, and in all its modifications of form.

I come at once to the point, and say that disguised assumption, in the shape of land revenue distribution, is the form in which we shall have to meet the danger; and I meet it at once in that disguise. I say there is no authority in the Constitution to raise money from any branch of the revenue for distribution among the States, or to distribute that which had been raised for other purposes. The power of Congress to raise money is not unlimited and arbitrary, but restricted, and directed to the national objects named in the Constitution. The means, the amount, and the application, are all limited. The means are direct taxes—duties on imports—and the public lands; the objects are the support of the Government—the common defence—and the payment of the debts of the Union; the amount to be raised is of course limited to the amount required for the accomplishment of these objects. Consonant to the words and the spirit of the Constitution, is the title, the preamble and the tenor of all the early statutes for raising money; they all declare the object for which the money is wanted; they declare the object at the head of the act. Whether it be a loan, a direct tax, or a duty on imports, the object of the loan, the tax, or the duty, is stated in the preamble to the act; Congress thus excusing and justifying themselves for the demand in the very act of making it, and telling the people plainly what they wanted with the money. This was the way in all the early statutes; the books are full of examples; and it was only after money began to be levied for objects not known to the Constitution, that this laudable and ancient practice was dropped. Among the enumerated objects for which money can be raised by Congress, is that of paying the debts of the Union; and is it not a manifest absurdity to suppose that, while it requires an express grant of power to enable us to pay the debts of the Union, we can pay those of the States by implication and by indirection?

Sir, our Constitution grew out of a want of money; it grew out of the want of money for general and national purposes; and it contains no grant of power in relation to receipts and expenditures, except to raise and expend it for such purposes.

I meet the danger in its disguise of distribution, and repeat, there is no authority in the Constitution to raise money for distribution, or to distribute that which had been raised for other purposes. This results not only from the plain words of the Constitution, and the known purposes of forming the Federal Union, but also from the total silence of the Constitution upon a rule of distribution. There is a rule in the Constitution for raising money—none for dividing it. The Constitution has provided for the equality and uniformity of the levy; there is no provision for the equality and uniformity of a distribution: "All duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States.  No capitation, or other direct tax, shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census, or enumeration herein before ordered to be taken.  No preference shall be given, by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one State over another." Such are the injunctions of the Constitution in relation to the levy of money; such its care to provide for the uniformity and equality of the levy. But where is the rule for distribution? And what becomes of the equality of the levy, if that which is equally levied is unequally partitioned out? There is no rule given for the partitioners to go by; and that is a proof, among the many others, that no partitions of revenue—no partitions of any kind, money, land, or other property—was ever intended to be made. The framers of our Constitution were not bunglers, but skilful workmen—they were not apprentices, but master workmen. They did not close up their work upon one side, and leave it open upon the other. They did not commit the absurd and egregious folly of permitting that to be unequally divided which had been equally collected. If they had contemplated divisions of money or property, they would have given the rule to regulate them; not having done so, is clear proof they never contemplated such a thing; and we all know that any Constitution providing for such an event would have been scouted and scorned by every State in the Union.

No, sir; there is no rule in the Constitution for the distribution of any thing—money, lands, or goods. The framers of that instrument doubtless looked for no division of its effects in the lifetime of the Union. They doubtless expected the Union to die first; and, as that was an event which they intended to be remote, they made no provision for the contingency even then. They did not provide for the descent of the estate, much less for its partition in the lifetime of the owner. There is no rule to divide by; and, consequently, every mover of distribution has had to provide a rule of his own. The Senator from New Jersey, who brought in the first bill for this purpose, took the rule of the Constitution in the case of direct taxes; he would divide in the ratio of direct taxation. The land bills which followed took Federal numbers, but qualified with a preliminary distribution, of sometimes ten, and sometimes twelve per cent. to the new States. The deposite bill, differing from all these, took the vote of the States for President, and gave them shares of the money in proportion to the number of their Presidential votes. Such was the diversity among the bills Finally, the rule agreed upon was such as found its sanction in the will of the majority for the time being. The will of the actual majority fixed it; and the principle which regulated that will was the acquisition of the precise number of votes which was necessary to carry the bill. That was the rule they went by—acquisition of votes enough to pass the bill. This acquisition was either seductive or coercive. An increase of the distributive share was allowed to some, and their support was thus conciliated; the favorite bills of others, such as the graduation and pre-emption bills, and others for the benefit of particular States, were seized upon and crammed into the distribution bills, and their authors thus compelled to support them in these bills, or to vote against their own measures. This we have seen; this Senate has seen it; and we have seen the ratio for dividing the spoil become the subject of huckstering arrangement on this floor, and altered and changed in the face of the Senate, until the requisite number of votes could be conciliated, or coerced, to pass the bill through.

But it is contended that the land revenue stands upon a different footing from the custom-house, or direct tax revenue; and that Congress may do with one what it cannot do with the other. This is a fallacy and absurdity which will not bear the touch of inquiry. There is no more rule for dividing land revenue than any other revenue; and there is no difference in law, or in fact, between the different branches of the public income. When the land is sold, the money received is revenue, and is Federal revenue, and is in the Federal Treasury, and cannot be taken from that Treasury, except by an appropriation law; and that appropriation law is nothing more nor less than the application of so much money to some constitutional object. The appropriation law takes what it finds in the Treasury. No law of Congress can discriminate between the different receipts; no human touch can tell what dollars were received for lands, and what for customs and direct taxes. The discrimination is impossible as a mere matter of fact; it is unconstitutional as a matter of law; it would be a mockery if inserted in the law. Distributions are not expenditures, neither in common parlance, nor in the meaning of our Constitution; and no money can be drawn from our Treasury except for an expenditure.

The clause on which the distributionists relied, and in which the assumptionists must follow them, is that in which Congress is authorized "to dispose of the territory and other property of the United States" The power of disposition is granted; but it is only for national purposes—for objects known to the Constitution—that Congress can dispose of this territory and of this property. Congress received it for national purposes, of which the first was to pay the debts of the Union. The early legislation of Congress declared this intent by pledging the lands to the redemption of the debt, and constituting the whole of the revenue receivable from it a part of the sinking fund for that object. The public lands have never fulfilled this destination. They have never paid the public debt, nor a shilling of it—not even its interest, or one shilling of its interest. They have been so managed, by waiting for inferior land to rise to the price of the first quality, that they have not met the expenses of purchases and management. Instead of paying any part of the public debt, they are themselves in debt to the custom-house revenue for money taken from that source to assist in their acquisition and management. The public lands have cost the United States one hundred and twelve millions of dollars; they have brought into the Treasury one hundred and four millions; and of that sum twenty-eight millions have been distributed among the States under the deposite act. Deducting this amount, and they lack thirty-six millions of paying for themselves. They are in debt that amount to the customs; and the whole burden of the public debt has been thrown upon the customs also. The lands, by being held up at a fixed price, the bad and the good all at the same rate, have been so little productive as not even to pay for their purchase and management. The custom-house revenue has borne all the burthens; and to make it do so, enormous has been the sum obtained from it. Few people have an idea of the enormity of this sum, and that it amounts to seven hundred and thirty-one millions of dollars; and that after paying its own expenses. Seven hundred and thirty-one millions is the clear revenue from customs; and of that amount, no less than four hundred and thirty millions have gone to the public debt, Treasury notes inclusive, and its interest. Here is a table which exhibits the annual receipts of the Government from lands and customs, and the annual payment from lands and customs, and the annual payments on account of the public debt, and purchases of land, and which verifies the statement which I have made.

This is the table in detail, (showing a large sheet,) but I only state the gross amounts under each head. They are:

For principal and interest of the public debt - - -	$421,496,000
Receipts from customs - -	731,295,000
Receipts from lands - -	104,000,000
Purchase of lands - - -	112,000,000

Three great errors, Mr. President, prevail in relation to the public lands; two of them errors of fact, one an error of constitutional law. They are fundamental errors, and lead to all the erroneous notions, and to all the erroneous movements which are now taking place, in Congress and elsewhere, in relation to the disposition of the public domain. These errors are, first, in supposing that the territorial cessions of the States were gifts of the soil to the Federal Government; secondly, in supposing that the cessions so made have fulfilled their destination in paying off the public debt; thirdly, in supposing that Congress is free from any constitutional restraint in disposing of these lands. These are radical and fundamental errors, leading to erroneous action in legislation; and they deserve the clear exposure which will utterly explode them. So far as fulfilling their destination in the payment of the public debt is concerned, that error is fully exploded. It has already been shown by authentic tables that the customs paid the public debt; that they both supported the Government, and paid the national debt; that the lands, in fact, have answered no part of their destination, not even having paid the expenses of their own acquisition and management. This makes that error clear the other two shall be as fully cleared up.

These are great points in the case, and I mean to make them clear both in the fact and in the argument. It is an error to say that these lands, any part of them, were donations to the Federal Government—that they were gifts from the States. This is what is commonly said, but it is a mistake, and an error of fact; and upon this error the whole argument of the distributionists, and their offspring, the assumptionists, has been built up. The United States have purchased all the lands they hold. They have paid the money, and a great price in money for them. No gifts, no donations, no gratuitous cessions of lands have been made to this Government; but with money from her Treasury has she bought and paid for the whole; and paid out for them more than they have yet paid back. This is my assertion, and here is the proof:

Purchase of Louisiana - -	$15,000,000
Interest paid thereon - -	8,329,353
Purchase of Florida - -	5,000,000
Interest thereon - - -	1,480,000
Paid to Georgia - - -	1,250,000
Same purchase in Mississippi stock	1,832,000
Extinguishing Indian titles - -	72,000,000
Survey of public lands - -	3,250,000
Salaries and expenditures in the General Land Office - -	1,250,000
Land offices and officers - -	3,300,000
	$112,691,353

This is the purchase money paid; and it is all that I propose to count in this argument; for it is sufficient for the argument, though not all that belongs to the argument. The value of other lands given in exchange, and the cost of getting possession, both belong to the argument, and far exceed in amount the totality of the purchase money paid. Thus Florida cost, in money, $6,480,000; but to this must be added Texas proper, and the country between the Red river and Arkansas which was given in exchange, and the cost of getting possession of Florida, which already three times exceeds the price of the country, and the possession not yet obtained. So of other purchases upon a smaller scale.

The whole amount of money received from the sales of lands, as I have shown heretofore, is but one hundred and four millions of dollars; so that here is a clear deficiency of eight millions of dollars under the head of paying for themselves. Add to this the twenty-eight millions distributed among the States, and the deficiency is thirty-six millions. And if to this we should still add, as we fairly might, the value of the lands given in exchange to Spain and the Indians, and the cost of getting possession of our purchases after we had made them, and the deficiency is many hundreds of millions. But I limit the argument to the sums paid out for purchases, and received back for sales.

Thus the lands are proved to have answered no part of their destination—to have paid no part of the public debt—not even to have defrayed the expenses of their own acquisition and management—and that they are at this time largely in debt to the customs. This is a charge upon them which they ought to pay; and it constitutes a strong objection to their alienation from Federal, and application to local, purposes. It is a strong objection, but not the strongest, to this alienation. A far stronger one is found in the fact that all the lands held by the United States have been purchased; that they are PURCHASES, and not GIFTS; and have all been acquired by giving money for them. Now it is agreed that this money could not have been divided among the States before it was given for the land; and if so, is it possible that we can effect the division after it has been given for land by the simple process of reconverting the land into money? If so, then have we found out a most facile and flexible method of getting rid of Constitutional obstructions!

In round numbers the sum of one hundred and twelve millions have been paid for the public lands, and the largest part of that sum for those which are called donations. To the Indians there have been paid seventy-two millions of dollars, and this to extinguish their titles to the lands presented by the States to the Federal Government; and this independent of the annuities yet to be paid, and which represent a capital of several millions. These Indian purchases have cost far more than Louisiana and Florida put together. They result from the cessions of the States—cessions which have generally been treated as donations of the land, when they were nothing but a transfer of the right to purchase them from the Indians. The States did not own the soil; the Indians were the acknowledged owners. All that the States claimed in the soil was the right of purchase from the Indians, and that right they ceded to the United States. Some States would not cede that right, as Massachusetts and Connecticut; and these have held on to the soil, and have sold, or are selling it, for their own advantage. Massachusetts and Maine now derive an annual income from the sale of their lands. Connecticut has received a large sum from hers. It was Virginia and Georgia that made the largest and most effective cessions, which ceded the right of purchase to the most extensive territories; and dearly enough has the United States paid for the privilege of buying the Indian titles to what they ceded. Almost the whole of the seventy-two millions paid to Indians has gone for the extinction of their titles to the Virginia and Georgia cessions; a mere fragment of it has gone to the Indians of Florida and Louisiana. The Indians of the Southern States, and of the Northern West, have received almost the whole; and besides this, Georgia received in money and Mississippi land scrip $3,082,000 for her cession, besides the obligation to extinguish the Indian title to their lands within her limits for her own benefit. Thus it is clear that the cessions from the States were not donations of land, but cessions of jurisdiction; with the transfer of the right to acquire from the Indians the soil within their ancient colonial boundaries, and which, in regard to the limits of the State, were generally ex territorial. The sum paid to the Indians, and that paid to Georgia, make about seventy-five millions of dollars which the purchases of the Indian titles have cost us; while the purchases from France and Spain, the interest included, barely amount to thirty millions. The expense of managing the whole has amounted to about eight millions; making a total for the cost and management of the lands of about one hundred and twelve millions of dollars.

I have gone over these details to establish a fact, and which fact is vital to the argument, that the whole of the lands owned by the United States are purchases, not donations; that they represent money drawn from the Treasury and invested in land, and now wearing the shape of acres in the woods instead of dollars in the Treasury. This is a fact now established. Here, then, are one hundred and twelve millions of dollars laid out for land, and now represented by land. Here are one hundred and twelve millions of dollars converted into land; and this brings us to the great constitutional error on this point. Before it was so converted, every one admits that it could not have been divided among the States. Every one admits that. Now, the question is, can we divide the land? or, reconvert it into money, and divide the dollars? Can we cheat the Constitution by this transmutation? Can we cheat ourselves, and the country, by such specimens of legislative alchymy and political juggling? If so, we have discovered a very facile way of helping ourselves to all that the Treasury contains. We may begin with the one hundred and twelve millions at once, and then proceed, converting and reconverting, buying land and selling land, until we have bought and divided that billion of acres, estimated at a billion and a quarter of dollars, which figured so largely in the debates on the land bills when they were first introduced, and when the national domain was presented as a bait to national cupidity.

This would seem to be enough; a billion and a quarter would seem to be enough; but it is only the beginning of what may be done under this new process of converting, and reconverting, the Federal revenues, and then dividing them. It is the beginning only of what may be done in this new school of alchymy, with our Constitution in its crucible. The transmutation may be made to reach all other property owned, or to be owned, by the United States; for the same clause which gives Congress authority to dispose of the territory, also gives it authority to dispose of all other property, belonging to the United States. Here then is a new and boundless field for obtaining money for distribution. Forts, arsenals, armories, magazines, arms, and munitions of war; fleets, ships, docks, navy yards and naval stores; barracks and hospitals; public edifices of all kinds, including the Capitol in which we sit; light-houses; bank stock, canal stock, road stock; every thing, in fact, which comes under the name of property, and which we now possess, or may choose to acquire: all this may be thrown into the legislative crucible, transmuted from an unconstitutional to a constitutional subject of distribution, and forthwith partitioned out among the States. Bills to divide the proceeds of the sales of "other property" may then become as familiar to our legislation as bills to divide the proceeds of the public lands now are; and instead of limiting our distributions to the States, what is to prevent us from extending the favor to corporate bodies, to individuals, and to the children of meritorious parents? Once descended from the safe and elevated mark of national objects, where is the limit, where the boundary which is to arrest the downward course of the application of the national funds? Once admitted that Congress is free from all constitutional control in disposing of the "territory" and "other property" of the Union, and what is there to guard the application of unbounded means, directed by unbounded power? What is there to prevent largesses and benefactions, in the shape of national gratitude and national munificence, to warriors, statesmen, poets, sculptors, musicians? What to prevent hereditary provision for the support of families, in the shape of hereditary pensions to successive generations for ancestral services? We touch the confines of an hereditary pension list at this moment; having already an ancestral list which 41,000 names now encumber; and let it be granted to Congress to do what it pleases, uncontrolled by the Constitution, with the territorial domain, and all the other property of the Union, and from that instant a pension list of forty-four thousand names, and three and a half millions of dollars, will quickly be extended and increased, and stretched into the ranks of posterity. No, sir, no. There is no constitutional way to assume these State debts, or to pay them, or to endorse them, or to smuggle the money to the States for that purpose, under the pretext of dividing land revenue, or surplus revenue, among them. There is no way to do it. The whole thing is constitutionally impossible. It was never thought of by the framers of our Constitution. They never dreamed of such a thing. There is not a word in their work to warrant it, and the whole idea of it is utterly repugnant and offensive to the objects and purposes for which the Federal Union was framed.

Sir, I repeat it: The Federal Constitution grew out of the want of money for the uses of the Federal Government. It grew out of that want, and nothing else; and it contains no grant of power in relation to the collection or the application of money, except for the uses and purposes of the Federal Government itself.

Having established the constitutional objection to assumption, naked or disguised, and shown that here was no difference between diverting land revenue and any other Federal revenue to State purposes, and having especially exploded the three vulgar errors, that the lands were donations from the States, that they have fulfilled their destination in paying the public debt, and that the power of Congress is absolute and arbitrary over them; having done this, I proceed to the secondary class of objections; namely, the evils of the measure. These evils are in themselves so great, so hostile to the general good, and so big with destruction to the Federal Union, that even if there was no constitutional impediment in the way, this measure of assumption, or provision for State debts, should be utterly rejected for its baleful consequences alone. And here it is proper to pause, to reflect, to look back upon the page of our own history, and to consult the experience of our own ancestors in relation to paying State debts, before we rush into the same business. We have had one assumption in our country, and that in a case which was small in amount, and free from the impediment of a constitutional objection; but which was attended by such evils as should deter posterity from imitating the example. It was in the first year of the Federal Government; and although the assumed debts were only twenty millions, and were alleged to have been contracted for general purposes, yet the assumption was attended by circumstances of intrigue and corruption, which led to the most violent dissension in Congress, suspended the business of the two Houses, drove some of the States to the verge of secession, and menaced the Union with instant dissolution. Mr. Jefferson, who was a witness of the scene, and who was overpowered by General Hamilton, and by the actual dangers of the country, into its temporary support, thus describes it:

"This game was over, (funding the soldiers' certificates,) and another was on the carpet at the moment of my arrival; and to this I was most ignorantly and innocently made to hold the candle. This fiscal manœuvre is well known by the name of the assumption. Independently of the debts of Congress, the States had, during the war, contracted separate and heavy debts, &c. * * * * * * This money, whether wisely or foolishly spent, was pretended to have been spent for general purposes, and ought therefore to be paid from the general purse. But it was objected, that nobody knew what these debts were, what their amount, or what their proofs. No matter; we will guess them to be twenty millions. But of these twenty millions, we do not know how much should be reimbursed to one State or how much to another. No matter; we will guess. And so another scramble was set on foot among the several States, and some got much, some little, some nothing. * * * * * This measure produced the most bitter and angry contests ever known in Congress, before or since the union of the States. * * * * * The great and trying question, however, was lost in the House of Representatives. So high were the feuds excited by this subject, that on its rejection business was suspended. Congress met and adjourned from day to day without doing any thing, the parties being too much out of temper to do business together. The Eastern members particularly, who, with Smith from South Carolina, were the principal gamblers in these scenes, threatened a secession and dissolution. * * * * * But it was finally agreed that whatever importance had been attached to the rejection of this proposition, the preservation of the Union, and of concord among the States, was more important; and that, therefore, it would be better that the vote of rejection should be rescinded; to effect which, some members should change their votes. But it was observed that this pill would be peculiarly bitter to the Southern States, and that some concominant measure should be adopted to sweeten it a little to them. There had before been propositions to fix the seat of Government either at Philadelphia, or at Georgetown, on the Potomac; and it was thought that by giving it to Philadelphia for ten years, and to Georgetown permanently afterwards, this might, as an anodyne, calm in some degree the ferment which might be excited by the other measure alone. So two of the Potomac members (White and Lee, but White with a revulsion of stomach almost convulsive) agreed to change their votes, and Hamilton undertook to carry the other point; and so the assumption was passed, and twenty millions of stock divided among the favored States, and thrown in as a pabulum to the stockjobbing herd. * * Still the machine was not complete; the effect of the funding system and of the assumption would be temporary; it would be lost with the loss of the individual members whom it had enriched; and some engine of influence more permanent must be contrived while these myrmidons were yet in place to carry it through. This engine was the Bank of the United States."

What a picture is here presented! Debts assumed in the mass, without knowing what they were in the gross, or what in detail—Congress in a state of disorganization, and all business suspended for many days—secession and disunion openly menaced—compromise of interests—intrigue—buying and selling of votes—conjunction of parties to pass two measures together, neither of which could be passed separately—speculators infesting the halls of legislation, and openly struggling for their spoil—the funding system a second time sanctioned and fastened upon the country—jobbers and gamblers in stocks enriched—twenty millions of additional national debt created—and the establishment of a National Bank insured: Such were the evils attending a small assumption of twenty millions of dollars, and that in a case where there was no constitutional impediment to be evaded or surmounted. What, then, must be expected when the assuming process is to begin with hundreds of millions—is to reach a billion—is to cover, in the end, all sorts of State debts, and is to be attended with flagrant breaches, or derisory evasions, of the Constitution?

With this retrospective view of the mischiefs of a former assumption, in a case so much more mitigated, I proceed to the evils of the new one, disguised as a distribution of land revenue among the States, and a provision for the payment of their internal improvement debts. In taking up this class of objections, it is proper to show, in the first place, the nature and amount of the State debts for which the Federal aid or guarantee is claimed—the purposes for which they were created—their present value at home and abroad—and the proportions in which they are distributed among the several States. And here I avail myself of the valuable and authentic information collected by an eminent citizen of New York, the Comptroller of the State, Mr. Flagg. As late Comptroller, it became his duty, under the general banking law of the State, to issue circulating bank notes to banking companies on receiving from them pledges of State stocks. The proper execution of this duty required him to become acquainted with these stocks; and for this purpose he applied to the fiscal authorities of each State, and received the answers which he afterwards embodied into the document which now constitutes the magazine of information from which we all obtain our knowledge on this subject. His report showed the astounding sum of one hundred and seventy millions of debt contracted or authorized by eighteen of the States, (in reality by sixteen, as two of them owe but a trifle,) and that without counting the twenty-eight millions received on deposite from the Federal Government. This was above a year ago; and, taking into the calculation what may have been incurred since, with the Florida debt of five millions, and some other species of debt, the whole may now be estimated at more than two hundred millions of dollars. But confining my remarks to the amount which appears in the tables of Mr. Flagg, and it is seen that this large amount of one hundred and seventy millions of dollars of debt was found in the States of Maine, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, South Carolina, Alabama, Louisiana, Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Michigan. Eight of the States of the Union, namely, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, Delaware, North Carolina, and Georgia, enjoy the proud and enviable distinction of not finding their names on the indebted list. Maine and Missouri are only nominally on the unhappy list; the former having created but half a million of debt, and the latter having sent out her bonds too late to be sold, and a good portion of them remaining yet in the power of the State to recal and cancel. Sixteen may be taken then as the number of the indebted States, and 170 millions the amount which they owe; but of these sixteen, only thirteen are involved in the species of debt now proposed to be provided for, namely, the internal improvement debt.

We now take up the tables of Mr. Flagg.

The objects to which these 170 millions are applicable, and the amount for each object, are these:

For banking - - -	$52,640,000
For canals - - -	60,201,551
For railroads - - -	42,871,084
For turnpikes and McAdam roads -	6,618,958

The proportions among the different States are:

Massachusetts - - -	4,200,000 00
New York - - -	18,262,406 84
Pennsylvania - -	27,306,790 00
Maryland - - -	11,492,980 73
Virginia - - -	6,662,089 00
South Carolina - -	5 753,270 12
Alabama - - -	10,800,000 00
Louisiana - - -	23,735,000 00
Tennessee - - -	7,148,166 66
Kentucky - - -	7,360,000 00

*Whole or part for improvement of river navigation.

The proportionate increase of the whole debt, in successive periods of five years and three years, from 1820 to 1838, is this:

From 1820 to 1825,	$12,790,728
" 1825 to 1830,	13,679,689
" 1830 to 1835,	40,002,769
" 1835 to 1838, (say 3½ yrs.)	108,223,808

Such are the amounts, and the distribution among States and objects, and the progressive increase of these State debts. Having seen these particulars—having viewed the debt in its gross and in its detail—the next thing I propose to examine is to see what the States received in return for such enormous liabilities; what it is that represents these debts now at home; and what the debts themselves are worth in the stock market of foreign countries. And here I can say in grief, and with sorrow, that almost the whole amount of what the States received was British dry goods—mere British dry goods—not even groceries. I say it with grief, and with sorrow, that almost the whole amount of what the sixteen States received for their sterling bonds, bearing a sterling interest which will not be less than ten per cent. to the people who pay it, was British dry goods, which have been sold for paper money to construct roads and canals, and to build up paper system banks. This is what we have got for 170,000,000 of sterling debt. The process was about this: The bonds were sold for bank credits in Europe or the Atlantic cities; bills of exchange were drawn upon these credits in favor of merchants who took up the amount in dry goods; the bills of exchange were paid for by the merchants in paper money; and this paper money, after some time, returned to the banks from which it came. Thus, the whole operation was a circle of paper, going round and round in paper, and ending in its own extinction, and never emerging from the paper circle but once, and then to effect importations of British goods. The goods are worn out; the paper money has returned to the place from whence it came; the operation is over; and nothing remains of the transactions but the 170,000,000 of debt, its devouring interest, and the banks, canals and roads which represent it. The whole of these banks have failed once, and most of them twice, in two years; the greater part of the roads and canals are unfinished, and of those finished several are unproductive. And this is the history of the State debts, the burthen of which it is now proposed to cast upon the shoulders of the Federal Government. But the whole of these debts are not even the direct debt of the State, but a security debt incurred for companies, corporations, and individuals to whom the State credit, that is to say, the State bonds, have been lent to enable them to build banks, and make improvements, or engage in some speculative undertaking, for which they had no means of their own. A part of the State debt is in this form; and that part becomes doubly objectionable to me from its intrinsic unworthiness, and inherent vitiousness. I have yet to discover, in the Constitutions of such of the States as I have examined for the purpose, the power by which the Legislature undertakes to lend the credit of the State, that is to say, the labor and property of the people, to companies, corporations, and individuals, for their private advantage, and to make the community stand security for the success of their undertakings. I question the power in the States; I deny it where the authority cannot be shown; and I utterly deny it in the Congress of the United States. As to the wisdom of such loans and securityship, that may be seen in many instances, and especially in some Southern banks, and above all, in a certain railroad project in Florida, where the Legislative Council first granted a charter for the road, and then furnished the bonds to build it, and wherein the corporators sold the bonds in Europe for iron, then obtained a remission of the duties from Congress, then sold the iron on their own account, and afterwards demanded more bonds for the commencement of the road. This, though an extreme case, is not the only instance which time will develope of the improvidence of such loans and securityships. Like many other lenders, the State may lose; like many other endorsers, she may have to pay. The undertaking may fail in many instances; and a wasteful prodigality in spending the money so obtained must be expected in all. Yet these constitute a part of the State debts for the payment of which Congress will be called on to provide.

Such are the representatives of the State debts. These are what the States have realized in exchange for their sterling bonds and sterling interest. The best of the banks are doing but little; the best of the roads and canals are hardly paying repairs, management, and interest. The mass of these institutions and works may be thus characterized: Barren banks, which cannot lend; suspended banks, which will not pay; broken banks, which cannot pay; unfinished roads and canals, which are useless; finished ones, which are either bringing their owners in debt, or barely paying the expense of repairs, the cost of management, and interest upon the outlay. This is their condition. Their value at home is shown by the thermometer of the stock market, where they range at all the degrees below par, down to the freezing point of zero. In Europe, although backed by the credit of States, they rate from one-half to three-fourths of their nominal value; and this is the stock which the Federal Government is to be called upon to raise to par, or above it, for the benefit of the holders in Europe, while the representatives of this stock in America—the banks, the roads, and the canals—are to remain as they are, or to be galvanized into a new fit of ephemeral animation, by the battery of new debts, contracted abroad. It is for this that the assumption is to be claimed—no, not the assumption—that word will not be used here. The pen of Mr. Jefferson has stamped upon it an immortality of infamy, and it will not be repeated here. The public lands will be invoked for that purpose; and, by this indirection, the national domain will virtually be presented as a gift to the capitalists of Europe; and not to the capitalists only, but to the stockjobbing fry also—that pestilential spawn of the funding and paper systems—which, having so often mastered the Parliament of Great Britain, are next to try their hand on the Congress of the United States. A diversion of the national domain to the payment of these debts, would immediately raise them far above par—would be a present of 50 or 60 cents on the dollar, and of 50 or 60 millions in the gross—to the foreign holders, and, virtually, a present of so much public land to them. It is in vain for the bill to say that the proceeds of the lands are to be divided among the States. The indebted States will deliver their portion to their creditors; they will send it to Europe; they will be nothing but the Receivers General and the Sub-Treasurers of the bankers and stockjobbers of London, Paris, and of Amsterdam. The proceeds of the sales of the lands will go to them. The hard money, wrung from the hard hand of the Western cultivator, will go to these foreigners; and the whole influence of these foreigners will be immediately directed to the enhancement of the price of our public lands, and to the prevention of the passage of all the laws which go to graduate their price, or to grant pre-emptive rights to the settlers.

Let us now take a rapid view of the evils of this assumption, disguised as it may be with the cloak of the national domain revenue for distribution, or with the drapery of a surplus revenue for division, or deposite, among the States. I have already grouped into a single assemblage of features the more prominent and palpable of these evils, and shall not stop to dilate minutely upon them now. The bare presentation of the picture is enough to fill the mind with the most painful and disquieting apprehensions. What more revolting than to compel the non-indebted States to incur burthens for others which they have refused to incur for themselves? What more shocking than this? Yet such is the proposition, disguise it as you may, which is to be brought before us. Fourteen of the States only are indebted for internal improvements; for four of those whose names are on the indebted list owe nothing on that head. Maine, Missouri, Mississippi, and Arkansas, owe nothing for roads and canals, to which Louisiana might be added; for she owes but a trifle on that head, little more than half a million of dollars. Here, then, are thirteen States which are in debt for internal improvements, the only kind of debts now proposed to be provided for, and thirteen which are not; and the proposition will be to make them all even by plunging the whole into the same degree of debt. It would be rather too monstrous to require the thirteen non-indebted to assume the one-half of the debts of the other thirteen. That would be rather outrageous. A different turn must, therefore, be given to the scheme; and the non-indebted States seduced into debt to an equal amount with the others, and then the whole of the States made payma ter for the whole of the debts. This is the fine scheme which is now to occupy us, and a national debt of three hundred millions created at once (for that is the sum computed to be wanting) to equalize the condition of the States in point of indebtedness. That which is now one hundred millions on thirteen of the States, is to be made three hundred millions on the whole; and these three hundred millions are to constitute the starting point of a new national debt, and the kernel of the new National Bank. Truly, we are but at the commencement of the "CREDIT SYSTEM."

What can be more obvious than that diversion of the land revenue from national to State purposes, will create a necessity for loans, or taxes, or issues of Treasury notes, to supply the place of the funds so diverted? The lands now produce six or seven millions annually, and, with a reduction of price, will produce an increased sum to meet the deficiencies of the custom-house revenue in the two last years of the compromise, which are now at hand. Both lands and customs barely meet the demands of the Government at this time; what then must be the state of the revenue in 1841 and 1842, if thrown exclusively upon the customs, then undergoing their last reduction, and sunk to an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent.? Doubtless the revival of a heavy tariff must ensue; and this is so obvious to every observer, that it must be assumed to be one of the objects of diverting the land revenue from Federal to State purposes.

What can be more demoralizing, more ruinous, and more destructive, not only to our Federal political system, but to the social and moral system itself, than to allow the States to create debts for their own purposes, and then club together and throw the payment of these debts on the Federal Government? What more fatal than this? The restraint upon the creation of debt is the obligation to pay it. Remove that restraint—separate the characters of contractor and payer—and all the barriers of economy, moderation and safety are broken down. The States are stimulated into debts which the Union is to pay; and the precedent once set, must be rapidly followed up by new debts on the part of the States, and new assumptions on the part of the Union. We begin with providing for internal improvement debts; quickly those incurred for banks are added. Then follow all those contracted for "other purposes," even the security debts incurred by loans of credit to companies, corporations, and individuals, no matter how unwisely incurred, how extravagantly applied, and how wastefully squandered.

Touch these State debts in any way, no matter how—put your hand to the work in any form that you please—and from that moment you are in for the whole; from that moment you assume the ultimate payment. Thus it was with the debt of this District, incurred for the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal. We passed an act in 1828, to enable the District to borrow the money. The sagacious men of this body—Mr. Macon, Mr. Van Buren, and others—opposed the act, upon the ground that the agent of the District would go abroad with that act in his hand, and show it to foreign capitalists; and although it contained no promise on our part to guaranty the payment, yet the United States would become involved in the transaction, and ultimately have to pay it all; and thus it happened. That debt, interest, and all, is now assumed by the United States. I was one of the few who opposed it, thanks to my association with Macon and Randolph, from whom I learnt my leading principles in political economy. I opposed that act, giving authority to this District to borrow money for the canal, on the ground that it would involve us in the transaction, and ultimately make us liable for the whole; and now I oppose any connection, disguised as it may be, with the State debts, on the same ground. Touch them, and we embrace them; put our finger to the work, and the shoulders follow; give them the proceeds of the public lands, and from that moment you have given the whole revenues and the whole credit of the United States. You have given all, in giving any thing; for all the rest would follow. Custom-house revenue and Treasury notes would soon be called in to supply the deficiency of the land revenue; and new debts would swallow up the whole resources of the Union.

What more unwise and more unjust than to contract debts on long time, as some of the States have done, thereby invading the rights and mortgaging the resources of posterity, and loading unborn generations with debts not their own? What more unwise than all this, which several of the States have done, and which the effort now is to make all do? Besides the ultimate burthen in the shape of final payment, which is intended to fall upon posterity, the present burthen is incessant in the shape of annual interest, and falling upon each generation, equals the principal in every periodical return of ten or a dozen years. Few have calculated the devouring effect of annual interest on public debts, and considered how soon it exceeds the principal. Who supposes that we have paid near three hundred millions of interest on our late national debt, the principal of which never rose higher than one hundred and twenty-seven millions, and remained but a year or two at that? Who supposes this? Yet it is a fact that we have paid four hundred and thirty-one millions for principal and interest of that debt; so that near three hundred millions, or near double the maximum amount of the debt itself, must have been paid in interest alone; and this at a moderate interest varying from three to six per cent. and payable at home. Some of the States, on the contrary, engage to pay six or seven per cent. in London, which must require a levy of nine or ten per cent. from their citizens to raise and remit to the place of payment. The States counted on seeing this interest paid, and the debt itself ultimately redeemed, by the profits of the banks, the roads, canals, and jobbing companies, and projectors, for which and for whom they were contracted. Vain and illusory expectation! A few of the works may yield a profit, and realize the calculation made upon them; but as to the mass of these undertakings, they must sink upon the hands of the States. As to the banks, most of them must rot down on their foundations before the bonds are due upon which they were built; and as to the jobbers and projectors to whom the State credit was lent, most of them, when they have squandered the money for which the bonds were sold, will quietly leave the State to pay both principal and interest. Such is the improvidence of lending State credit, and contracting debts upon long time, and throwing their payment upon unborn generations. And this is what sixteen of our States have been doing, and what it is proposed to make the whole twenty-six now do. The British national debt owes its existence entirely to this policy. It was but a trifle in the beginning of the last century, and might have been easily paid during the reigns of the first and second George; but the policy was to fund it, that is to say, to pay the interest annually, and send down the principal to posterity; and the fruit of that policy is now seen in a debt of four thousand five hundred millions of dollars, two hundred and fifty millions of annual taxes, with some millions of people without bread, while an army, a navy, and a police, sufficient to fight all Europe, is kept under pay, to hold in check and subordination the oppressed and plundered ranks of their own population. And this is the example which the transferrers of the State debt would have us to imitate, and this the end to which they would bring us!

What can be more plain than that, in providing for these debts of the States, we beget a spirit which must constantly cater for the means of new distributions, by keeping down necessary appropriations, and keeping up unnecessary taxes? Of this we have experience for our instruction, as well as theory for our guide. The land distribution bills a few years ago, and the deposite bill of 1836, begat such a spirit in Congress, that all the fortification bills were lost for several years, and one of them actually sunk between the Houses, after passing the Senate, by having a new deposite bill fastened upon it; and a bill for the repeal of three millions of dollars of taxes, including the salt tax, was also lost, while the complaint of the Treasury was an excessive revenue, and a surplus for which there was no use!

Who cannot see that the diversion of the land revenue from the Federal Treasury is to be attended with the immediate revival of the high protective tariff, falling unequally on different parts of the Union, and most heavily on the planting, grain growing, and provision raising States? and who does not see that the revival of that tariff is to give the highest discontent to the overburthened parts of the Union, and excite in their bosoms a deep and just degree of dissatisfaction?

Who so blind as not to see the disastrous consequences of bringing the States to the foot-stool of the Federal Government, to receive supplies from the public Treasury? Wasteful extravagance in their expenses, with ultimate abject dependence on the Federal head, with consolidation in its train, is one alternative of the consequences which presents itself; annihilation of the Federal head, by the loss of its revenues and property, which might be devoured by the States, is the other alternative of the same disastrous consequences. It may be a question which would occur—whether the States would be swallowed up by the Federal head, or whether the Federal head would be devoured by the States; most probably the latter; but one of them inevitably; and the result would be the same to our present frame of Government, be it which it might. We have encountered and surmounted many dangers; we have gone through many perils which tried the strength of our federative system; but of all the dangers we have surmounted, of all the trials we have gone through, there are none, in my opinion, which can compare with the perilous experiment of supplying the States out of the Federal Treasury.

Who does not see the new and fearful impulse which the assumption of the State debts, or a provision for their payment out of the general funds, must give to the delusive and destructive career of the paper system? Already in a state of frightful overaction, the votaries of that system deem nothing done while the Federal Government is free from its vortex. With nine hundred banks to emit paper money; with six hundred millions of authorized bank capital; with more than one thousand millions of stocks of all sorts; with five hundred banks in a state of suspension; with one hundred millions of depreciated bank paper, including post notes; with two hundred millions borrowed by eighteen States from Europe; with twenty-eight millions received on deposite from the United States; with a mammoth bank of thirty-five millions, chartered for thirty years, the identical personification of the credit system, with its two bankruptcies in two years, its first duty to foreigners and its last to its own country, exporting ship loads of specie to these foreigners while refusing shillings to those who chartered it; with all this we are still at the commencement of the paper credit system. A national debt and a national bank are the two pillars of that system; and to obtain that debt and that bank is now the main object of pressing the State debts upon the Federal Government. Let that object be accomplished; let a new national debt be created; and the new national bank grow out of it, and the credit system will quickly produce the fruits here which it has already borne in England, and where, in less than a century and a half, it has raised a national debt from twenty-one millions five hundred and fifteen thousand seven hundred and forty-two pounds thirteen shillings eight pence and two farthings, to nine hundred millions sterling; the annual taxes from four millions to forty-five millions sterling; the National Bank from one million two hundred thousand pounds, to fourteen millions; and, as a consequence of the whole, has filled the country with millionaries and beggars, with palaces and poorhouses. Give the credit system the new impulse which it seeks here, and it will soon supply our America with the fruits which it has borne in England.

The effect of all this policy in begetting a passion for periodical distributions of land revenue, or surplus revenue, or extensions of national credit, will be to put the people of this Union into that road which the Romans entered when they commenced a distribution of grain from the public granaries, and ended with putting up the consulship to sale, and the diadem of empire to auction. It is a passion which grows on what it feeds, and becomes insatiate in proportion to what it devours. On this point we have the instruction of our recent experience to guide us, as well as the suggestions of an enlightened forecast to warn us. I have already said that assumption is the child of distribution—the child of the projects and speeches for the distribution of land revenue or rurplus revenue—which have excited and tantalized the public mind for so many years past. I have said it was this which stimulated the States into improvident undertakings, rushed them headlong into heavy debts, and turned their eyes upon the national domain, and the Federal Treasury, for succor and relief from their premature burthens. This is what I have said; and now look at the proof in the table of the progressive growth and increase of the State debts which I have already mentioned to you. Here it is. See it. From 1820 to 1825, when none of the distribution schemes had been thought of in Congress, the amount of State debt incurred was only twelve millions and three quarters, in five years—barely two and a half millions per annum—and this confined to the old and populous States, whose resources were adequate to their undertakings, and whose means were equal to the payment of their contracts. In the next period of five years, from 1825 to 1830, the increase of the State debts was still in the same slow and moderate proportion, and confined to the same class of States. Mr. Dickerson's bill for the distribution of the surplus revenue was brought forward during this period; but its instant and peremptory condemnation by the Senate counteracted its influence, and prevented it from having the least effect in stimulating the expenditures of the States, or exciting the spirit of speculation; and the State debts, in these five years, only advanced thirteen and a half millions of dollars; being still at the moderate rate of little more than two and a half millions per annum. The third period from 1830 to 1835, was filled with bills and speeches for the distribution of land revenue, and majorities were found in both Houses of Congress to countenance the projects, and to inflame the passions which they engendered. Then it was that speculation and State debt received a powerful impulse, and the debts of the States made the gigantic stride of forty millions in five years; being at the rate of eight millions of dollars per annum. What was worse, some of the young States began to be infected with the heresy that State debts were State blessings, and rushed into undertakings for which they were not ripe, and for which the credit system had to furnish the means. The fourth period—for I still quote from the invaluable tables of Mr. Flagg—the fourth period only embraced three years and a half, from 1835 to 1837, and a part of 1838; but it covered the period of the cluster of bills for the distribution of the surplus revenue, as it was called, the seductive speeches in their favor, and the dazzling tables of distributive shares, which then filled this chamber, and which took the ultimate form of a deposite with the States. The State debts, in that delusive period, advanced one hundred and eight millions of dollars! counting the twenty-eight millions received from the United States, and the total advance was one hundred and thirty-eight millions! the progressive rate of increase being close on forty millions of dollars per annum. This frightful career of debt involved in its course even the youngest and weakest States, and some of the Territories; and the result of the whole was a larger debt contracted in that brief period by about one-half of the States, than the whole Union owed at the highest point of our national debt for all its wars, and acquisitions of territory—the Revolutionary war, the Louisiana and Florida purchases, all inclusive!

This is what came from stimulating the appetite of the States for public distributions; this is what came from turning their eyes upon the national domain and the Federal Treasury for the payment of their debts. This is the fruit of our land bills, our distribution bills, and our deposite bills; and this is what I said would be their fruit, and a great deal more, during the many years that, almost "solitary and alone," I made head against them on this floor. This being the result of our experience, what must be the effect of now surrendering the national domain to the payment of these debts? Certainly to start the States again in a new career of debts, to excite them into extravagance, under the conviction that they are not to pay, and to bring them periodically upon Congress, with fresh demands, until the national domain shall be exhausted, the Federal Treasury emptied, and the credit of the Union reduced to contempt.

I am willing to speak as gently as possible of this deposite act. I wrote its history in advance when I spoke against it at the time of its passage—my friends, all except five, joined in passing it. I denounced it as a disguised distribution, as a mock evasion of the Constitution, and as a curse to the States which were to commence the practice of receiving supplies from the Federal Treasury. It is not my purpose to repeat what I then said, by way of self commendation, but it is pertinent and profitable at present to look to the actual effect of this deposite act upon the States, how it inflamed some with the notion of inexhaustible supplies from the Federal Government; rushed them into debts for unnecessary, or unwise undertakings; engendered a spirit of wasteful extravagance; and, instead of relieving the States from taxes, has largely augmented the burthen of taxation. The States, most of them, are, beyond all comparison, infinitely worse off now than they were before they received their unfortunate distribution from the Federal Government. So I declared it would be when the act passed; so I declare it will be again, and worse, if we go on to supply them out of the Federal Treasury. Their relief is in the resort to their own resources, and in the ECONOMY which such a resort begets and enforces.

Such are the faint outlines of the mischiefs of this assumption, disguised and covered up as it may be with the cloak of distribution, or deposite. They are frightful and appalling, and must fill with apprehension the bosom of every friend to the harmony and duration of this Federal Union. But, frightful as they are, there is still another feature to be added to the picture, to increase its deformity, and to perfect its title to unmitigated horror and detestation. That feature is the crowning mischief of foreign interference and foreign influence! Every one knows that these State debts are due in Europe, where they constitute a stock which is sold from hand to hand, and which is greatly depreciated. The elevation of this stock to par, or above, is an object of the first magnitude with the present holders; and the way to elevate it is to extend its basis, and make it the debt of the whole, instead of a part, of the States. Many private letters arriving from Europe had suggested this movement. Many agents, or emissaries, in the interest of the foreign holders, had suggested it here. The whole of our citizens who visited Europe, especially those in public station, were sounded and consulted about it. Finally, things were ripe for a public revelation, and the authentic proposition for the assumption appeared, emanating from one of the most respectable banking houses in London, the head of which is the present Chancellor of the British Exchequer, and a peer of the realm of Great Britain. The house is that of the well known Messrs. Baring, Brothers and Company, and the part of their letter which particularly relates to the assumption is this:

"But if the whole scheme of internal improvements in the Union is to be carried into effect on the vast scale, and with the rapidity lately projected, and by the means of foreign capital, a more comprehensive guarantee than that of individual States will be required to raise so large an amount in so short a time. A national pledge would undoubtedly collect capital together from all parts of Europe; but the forced sales of loans made separately by all the individual States in reckless competition, through a number of channels, render the terms more and more onerous for all, lower the reputation of American credit, and (as reliance is almost exclusively placed on the London market) produce temporary mischief here, by absorbing the floating capital, diverting money from regular business, deranging banking operations, and producing an unnatural balance of trade against this country. It would seem, therefore, as if most of the States must either pause in the execution of their works of improvement, or some general system of combination must be adopted."

Such are the terms of this important letter; very delicately expressed, the proposition hypothetically predicated, and the object handsomely veiled with the seductive show of an accommodation and favor to the United States. Nothing could be more unceptionable than the language in which these bankers have brought forward their scheme; but it is for us to look at the object distinctly, which they faintly disclose This object is nothing more nor less than for the United States to become bound, in any way they please, for the payment of the debts of the individual States. It is a great object with these bankers, and with the capitalists of London, Paris, and Amsterdam. The debts are of great amount; they are greatly depreciated; and they are due from parties which present the anomaly of being neither sutable nor coercible, though able to contract, and morally bound to comply with their contracts. The sources of the expected means of payment, namely, the profits from banking, road making, and canal making, must fail with many; and while eventual and full compliance with their bonds may be expected from all, yet a literal and punctual discharge of their obligations must fail on the part of some. All this is known, seen, and felt in Europe: hence the depreciation of the stocks, and hence the natural desire to obtain the guarantee of a party, less anomalous in character, more abundant in means and more perfect in credit. The object is great; the party interested in the application is powerful; success to them is worth many ten millions of dollars; and to have success, they must operate upon the public opinion, and upon the legislation of this country. They must go to the press, to the elections, to the State Legislatures, and to the Congress of the Union. They must operate at all points, upon the individual citizens, and upon the constituted authorities; and they must operate by the means, and the only means, known to the moneyed power. Here then is a case of foreign interference in our affairs, and of foreign influence in our councils, more dangerous to the purity and stability of our institutions, and more to be dreaded by us, than the forcible invasion of our country by foreign fleets and armies. It is a case in which an ass, loaded with gold, is more to be dreaded than the war-horse, whose neck is clothed with thunder.

I do not dilate upon the evils of a foreign influence. They are written upon the historical page of every free Government, from the most ancient to the most modern; they are among those most deeply dreaded, and most sedulously guarded against by the founders of the American Union. The Constitution itself contains a special canon directed against them. To prevent the possibility of this foreign influence, every species of foreign connection, dependence, or employment, is constitutionally forbid to the whole list of our public functionaries. The inhibition is express and fundamental, that "no person holding any office of profit or trust under the United States shall, without the consent of Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title, of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign State." All this was to prevent any foreign potentate from acquiring partisans or influence in our Government—to prevent our own citizens from being seduced into the interests of foreign powers. Yet, to what purpose all these constitutional provisions against petty sovereignties, if we are to invite the moneyed power which is able to subsidize kings, princes, and potentates; if we are to invite this new and master power into the bosom of our councils, give it an interest in controlling public opinion, in directing Federal and State legislation, and in filling our cities and seats of Government with its insinuating agents, and its munificent and lavish representatives? To what purpose all this wise precaution against the possibility of influence from the most inconsiderable German or Italian prince, if we are to invite the combined bankers of England, France, and Holland, to take a position in our legislative halls, and by a simple enactment of a few words, to convert their hundreds of millions into a thousand millions, and to take a lease of the labor and property of our citizens for generations to come. The largest moneyed operation which we ever had with any foreign power, was that of the purchase of Louisiana from the Great Emperor. That was an affair of fifteen millions. It was insignificant and contemptible, compared to the hundreds of millions for which these bankers are now upon us. And are we, while guarded by the Constitution against influence from an Emperor and fifteen millions, to throw ourselves open to the machinations of bankers, with their hundreds of millions?

It is not the Constitution only, but the whole early history of our Government which is full of this jealousy and precaution against foreign influence. Our Government went into operation with a contest upon this point, and with a division of political parties upon it. The Federalists and the Democracy divided upon it; the former headed by General Hamilton, the latter by Mr. Jefferson. To impose upon us the funding system, the paper system, the banking system, the credit system of England, was the aim of one of the parties; to prevent these impositions was the aim of the other. One party pushed all these systems, with a national debt and a National Bank for their basis; the other labored to preserve the hard money Government which had been made by hard money men; and to prevent that imitation of the British systems, and that connection with these systems, and dependence upon them, which must end in subjecting us to the pecuniary as well as political influence of the English. The Federalists prevailed. The genius of Hamilton, and his position at the head of the Treasury, gave him the victory. The British systems were all imposed upon us, and the result has been precisely what was foreseen by the Democracy forty-five and fifty years ago. We have become the victims of those whose institutions we copied; and thirty years' convulsion of our moneyed system attests the miserable subjection to which we have been reduced. The infamous and traitorous sentiment that our first duty is to foreigners, has become the sentiment of enough to make it the action of the country, and to make the Federal Government, the State Governments, and the people, the victim of its treasonous consequences. From this sentiment it results that our banks are to be broken just as often as it is necessary to break them, to save the banks in England; that our gold and silver must be exported, and our Government and our citizens deprived of specie for marketing, for postages, for travelling expenses, or for taxes, just as often and just as long as the English require our hard money to be sent to them; that all our moneyed operations must be made to depend on the news which the next English steamer may bring out; and that the price of property, labor, and produce, must be made to rise and fall all over the United States precisely as ordered and directed by the moneyed power in London. Our President has faithfully depicted this state of degradation, subjection and injury, in that part of his message in which he says that our our money system has its centre in London; that all our banks are linked together by a chain of dependence which ends there; that not only the great cities, but the remote villages of the interior, are linked to this chain; that the establishment of a new bank in the most distant village of our Union immediately places the business of that village within the influence of the money power of England; and that the result of the whole is the periodical convulsions and bank suspensions to which we are subject, and the establishment of a dangerous foreign influence in our bosom. These are the declarations of the President; and these declarations we all know to be a faithful history of what we suffer. We know the curse of our country at this moment, its broken banks, depreciated paper money, and sickening demoralization, is the effect of our subjection to the moneyed oligarchy in England; and that subjection is the fruit of our copying her delusive systems—her paper system and funding system—near fifty years ago. Since the revival of the Democratic party, we have been endeavoring to throw off this subjection, and return to the hard money system created for us by the hard money men who framed what they intended to be a hard money Government. We have made some progress towards this return to the true principles of our Government, when we find ourselves beset by the danger of falling into greater subjection than ever. About one-half of the States have linked themselves to the chain whose end is in London; and the moneyed power in London seizes the opportunity to increase the strength and weight of the chain, by linking all the rest of the States to it. This is the struggle that is now before us, and in which foreign capitalists must find so great a temptation to interfere, and in which they count on the aid of the indebted States to involve the others, and the whole Union, in their own unfortunate condition.

To make head against all these evils, while we are able to do so; to stifle foreign interference in its cradle; to repulse the insidious approach of assumption in the disguise of a land revenued distribution; to enable ourselves to go on with the appropriate business of Congress, I think it right to anticipate the attack, and to put an end to hope and future efforts, by adopting resolutions of the tenor and character which I have had the honor to offer.

Mr. President, in conclusion, permit me to turn one word towards myself for the sake of doing justice to others. Among those events of my life for which I have reason to be thankful, was the circumstance of being admitted into the intimacy and friendship of Mr. Macon and Mr. Randolph at my entrance into this body. I lived in the same house for many years with these two illustrious sages and patriots, and from them I learnt to abhor the paper system of England, fastened upon us by General Hamilton, and to venerate the hard money Government framed for us by our ancestors, and taken from us by the Federalists of near fifty years ago. Our Constitution was pushed from her foundations as she went into operation; she was pushed off the solid rock of hard money, where our ancestors anchored her, and plunged into the tempestuous ocean of paper. It has been tossed near fifty years in that ocean; but is now settling back to her old foundations. The administrations of JACKSON and VAN BUREN are bringing her back; and all my labors now—all my labors for many years—have been directed to that consummation, and to the relief of our country from its degrading, ruinous, and demoralizing dependence on the destructive and delusive paper system of Great Britain. To break the chain which now binds us to the footstool of the moneyed power of London—at all events to prevent that chain from being made heavier and stronger—is one of the objects of submitting these resolutions; and I invoke for them, and for what I have said in their support, the candid consideration of the Senate and the country.

The question being on the adoption of the resolutions,

Mr. GRUNDY thought that the question should be taken on each proposition separately, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. LUMPKIN rose and said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I am prepared, here or elsewhere, to express my concurrence in the doctrines and principles embraced in the resolutions of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] and I have listened to the Senator's speech with much interest and general approbation.

I consider the movement of the Senator upon this subject well-timed; it meets at the threshold a dangerous and unnatural connection, which has been anticipated in certain quarters, between the Federal and State Governments.

Sir, in the language of the first resolution, I believe "that there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States which can authorize the legislative power of the Union to assume the debts of the States which have been contracted for local and State purposes." Sir, said Mr. L. the value, the beauty, the harmony and the perpetuity of our good form of government depends upon a rigid and strict adherence to the letter and spirit of the Constitution of the United States.

Let the States as well as the Federal Government move on in their respective spheres of constitutional action, without encroachment on either side, or creating connections and relations, the tendency of which will eventuate in weakening and diminishing the power and sovereignty of the States. Let the States, in the management of their State policy and local concerns, look to and rely upon their own resources, and never, from any temporary consideration or embarrassment, be induced to supplicate this Government for pecuniary aid, which will result in impairing that lofty spirit of self-reliance and independence which is absolutely necessary to high self-respect. Sir, the magnitude of the danger of that policy which it is the object of the Senator from Missouri to guard against, can scarcely be exaggerated.

If it be once conceded that the Federal Government has the right to levy and collect money from the people, for the purpose of distribution amongst the several States, then, indeed, is the power of this Government unlimited; nothing will be left to the States worth contending for. Such a measure would inundate our whole system. Instead of this Government deriving its power of taxation from the States, the States, under such a system of distribution, would become the mere suppliants of this Government, and at the same time the organs to tax, harrass, and oppress the people. I trust that the people of the United States will never be tempted or deluded with the idea that the Federal Government can or ought to meddle with State debts in any manner whatever. An assumption of the State debts by the Federal Government, either as principal or endorser, I should consider the harbinger of all the great evils so ably set forth by the Senator from Missouri.

But, sir, while I so cordially approve of the doctrines embraced in the Senator's resolutions, yet, as regards the argumentative form given to the resolutions, I entertain opinions and feelings which incline me to desire some modification of these resolutions, before the vote of the Senate shall be recorded on their passage. I am not prepared or disposed to controvert the correctness of the reasoning embraced in the resolutions. Nevertheless, I think the more appropriate action of the Senate would be an expression of opinion on the subject matter of the resolutions, which will be found in the first two, and omit passing upon the references and conclusions drawn from the subject matter. Therefore, sir, I shall move to lay these resolutions on the table for the present, in order to afford time for reflection on the subject.

In making this motion, said Mr. L. I will repeat my decided approval of the general views and principles of the Senator from Missouri, as embraced in both his resolutions and speech, and assure him of my hearty co-operation in all measures calculated to restrict the legislation of Congress to its proper constitutional sphere.

REMARKS OF MR. RHETT,
OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, December 17, 1839—On the New Jersey election, and in reply to Mr. WISE.

[The subjoined sketch of the remarks of Mr. RHETT, in reply to Mr. WISE, on the New Jersey case, on the 17th December, have been in our hands ever since that time, but hitherto withheld from publication until Mr. WISE's speech, to which they replied, should have had its place in our columns. Mr. WISE's regretted indisposition having prevented his yet finishing the revision of his speech, it is thought best no longer to withhold from our readers the following:]

[National Intelligencer of yesterday.

Mr. RHETT entered at large into a course of recrimination towards Mr. WISE, and in defence of his own course. He had, a few days ago, inquired of the Chair whether the ordinary parliamentary rules were of force in the House; and, upon being answered in the affirmative by the Chair, he referred to the rule, as applicable to this case, which prescribes that, when a question is lost, no question substantially the same can be submitted at the same session. Neither the rule nor its applicability to the present case had been denied by any one, excepting upon the ground that, when the previous resolution of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] had been lost, we were no House of Representatives, and, therefore, the determination of it was of no effect. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] had, indeed, quoted the case of Claiborne and Gholson, in which, at a subsequent session of Congress, the decision of a previous session had been overruled. This is very good parliamentary law, but it has no application to the case. The question is not whether Congress, at one session, can overrule the decision of a previous session, but the question is, can the judgment of the House, once pronounced, be overruled at the same session? If it can, then no question at all can be considered as settled in its course of business; and the same question can be made as often as the temper or caprice of individuals may suggest, to the total interruption of the whole business of the country.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] says that, not to vote for a resolution, if we deem its principle right, because it has been previously rejected, is totally indefensible on any moral principles—it will be countenancing or aiding wrong. Of course, every gentleman will act upon his own views of morality and justice. But, he would ask, was it immoral to observe parliamentary rules? and was it no wrong to others—to the thousands of claimants who are ready to petition this House—to the whole body of the people, whose Representatives we are, to be entertaining, again and again, to the exclusion of far weightier matter, a question already decided by the House? The propriety of refusing to aid any longer in the agitation of this subject will depend on the fact whether we were competent to decide the question when we did. Were we then the House of Representatives? If we were not, gentlemen are put into the strange absurdity of having agitated this subject for three weeks before a tribunal which had no authority to decide it—of having invoked its judgment again and again; and, in the act of invoking these judgments, terming it "the House of Representatives." Even in the resolution on which the question was at last decided, we were termed "the House of Representatives"—the whole body of the Opposition, with himself, voting for it. How is such a course reconcilable with the supposition that these gentlemen believed that we were not a House until a Speaker was elected, and the members were sworn in? They must have believed, in common with himself, that we were the House of Representatives; not competent, indeed, to pass laws, but as competent as we ever could be to determine who were our members, for the purposes of organization. In pursuance of such powers, the whole House—both parties—acted. One gentleman [Mr. NAYLOR] was admitted to take his seat; five others from New Jersey were refused their seats. It is an after-thought—that we were not the House of Representatives—arising in the minds of gentlemen, under new party aspects. Mr. RHETT said that, in the first instance, by the resolution he had proposed, which was adopted by the House, he had asserted that we were the House of Representatives, and should "hear and adjudicate" upon the claims to the contestants of seats upon this floor. In pursuance of this resolution, the House did "hear and adjudicate" upon the claims of the five New Jersey gentlemen claiming their seats by virtue of the Governor's commission. He voted for their taking their seats. If any wrong is done them, he had no agency in the deed; but now he would not sustain any further agitation on the subject. He would act upon the principle of the parliamentary rule. We were now organized. A Speaker capable of appointing committees, by which the whole subject could be investigated, was in the Chair. Why should not the whole matter be referred to the Committee of Privileges and Elections, which will, in a few days, be appointed, and the business of the country be allowed to go on? Indeed, this was the course implied in the very resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] on which they were refused their seats. The resolution is in the following words:

"Resolved, That the credentials of the following members, John B. Aycrigg, John P. B. Maxwell, William Halsted, Charles C. Stratton, and Thomas Jones Yorke, are sufficient to entitle them to take their seats in this House, leaving the question of contested election to be afterwards decided by the House."

Now here it is proposed to determine the present rights of these gentlemen, and that afterwards the question of contested election should be determined in the House.

Mr. R. said he voted for this resolution, under the faith that the present occupancy of the seats was to definitively settled, and, as to the rest, it was to be a matter "of contested election in the House." This is the plain meaning of the resolution. But what was the course of gentlemen? Why, so soon as we elect a Speaker, and are in the House organized, a question, not "of contested election," but of immediate membership, is raised, by proposing that the gentlemen from New Jersey who hold the Governor's commission should be sworn in as members of the House. This course is not only contrary to parliamentary rule, but is directly contrary to the faith of the resolution, by which their rights were determined. He would not follow wherever others choose to lead. He would stand to the resolution.

The gentleman from Massachusetts over the way, [Mr. BRIGGS,] continued Mr. RHETT, had charged him with inconsistency in expressing the opinion that, according to parliamentry rule, the question of the New Jersey seats being determined, although the same question could not be submitted again, yet the matter could, nevertheless, be referred to the Committee of Privileges and Elections. If the gentlemen had only recollected the resolution for which he voted, he would not have made this charge. By that resolution, although proposing to determine for the time that the gentlemen holding the commission from the Governor should take their seats, there was an express reservation that, as a "question of contested election," it should be considered in the House after it was organized. If there had been no such reservation, undoubtedly, accordingly to the parliamentary principle he had laid down, the matter, if then fully determined, could not have been referred in the House. There would then have been inconsistency in saying that it could be referred to the Committee of Privileges and Elections; but with the resolution before him, for which the gentleman voted, and which he ought to have known, the charge of inconsistency is without the least foundation.

ARMED OCCUPATION OF FLORIDA.

In Senate, Monday, January 13, 1840—In reply to the objections of Messrs. CRITTENDEN, PRESTON, and STRANGE.

Mr. BENTON, in reply to the various gentlemen who had spoken against the bill, and in conclusion of the debate, said that he would begin with removing some brush and rubbish which had been collected and piled up before him to obstruct the progress, and to impede the passage, of the bill. He alluded to the three large grants to the Duke of Alagon, the Count of Punonrostro, and Don Pedro de Vargas, which had been brought into the discussion by the Senators from the two Carolinas, who had spoken against the bill, [Messrs. PRESTON and STRANGE,] who had invoked the ghosts of these grants, and represented them as valid titles, now owned by American citizens, covering all the good land in the peninsula of Florida, who would turn our settlers out of possession after they had pacified the country, and bring the whole of them upon the Treasury of the United States for indemnity for their lost lands. All this was brush in the path, which Mr. B. would clear away before he proceeded to more serious work. All these grants, with their sinistrous consequences, were paraded before us to impede our march; but they are nothing but scarecrows—nothing but the skins of dead crows, stuffed and hung up to alarm the vision and shake the nerves of the living birds. These grants, sir, are all dead! Dead many times over. Dead by treaty—dead by national law—dead by inherent fraud—dead by impossible conditions—dead by transfer to parties incapable of holding them. These are pretty comprehensive and bold assertions; but not more comprehensive than the facts admit, nor bolder than the truth requires. The grants are dead in every form in which they can be viewed; in every aspect under which they can be contemplated. The 8th article of the treaty with Spain for the cession of the Floridas, contains, in the English translation, these words:

"All grants made since the said 24th of January, 1818, when the first proposal, on the part of his Catholic Majesty, for the cession of the Floridas, was made, are hereby declared, and agreed to be, null and void."

This is the English translation, as found in our version of the treaty. The Spanish text is still stronger, and runs in these words:

"Todas las concesiones posteriores al 24 de Enero, 1818, en que fueron hechas les primeras proposiciones de parte de Su Magestad Catolica para la cesion de las dos Floridas, convienen y declaran las dos altas partes contratantes que quedan anuladas y de ningun valor."

"Do remain annulled, and of no value." Such are the terms of the annulling clause in the treaty, and they are more than equivalent to our "null and void." But either are sufficient; and we now come to the application of this clause to the grants; and that application is made by an operation in the exact sciences, being nothing but an exhibition and comparison of figures—figures, not of rhetoric, but of arithmetic. The annulling clause vacates all grants made after the 24th of January, 1818. The dates of the grants in question are:

To the Duke of Alagon, February 6, 1818.

To the Count of Punonrostro, February 6, 1818.

To Don Pedro de Vargas, April 9, 1818.

Thus all three of the grants are posterior to the 24th of January, 1818; and, in the language of the Spanish text, remain annulled, and of no value.

This would be sufficient, but it is not all; the royal ratification of the treaty returns to the same point, specifies these identical grants as the ones intended to be annulled by the eighth article, and declares them to remain invalid in the hands of the grantees, or their assigns. This is an extract from the King's ratification:

"Desirous at the same time of avoiding any doubt or ambiguity concerning the meaning of the eighth article of the said treaty, in respect to the date which is pointed out in it as the period for the confirmation of the grants of lands in the Floridas, made by me, or by the competent authorities in my royal name, which point of date was fixed in the positive understanding of the three grants of land made in favor of the Duke of Alagon, the Count of Punonrostro, and Don Pedro de Vargas, being annulled by its tenor: I think proper to declare that the said three grants have remained, and do remain, entirely annulled and invalid; and that neither the three individuals mentioned, nor those who may have title or interest through them, can avail themselves of the said grants at any time, or in any manner; under which explicit declaration the said eighth article is to be understood as ratified."

Such is the ratification of the King, Ferdinand the Seventh; and precisely conformable to it is that of the Senate and President of the United States. The ratification of the Senate, and the proclamation of President Monroe, refer to the special ratification of his Spanish Majesty, and bottom their act upon his. Such is the treaty, and the ratifications of the treaty, under which these grants are to be set up in Florida, and to take some fifteen or twenty millions of acres of land Such are the grants which are to be enforced in courts of justice! the judges in which are sworn to support a Constitution which declares a treaty "to be the supreme law of the land."

Dead by treaty, these grants are also dead by national law, and for inherent fraud. On the 24th of January, 1818, the King of Spain proposed to cede the Floridas to the United States; and, in the months of February and April following, and before the cession is consummated, he cedes away the whole of the vacant land which the Floridas contain. Now, if not a word in the treaty had been said on the subject, the whole of the grants so made would have been void for fraud; and the King of Spain would have stood before the world as having committed a fraud—as selling with one hand what he was secretly giving away with the other. But the King committed no fraud. He signed the grants to some gentlemen of his household; but he revealed and annulled them. He did not leave it to the world, to the judiciary, to the municipal law, to declare his grants null and void. He did himself what honor and law required; and rebuked, at the same time, the insult offered to himself in the consideration pretexted to be given for the grants; for they all contained this false pretext: "It being the interest of the crown that the uncultivated lands should be given to great capitalists, in order that they may be peopled and cultivated, from which flow the advantages pointed out by all politicians." The crown had no longer any interest in peopling and cultivating the Floridas; and so the consideration suggested was false and fraudulent.

Doubley dead, the grants are dead again upon their conditions which were impossible, and, with us, unconstitutional. A part of those conditions were to people and cultivate the country, and to promote agriculture and commerce; and for that purpose to import negroes, and to import them free of duty: an importation which cannot be made under our Constitution. This is a clause in all the grants:

"And in order that the said Duke of Alagon may forthwith carry his plans into execution, in conformity with my beneficent desires in favor of the agriculture and commerce of the said territories, which require a population proportioned to the fertility of the soil and the defence and security of the coasts, he giving regular accounts of his proceedings; it being understood that the introduction of negroes, which the same cession comprehends, ought, so far as relates to the traffic in them, to be subject to the regulations prescribed in my royal cedula of the 19th December last,"—(which makes the importation of slaves free from tax.)

Here a part of the conditions are impossible for any grantees to perform; such as peopling, cultivating, and defending the country; and part are unconstitutional, and against laws and treaties, such as importing negroes: and the whole are false and fraudulent pretexts, because the cession of the country was depending, and was soon consummated.

Three times dead in the hands of the grantees, these grants have another death to undergo in the hands of the present claimants. They have all been transferred, and transferred to aliens. They were transferred, probably for little or no consideration, from Spanish subjects, in whose hands they were nullified, to American citizens, who would be incapable of receiving the transfer if they had remained in full force. All countries, except with a few special exceptions, have fundamental laws against the capacity of aliens to hold lands within their limits. Almost all nations have these laws: above all, Spain has them, and has inflexibly applied them to her American possessions. These possessions she has guarded from foreign intrusion with Cerberean vigilance; and a fundamental law of the Indies forbids the alienation of the soil, even by the King himself, to any but a Spanish subject and a Catholic. Even if valid then in the hands of the grantees, these grants would be invalid in the hands of their American claimants.

Such is the invalidity of the grants which are paraded here to prevent a bill of national importance from passing; such the scare-crows which are to frighten the Senate from an act of useful and almost indispensable legislation. But I am not done with these grants yet. Invalid as they are, they contain monstrosities which make them abhorrent to our judgment They were calculated to take all the vacant land of the two Floridas; to sweep every acre which had been left by former concessions; and to convey to the grantees not merely principalities of territory, but to include bays, creeks and inlets; the mouths of great navigable rivers; large extents of sea coast; and a vast number of islands both in the Atlantic and in the Gulf of Mexico. Such was the extravagance of these grants; and to justify this description of them, I will read their boundaries, and the rights which they proposed to convey.

The Duke of Alagon was to have:

"All the uncultivated land not ceded in East Florida, which lies between the rivers Saint Lucia and Sant John, as far as the mouths by which they empty themselves into the sea, and the coast of the Gulf of Florida, and the adjacent islands, with the mouth of the river Hijuelos, in the 26th degree of latitude; following the left bank up to its source, drawing a line from Lake Macaco, thence descending by the way of the river St. John, to the Lake Valdes; crossing by another line from the extreme north of the lake to the sources of the river Amariima, following the right bank as far as its mouth in the 28th or 25th degree of latitude, (por los viente y ocho, u viente y cineo de latitud,) and running along the sea coast, with all the adjacent islands, up to the mouth of the Hijuelos; in full property to him and his heirs; allowing them also to import negroes, for the labor and cultivation of the lands, free of duties."

The Count of Punonrostro was to have:

"All the waste lands not heretofore ceded in Florida, lying between the river Perdido, westward of the Gulf of Mexico, and the rivers Amaruja and Saint Johns, from Popa to the point where it empties into the ocean, for the eastern limit; and for the northern, the boundary line of the United States; and to the south, by the Gulf of Mexico, including the desert islands on the coast."

Don Pedro de Vargas was to have:

"From the mouth of the river Perdido, and its bay in the Gulf of Mexico, following the sea coast, to ascend by the bay of Buen Socorro and of Mobile, continuing by the river Mobile till it touches the line of the United States, and descending by that in a right line to the source of the river Perdido, and following the river Mobile in its lowest part, and the bay of that name, returns by the seacoast towards the west; comprehending all the creeks, entries, and islands adjacent which may belong to Spain at the present time, till it reaches on the west the line of the United States; then returning by their northern line, comprehending all the waste land which belongs, or may belong, to Spain, and are in dispute or reclamation with the United States, according to the tenor of the treaties; and also all the waste land, not ceded to any other individual, which is between the river Hijuelos, in East Florida, and the river Saint Lucia, drawing a line from the source of one river to the source of the other, and following by the coast of Mexico from the mouth of the river Hijuelos to the point of Tancha; and, doubling this by the coast of the Gulf of Florida, to the mouth of the river Saint Lucia, with the islands and keys adjacent."

Such are the extents of these grants—such their boundaries—such the comprehensive rights proposed to be conferred on the grantees. There is no occasion to look on a map to trace these boundaries. One grant joins another; and the three together cover every inch of ungranted land in the two Floridas! They were to take all—to take it clean, from the Mobile bay to the Atlantic ocean; from the Southern boundary of the United States to the Gulf of Mexico; from St. Mary's to Cape Sable; with all the adjacent islands of the gulf and the sea. It was an attempt to eviscerate the two Floridas—to disembowel them of every acre of vacant land they contained—on the eve of selling them for an immense price—for five millions of dollars, and all Texas besides—to the United States. Supposing the King of Spain to have concealed and upheld these grants, and it would have involved him in a fraud of the most scandalous character; but he did not so conceal and uphold them: he proclaimed and cancelled them; and in so doing, approved his good faith and saved JUSTICE the task of annulling them.

Annulled in Spain, no Spaniard daring to invoke or to avouch these fraudulent grants, they become the spoil of American speculators, who were incapable in law of receiving them, and who probably gave but a nominal price for them. Our countrymen are full of enterprise; and these large grants properly divided—made into a sort of Yazoo stock—and distributed to influential men in various parts, might become the means of worrying Congress into a compromise, and thus obtaining some millions of dollars, or millions of acres, for division among the shareholders. This is the form which the enterprise of some part of our citizens take. It is now twenty-two years since the grants were made and cancelled; it is almost a quarter of a century since they were killed and buried; a generation has grown up, to whom their history is a stranger; and now, for the first time, they make their appearance in Congress, forbid the National Legislature to touch them, affirm their validity, and threaten to ruin us at law if we grant them to our military colonists! Such is the manner in which these enterprising citizens, with their dead, rotten, and putrid grants, stand up before us to arrest our legislation! Sir, I proclaim that this bill for the armed occupation of Florida, is intended to take these identical lands; and I say, what every Senator knows to be true, that no member of Congress, claiming under these grants, can vote against this bill. Our rules forbid such a vote; and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. STRANGE] has acted worthily and justly, by stating his interest, and making known the relation in which he stands towards them. Far from being arrested by the opposition and the menaces of these claimants, that opposition and menace is a reason for proceeding with the bill—it is a reason for energy of action, both to rebuke and silence the claimants instanter, and to create adverse and meritorious claimants under the Government. I am for breaking down such vast fraudulent claims; I am for distributing the soil of the country in moderate proportions among its citizens; I am for the cultivator against the speculator—for the military colonist, against the avoucher of the Duke of Alagon, the Count of Punonrostro, and Don Pedro de Vargas; I am for the country, against these enterprising gentry; and, therefore, I shall push this bill with the more vigor since they oppose it.

Having cleared away this rubbish—having removed this brush out of his path—having shown that these Spanish grants were nothing but scarecrows, Mr. B. proceeded to answer the objections which Senators had made to the bill. And first, he wished to remark upon the term WAR, which was constantly used in this debate; and the use of which term seemed to carry along with it the idea of actual war—the idea of campaigns and battles between two powers; and from this idea flowed all their notions of the legislation, and Government action, appropriate to the occasion. Certainly there was no such thing as war in Florida. There were no battles or campaigns there. There had been none such for two years; none since the affairs of Okeechobee and Caloosahatchee in December and January, 1837 and 1838. These were the last of warlike operations in that country. Since then, the Indians, broken and dispersed—driven totally out of the field—have prowled about in small bands, committing murders and robberies by treachery and stealth; never facing our arms, and flying and hiding, so that it was impossible even to find them. This is the state of things in Florida; no war, nor any thing like it. Yet Senators use the term incessantly; to which I should have no objection if merely used as a term descriptive of an unsettled state: but they attach grand ideas to it; they attach the idea of campaigns and battles to it; and upon this erroneous idea are clamoring for 10,000 regulars, or 10,000 militia, to be sent to the seat of these imaginary hostilities; when the three to five thousand which are already there, have not been able to get a fight, a skirmish, or hardly a foot race, in two years. I object then to the term war, with the idea of war attached to it; I wish Senators to look at the scene as it is—the warlike operations actually finished since two years—and the country waiting for that species of settlement which all countries have received in a like condition; waiting for armed colonists, who will associate first in block-houses and stockade stations, for mutual support; and who will find their inducement for thus settling in receiving from the Government a home and a farm in a country which their arms have defended and their enterprise explored.

Senators talk of covering the whole country with troops; they blame the Administration for not so covering it. Do gentlemen make any calculation of the number of militia and regulars it would require to make this cover? Do they bring the exact sciences to bear upon this question, or do they content themselves with flying and floundering in the regions of fancy and imagination? Cover the whole country with troops! Why, sir, at the rate of one man to the square mile—and certainly that would be a thin cover—at the rate of one man to the square mile, it would require 45,000 soldiers to cover the country. This is what it would require; but to make sure of 45,000 men to stand on the ground, about four times that number would have to be authorized; for such are the casualties of the service, that one-third or one-fourth present for duty is more than any authorized establishment of troops has yet presented in Florida. Do Senators read the reports and returns; and especially do they look over the arrays and columns of figures which the tables present? If they do, they will see that the present legal establishment of regulars in Florida, of six regiments, was only half full; that 2,700 recruits were wanting to complete the regiments, of which only about 500 were in march to join their corps, and the rest to be obtained; that only about 2,000 were present, instead of the 5,000 which the establishment implied; and of those present, after deducting the sick, the arrested, the otherwise employed, only about one-half were present for duty. If Senators look at the tables, they will see these things; and that, at the last return from General Taylor, his force for duty, leaving out commissioned officers, was only about 1,200 men, namely, 95 sergeants, 97 corporals, and 894 privates. This is all that a legal establishment of 5,000 men presents for duty; and yet the gentlemen talk of covering the whole country with regulars and militia! They talk of it; but it is all talk. They will make no motion to that effect; and if we did, they would oppose us, and would have good reason for opposing us. Instead of covering the country with soldiers, we wish to cover it with inhabitants. We wish to induce the exiled inhabitants of five counties to return to their homes; we wish to induce 10,000 other settlers to go there; we wish these to station themselves all over the country, at least as far as they will go, for they are hardly enough; and to these we add the six regiments now there; the one thousand more which we ask for, if they can be obtained; and, with all these, we hope the country will be so occupied by our settlers, and so scoured by our troops, as to drive out the banditti, and prepare the whole Territory for general settlement on farms and plantations. This is our plan; and one great advantage of it is, that all the military will be disposable for active operations. They will be released from garrison duty. The settlers will occupy and defend the stations. At an average of 50 men to a station, 10,000 men will occupy 200 stations. They will defend all the stations; and leave all the soldiery, fit for duty, disposable for scouring the country and hunting the banditti. In this way they will powerfully aid the military operations; and they will aid it still more powerfully in another form; they will join in every pursuit of Indians that they can hear of. They will go out themselves to hunt the enemy; they will go out to hunt game and to search for good land; and in doing that they go out to fight the enemy; they will visit from station to station, and they will travel from their own station to the depots of provisions and ammunition, to obtain their supplies; and every such travel would be a military expedition, for they must carry their arms, look out for the enemy, and defend themselves if attacked. This is our plan, and how much more cheap and efficient, and how much better adapted to the genius of our inhabitants, and the republican character of our Government, than the levy of an immense army to bristle the country all over with the bayonets of a regular soldiery.

Senators have thought proper to speak for absent officers, and to array their opinions against this bill. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] has so quoted and arrayed the commanding officer in Florida; whether with or without his consent, I know not; but I should presume the latter, as it is not usual for officers in the field to oppose in the councils the measures of the Administration. The Senator says a large majority of the officers oppose this bill: he speaks for the great body of them, and say they condemn it. I regret extremely that he has thought proper to press the hearsay opinions of absent officers into this debate, and to array them against the measures of the Administration. I do not at all dispute the correctness of what he says; but it lays me under the necessity of making a statement which, otherwise, I should not have adverted to. I happen to know the opinions of the officers, generally, upon this subject; and to know that these opinions, with few exceptions, divide politically. A few years ago it was exultingly said on this floor by the then head of the Opposition party, that the army and navy were sound; inuendo, that they were opposed to the Administration. In the mass, and as a general proposition, this is so; the great majority are so opposed; and in questions of opinion divide against the Democracy. This is the case in relation to the measure in question. The Federal, or, if they like it better, the Whig officers, generally condemn it, because they expect nothing good from the people; the Democratic officers generally approve it, because their principles lead them to expect much good from the people; and, as the former are much the most numerous, so, much the larger number condemn a bill which is based upon the assumption of a good result from the injection of ten thousand citizens into Florida. I say the Democratic officers generally approve this measure. I could name them if I thought it becoming and proper to do so; but not having their authority for the step, I choose to forego the advantages which might result from quoting their names and opinions. But while I sacrifice to propriety in this self-denial, I am not left without opinions to be opposed to those which have been quoted. I happen to be in possession of opinions, coming from those most able to give good opinions, diametrically opposite to those quoted by the Senator from South Carolina; given under circumstances to make them authentic and responsible, and free for citation and comment here: I allude to the message of Governor Call, the letter of General Jesup, and the letters of the Surgeon General, Dr. Lawson, and General Hernandez, and the memorial of the Florida Legislature to Congress, all communicated to the Senate at its last session, printed by its order, and made a part of our legislative documents. All these are now open to our use; and I propose to quote some passages from them to show the opinions of these most competent judges, and to show their reasons for their opinions. I begin with Governor Call, and read from his message to the Territorial Legislature of Florida, in January, 1839. He says:

"Convinced by three years' experience in prosecuting the war against the Seminoles that they cannot be subdued by the plan of operations heretofore pursued, the Secretary of War has wisely resolved on a change of policy. The plan which he has judiciously recommended for the protection of the frontier settlers, by encouraging the return of those who have been driven from their homes, and organizing the whole force along our exposed borders into companies and battalions for the defence of the inhabitants, and the energy and activity with which he proposes to prosecute the war to a successful termination, is calculated to give strength to the frontier and confidence and security to the people of every part of the Territory. * * * * Connected with this plan of defence, is an important measure which has been recommended to Congress. It is proposed to grant a portion of the public land to those citizens who will obligate themselves to settle and improve them. * * * * My observations on the result of the measures heretofore pursued for the removal of the Indians, have brought me forcibly to the conclusion, that it cannot be done without a change of policy. The forest must be subdued before the enemy can be finally conquered. Every inch of ground taken from him must be firmly held by permanent settlers who will cultivate the soil and make the wilderness their home. Under this system, the savage would gradually retire before the approach of the civilized man. * * * * Under this encouragement to emigration, it is confidently believed that 10,000 permanent settlers might, in a few months, be located in the enemy's country, and in a short time the whole peninsula would be so completely occupied as to leave no lurking place for the enemy. The adoption of this plan, while it would most certainly bring this protracted and harassing war to a successful conclusion, would save millions of public treasure, and thousands of valuable lives. * * * Another important advantage would result from this policy: it would give us population, wealth, and influence, and would forever put to rest the question of your right of admission into the Federal Union!"

Such are the opinions of Governor Call, responsibly expressed to the Territorial Legislature of Florida. They bear the impress of too much sound sense and practical knowledge to require any comment from me. I proceed to the letters of the three gentlemen mentioned; and shall begin with that of the Surgeon General, Dr. Lawson, as being first in point of date, and referred to by those of General Jesup and General Hernandez, and as coming from a gentleman who served long in Florida, joining the exercise of the military to the medical profession, and with difficulty induced to quit the head of a partisan corps, and the care of the sick, at the farthest extremity of Florida, to take the office of Surgeon General of the army of the United States in this city. The doctor says, (addressing himself to me:)

"I have, like yourself, arrived at the conclusion that the war with the Seminole Indians can be terminated in a shorter time, and at less cost, by an armed occupation of the country, than by the continuance of a regular mode of warfare. Our armies have been for years engaged in hunting up, pursuing, and killing a few Indians in each campaign; and, judging from the success we have already had, it will take five or ten years longer to kill off those that still remain, and seem determined to remain in the country. The establishment of military colonies, on the other hand, will change the system of warfare. Instead of the white men fighting the Indians in their natural fortresses, the Indians will have to come out and attack the settlers within their lines of defence, and where the skill and intelligence of the civilized man will have its influence. We shall act on the defensive; and experience teaches us that we are better at repelling an invasion than in making a conquest. The Indians will certainly attack our settlements; and in each conflict, and in each succeeding year, will lose more than have fallen before our heavy columns marching through the country.

"This is the way that the Western country was won from the savages of that region. The pioneers to the West pitched their camps and built their block houses through the country, and then fought a little, and worked a little, until the Indians, finding that they could not dislodge the white man, pulled up stakes themselves, and retired beyond the Mississippi. And so will the Seminoles act; for they cannot abide in the same country with the white man. As soon as they have found that the white men have sat themselves down near their favorite haunts, and are determined to hold on to the country through summer and through winter, and forever, they will, after repeated unsuccessful attempts to destroy, or drive off the settlers, in submission to their destiny, surrender to the white man, and ask to be removed to the West.

"The proposed system of operations will have the advantage, too, of settling the country while the war progresses; and by the time that the Indians have retired from the country, it will be under cultivation, and in a state to admit at once of a great influx of population. Whereas, under the present order of things, the immediate theatre of action will be rendered still more desolate as the war continues; and the adjacent districts being also drained of their resources, the country will not be in a condition to receive a body of emigrants for twelve or eighteen months after the Indians have been cut off, or have been removed to their new home beyond the Mississippi."

I will next quote the opinions of General Hernandez, who is personally known to most of the Senate, who has commanded much and honorably in this war, who is a native of East Florida, and has served in Congress with great credit as a delegate from that Territory. In a letter to me he says:

"Respecting the armed occupation and settlement of that part of Florida now overrun by the Indians, as proposed by the bill which you were pleased to put into my hands, (with the accompanying letter from Dr. Lawson,) and upon which you do me the honor to ask my views, I beg leave to state that the plan is one, in my opinion, eminently calculated to accomplish the objects intended. But permit me to say that, before that law can be promulgated and carried into effect, it will be too late for the settlers to clear land for cultivation this year. I, therefore, respectfully beg leave to suggest that, at first, they should be located immediately contiguous to the present exposed frontier settlements within the Alachua country, near Fort King, and on either bank of the river St. Johns and south of St. Augustine, to New Smyrna, and thence gradually along the Atlantic coast to Cape Florida. There are a number of plantations with extensive clearings in Alachua county; on the banks of the St. Johns; at the head of the river Mataugas; at Tomoka, on the river Halifax; at New Smyrna, and also some few settlements on New river, and near Cape Florida; which, in consequence of this protracted war, remain unoccupied. It is believed their proprietors would not object to have them cultivated by the settlers, who might thereby secure provisions for the ensuing year. * * Flint or gourd seed corn can be planted in Florida as late as the middle of April; and that of Cuba, which is a heavier corn than either of the others, and of quicker growth, admits of being planted as late as the middle of June. Seed of the last description of corn could be imported and furnished to such of the settlers as might be late in commencing their planting operations. * * * * I would also respectfully suggest, that the allowance of sugar, coffee and soap be added to the rations proposed to be furnished; and that these be extended to the members of the family and laborers which each settler may bring with him. * * * * The objects of the bill would be much advanced if transportation was provided for the settlers—say from St. Marks to the several stations which may be established on the western side of the peninsula along the Gulf of Mexico; from the depot on Black creek to those posts established on the St. Johns and its tributaries; from the depot at St. Augustine to the posts which may be established to the head of the river Mataugas, and thence to Cape Sable. * * * * The importance, and, indeed, necessity of occupying the Atlantic board must be obvious to all. The Indians have ever been in the habit of resorting to it in the spring and autumn in search of wrecks, which are of frequent occurrence on that coast. The counter currents setting in from the Bahamas, and the contracted gorge of the Gulf, in calms, as well as in boisterous weather, baffle the skill of the best navigators. Our lighthouses are insufficient; and vessels are driven, or drift, on that shore, and the unfortunate mariner becomes the victim of savage revenge and cruelty. From these wrecks the Indians obtain supplies of those articles required to carry on the war. Besides this, they derive a principal source of livelihood from fishing in the lagoons and waters which run parallel with the coast. * * * * I also beg to be permitted to say that every effort has been made by the inhabitants who were driven from their homes to return and resume the cultivation of their fields: but the effort has invariably been attended with disastrous consequences and great sacrifice of life; which must inevitably continue to be the case until efficient protection is extended to them. * * * * The mere occupation of posts garrisoned by artillery or infantry, will not afford that protection. There were more murders committed last year, when, by the close of the previous campaign, the Indians had been reduced to about the one-fifth of their original number, than during the whole previous period of the war. * * I am also persuaded that unless the frontier is placed in a state of defence, and the Atlantic side of the coast is occupied, the scenes of last year will be re-enacted. * * * * * I cannot close this letter without observing that I can bear testimony to the willingness of the inhabitants to contribute all in their power in aid of any measure which may have for its object the close of this disastrous war, the continuation of which adds every day so much more to the serious calamities to which they have been innocently subjected."

So far for General Hernandez. I next quote from General Jesup, that officer selected for incessant vituperation here, and for disadvantageous comparison with others; when the fact is, that during his command he effected the removal of 2,200 of these Indians, which is three or four times more than the number of all the killed, wounded, taken, and removed Indians, by all the other Generals put together. General Jesup says:

"If the plan which you propose can be carried out, the Indians may be gradually destroyed, or forced to submit; and I know of no other measure likely to rid the country of them, unless, by following the example of the British Government in their war with the maroons (runaway negroes) of Jamaica, we employ the blood-hound. The only doubt I entertain as to the complete success of the plan, arises from the apprehension that, south of the 28th degree of north latitude, the quantity of good land is not sufficient to induce settlers to occupy it. North of that degree, the country is generally equal to the southern counties of Georgia and Alabama; but south of it, the good land is confined to a few detached spots along the coast, on both sides of the peninsula. * * * * I would advise that the planters and farmers be urged to return to the plantations which they have abandoned, and that the whole country north of Tampa Bay be settled as soon as possible. * * * * There should always be a sufficient force in the neighborhood of each settlement to serve as a rallying point to the settlers, and to unite with them for the purposes of protection or pursuit. * * * * * The coasts of Florida afford as valuable fisheries, in proportion to their extent, as the banks of Newfoundland; and although the country south of Tampa Bay affords but little inducement to the cultivator, yet a population sufficient to confine the Indians to the interior, might find, near the coast, abundant support, by combining fishing with cultivation. * * * * * * * I have read the letter of the Surgeon General Lawson, and agree with him generally in his views. As to the war which we have carried on in Florida, it differs not only from any war before waged by this country, but from any other of which we have an account in history, unless the maroon war in Jamaica be an exception. The object has been, and is now, not to beat and compel the enemy to make peace, but to catch them. No force employed against them, either in the former or present Seminole war, no matter by whom commanded, has ever been able to catch them; and my decided opinion is, if they ever be caught, it must be with their own consent; and that consent will hardly be given until they find the white man in their way. * * * * Let them be crowded by settlers, and that which has invariably occurred throughout the whole history of our settlements will occur again; they will not only consent to remove, but will desire it as the greatest benefit the nation can confer upon them."

Mr. B. said he would conclude this array of opinions with quoting from the memorial of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida, addressed to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, dated Feb. 8, 1839, and presented to this body on the 18th of the same month. The memorial says:

"The people of the Territory have hailed with the highest approbation the plan proposed by the honorable Secretary at War in his annual report, both for the defence of the frontier, and for the repulsion of the Indians. The confidently believe that, if carried into execution, both will be successful; that those who have been driven from their homes will be reinstated in their possession; that the hardy defenders of the frontiers, who have so long maintained their posts in the presence of the enemy, exposed to every peril, will be enabled to cultivate their fields in peace, and sleep without the apprehension of being awakened by the midnight yell of the savages. They are equally confident that by proper encouragement to emigration and settlement, every portion of the peninsula susceptible of cultivation will, in a very short time, be permanently located by enterprising emigrants, who will seek the enemy in his lurking places, and relieve the country from his presence. Your memorialists believe this the most efficient plan by which they can be relieved from the disastrous results of this sanguinary and protracted war. * * * * Your memorialists have read and attentively considered the bill which has been introduced into the Senate for the accomplishment of this desirable object; and while they admire the liberality of its provisions, and are gratefully impressed for the feelings by which it was dictated, they believe that, although it may ultimately effect the purpose designed, that this may be more certainly and expeditiously achieved by an amendment, which they beg leave most respectfully to suggest; (for a military organization and pay from the United States.) * * * * In anticipation of such a system, your memorialists are informed that thousands of the hardy mountaineers of Tennessee and Georgia, under enterprising leaders, are now organising, and ready to march at a moment's warning, to fix their destiny in the peninsula of Florida."

Such are the opinions, continued Mr. B. which I have to array against those which have been quoted against the bill. Compare them together, and see how they stand in point of number, of authenticity, of experience, and of official origin. On one side, the hearsay opinions of Gen. Taylor and some nameless officers; on the other, the opinions of the Governor and Legislative Council of Florida, and of the Generals Jesup and Hernandez, and the Surgeon General of the army of the United States. All these concur in the necessity of charging the mode of operations—of injecting armed settlers into the Territory—of inducing the exiled inhabitants to return—and in the policy of giving land to the settlers: in short, with some little diversity about details, they unanimously concur in relying upon this identical bill for the pacification of Florida; and they agree in predicting the continued inefficiency of our operations, and the continued ravages of the Indians, if the bill is not adopted: predictions which the twelve months which have elapsed have wofully verified!

I proceed now to answer some other objections to the bill, and particularly to the clause granting land to the settlers, and to which the objections made are both numerous, various, and inconsistent. It is called a donation, and treated by gentlemen as a gratuity; when, in fact, it is the inducement to carry men to Florida, and pay for remaining there, and defending the country. In the present state of things settlers will not go without inducement; they will not go to risk life, and encounter privations, without adequate inducement presented to them; and that inducement is an interest in the soil—a right to a part of the land which their courage defends, their enterprize explores, and their industry improves. It is then as pay, and not as a gratuity, that land is to be given them; and this is precisely in accordance with the policy of Mr. Jefferson on the acquisition of Louisiana. He then proposed that land should be given to the first thirty thousand settlers, able to bear arms, who should go to the country, and remain there. The fact of going and remaining was a rendition of military service, for which he would give land instead of money.

Senators object to the efficiency of the plan, upon the ground that the land in Florida is too worthless—too sterile and valueless—to induce any person to go to it. They say the plan will fail, and fail because there is no good land to be had—nothing but pine barrens, alligator swamps, palmetto jungles, and watery everglades. This is a great error, and will be met by the proof which shall explode it. I have taken care to have the authentic testimony of competent witnesses on this point; and here it is, in the same letters of Dr. Lawson, General Jesup, and General Hernandez, from which I have already quoted. These gentlemen were particularly desired to give their opinion of the value of the land which the settlers could obtain, and that under all the aspects of fertility of soil, salubrity of climate, variety and value of productions, and facility of subsisting both men and animals. They answered accordingly, and this is what they said.

Dr. Lawson says:

"There is an extensive range of country and of very good land between the cove of the Withlacoochee and Silver Spring branch, at the head of navigation on the Ocklawaha, and there are many good tracts between these two rivers, extending to the Indian settlement called Pilaklikaha, where there is another body of good land.

"This section of country is capable of supporting several thousand inhabitants; there is a plenty of game in it, and the rivers and lakes in the vicinity afford fish in abundance; and withul, it has the advantage of water communication by the Withlacoochee with the Gulf of Mexico, and through the Ocklawaha and the St. Johns river with the Atlantic. In addition to these considerations, there are several healthy points in the country, particularly in the vicinity of Fort King; and here a large settlement should be made, as it will be the barrier between the Indians and the white settlements, and constitute the base of operations.

"There are some good lands on Talakchopko, both near the head of the river where it is called Pease Creek, and on the lower banks near the head of Charlotte's harbor.

"There are three or four good tracts on or near the banks of the Coloosa-Hatchee, particularly in the vicinity of Fort Thompson, at the great crossing of the river. Fish and game abound, I believe, in this region. I am not so satisfied as to the healthfulness of this section of the country; but it should be occupied at all risks, as it is on the line of the nearest practicable route between the Gulf and the Atlantic side of the peninsula.

"A few good tracts can be gotten on shores, and on the islands within Marcus sound, near Cape Roman.

"There is a beautiful tract of land on Pavilion river, ten or twelve leagues southeast of Cape Roman, and some parcels of good land may be found on the banks of Shark river, and on the shores of Lake Manitou, ten leagues still farther east.

"At Cape Sable there is a beautiful spot for a military post and a depot for a colony, which should be established on a prairie, running east and by north from that cape along the coast towards Cape Florida. This prairie runs immediately on the sea shore for thirty-five miles, then turns a little north and to the interior of the country. From what I saw of the products of the land on the cape and the islands in the vicinity, I am induced to believe that the soil of this prairie will produce in great perfection grain and vegetables of every kind, with sugar cane, cotton, &c. &c. Through the prairie there are numerous clumps and groves of trees, which will afford both fuel and building timber for the settlers. The keys and sand-bars in front of the cape make an excellent harbor for steamboats and vessels drawing from six to ten feet water. The waters along this coast are full of turtle, and fish of every kind, and the prairie and woods around abound in game.

"The immediate site of Cape Sable is evidently healthy, as are almost all situations directly on the sea board; and I have no doubt that healthy positions can be gotten on the prairie, as the climate is delightful even in the summer season, from the prevalence of the sea breeze, or trade winds.

"There are also good tracts of land on New river, and a great body of it on Indian river, both on the Atlantic side of the peninsula; and near this last river, on St. Lucie's sound, another settlement should be made. This section of country, being within the influence of the sea atmosphere, should be healthy; fish abound in the rivers and sounds about, and game perhaps is plenty in the country."

General Hernandez says:

"I have read, with much interest, the letter of the Surgeon General, Dr. Lawson, and I was much pleased to find that he does not think the country as unhealthy as it has been represented. Coming from so disinterested a source, his statements cannot fail to to remove impressions not less erroneous than prejudicial to the country. His description of the country around Cape Sable will doubtless attract attention, and I hope many of our citizens, who are looking to Texas and other foreign climes, may see it, and be induced to seek in Florida a residence where they will find a soil and climate equal to the best, and a country just as easy of access.

"Here I beg leave to say, that the country east of the Suwanne river, is capable of sustaining an immense population, and must, in the political order of things, eventually form a State separate from that of Middle and West Florida, and greatly to their advantage and that of the country. In this part of Florida, exclusive of the extensive hammocks and very productive pine lands, there are great bodies of savanna, swamp, and meadow lands, composed of the richest soil, to wit: alluvial, clay, and marl, much of which, when properly reclaimed, will, south of St. Augustine, produce two crops of grain each year.

"On two hundred acres of reclaimed swamp lands, I made an average of thirty-six bushels of Cuba seed corn per acre, while at the same time, a crop of sugar cane was growing on the same two hundred acres, the manufacture of which was prevented by the war.

"This is the only portion of the United States possessing a tropical climate. The advantages which, I believe, will grow out of the adoption, by Congress, of this measure, for the occupation and settlement of it, will soon render us, in some degree, independent of the West Indies, except in the article of coffee, which, I think, cannot be there raised, owing to the blighting winds of autumn passing across the narrow peninsula. Sugar, Cuba tobacco, and all the other staples and fruits of those islands, I believe will be cultivated in great abundance in Florida. These articles, together with the orange of the country, which is more highly valued than that of other places, with the aid of steamboats and railroads, can be sent to the Northern and Western States in full perfection.

"That Florida is also destined to be a great silk producing country is placed beyond a doubt."

General Jesup says:

"Between the mouth of the Withlacoochee and Tampa Bay, there is a considerable body of excellent land; there is also good land near Tohap Kilaga, and between the Ocklawaha and St. Johns rivers. I have no doubt healthy situations for stations or residences might be found; and, as to the country north of the Withlacoochee, it is quite as healthy as the greater portion of the Western and Southwestern States; and the whole seaboard is as healthy as any part of our Atlantic seaboard south of the Delaware. I would advise that the planters and farmers be urged to return to the plantations and farms which they have abandoned, and that the whole country north of Tampa Bay be settled as soon as possible. The coasts of Florida afford as valuable fisheries, in proportion to their extent, as the banks of Newfoundland; and though the country south of the Tampa Bay affords but little inducement to the cultivator, a population sufficient to confine the Indians to the interior might find near the coast abundant support by combining fishing with cultivation. A fresh supply of water could be obtained from the adjacent islands.

"There is a small body of good land on New river, also on the Miami river, near Cape Florida, which was occupied previous to the war. Two or three hundred inhabitants might support themselves comfortably on that portion of the Territory. No part of the United States is more healthy. A light-house is necessary in that neighborhood; and so valuable is the commerce that passes that part of the coast, and so numerous the wrecks in consequence of the difficulty of the navigation, that, to protect the crews and property cast on shore, the country should be settled, and military posts be established on New river, and near Cape Florida.

"There is a body of excellent land near Cape Sable, the most southerly point of the peninsula, which would support several hundred inhabitants. This it would be highly advantageous to occupy as soon as possible. A military post should be established and maintained at the Cape. Posts will be necessary at Indian river inlet, at the head of Indian river, at New Smyrna, and at one or two other points between the latter post and St. Augustine. A post should be established at Punta Rasa, south of Tampa, and at one or two points between Tampa and the mouth of the Suwannee; those points of course to be determined by the settlements that may be made on or near the coast."

This is the character of the country; this the character given of it by gentlemen who speak from their own knowledge, and whose honor and intelligence places their statements above suspicion. They show this decried Florida to be a fine country; almost an island, as the word peninsula imports, (pæne insula;) and partaking, especially towards its southern extremity, of the calcareous and rocky formation and salubrity of climate which belong to the Bahama islands, of which it is almost a part.

Such is the inducement which the country presents to enterprising settlers. It presents the opportunity of obtaining, without the payment of money, and as a reward for services, three hundred and twenty acres of good land, in a soft climate, open to the sea breezes, healthy, and capable of producing the most valuable tropical productions. Extending five degrees further South than New Orleans, this peninsular will far surpass the coasts of the lower Mississippi in its capacity to produce sugar, cotton, oranges, and other valuable products; and it is here that, without the outlay of a shilling, an industrious man—any youth, in fact, of seventeen or eighteen years old, able to bear arms—may go and choose his own home, and become a holder of rich land in a climate and soil adapted to the richest productions. This should be inducement enough to carry the 10,000 settlers to Florida, and that in emulous contest with each other to arrive first, for each one is to choose his land in the order of his arrival, first comers having first choices. In this the bill conforms to the wise and just principles of the pre-emption laws.

But a reward in land, valuable as that is, is not the only inducement which the bill holds out: it presents other, and large inducements to the enterprizing settlers. In the first place, they are to receive rations for one year, by the end of which time they will have raised provisions for themselves, and the country will be almost, if not entirely, quieted. The ration which they receive furnishes the elements of abundant, comfortable, and wholesome subsistence; with the game, fish, turtles, and oysters, and spontaneous vegetables of the country, the ration will be enough for two or three persons. Its component parts are: three-fourths of a pound of pork or bacon, or one and one-fourth pounds of fresh or salt beef; eighteen ounces of bread or flour, or twelve ounces of hard bread, or one and one-fourth pounds of corn meal; and, at the rate of four pounds of soap, one and a half pounds of candles, two quarts of salt, four quarts of vinegar, eight quarts of peas or beans, or, in lieu thereof, ten pounds of rice, six pounds of coffee and twelve pounds of sugar to every hundred rations. In the next place, the settlers are to have an allowance for clothing for one year, payable half yearly in money; the clothing being rated at thirty dollars fifty cents per annum. Then they are to have arms and ammunition, which cannot be less than thirty dollars more. Then they are to have medicines, and medical attendance in the military hospitals when sick. In addition to all this, they are to have transportation to their stations; the use of the public ground to cultivate for their own benefit, and seed grains for the first year. The United States troops are to aid in putting up the block houses and stockades—to give a special protection to the settlers while engaged in these erections—and to extend to them a general protection afterwards. These are the inducements over and above the three hundred and twenty acres of choice land; and the whole together certainly present the happiest opportunity for enterprizing men to improve their condition, and to advance to comparative wealth, without the outlay of a shilling, which this country, or any country, now presents to the acceptance of its inhabitants.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] further objects to the grants of land to the settlers, upon the ground that they will waste and squander it—will sell their claims for a trifle—and will derive no benefit from them; and he instances the case of the soldiers of the late war who sold their claims for twenty or thirty dollars each. Granted that such was the fate of the soldiers' bounty land, and granted that such would be its fate again, under a similar grant to regular soldiers; and yet nothing could be more absurd than to infer the same of these settlers. In the first place, the Florida settlers are to be—not soldiers, but cultivators; the land they are to receive is not a bounty for enlistment, but the pay which they are to receive at the end of their service. It is the object for which they labor; it is reward which is to compensate them for their toil and risk. They go to the country to get the land. They stay there until they get it. They choose it themselves; and when they choose it, they are to live upon it. How different was the case of the soldiers from all this. They had no choice of their land; it was distributed to them by lot; and tens of thousands of the grants were not worth a cent; the soldiers were at an immense distance from the land—at a thousand miles or more from it—they knew nothing about it—in many instances were not able to get to it; they were beset by temptations and discouragements, and gave up for a trifle what they knew nothing about. A most defective law permitted evasions; and the sales, though nominally declared void before the patent issued, were easily made to assume a valid form. All this is different in this bill. These settlers will not be, like disbanded soldiers, scattered through the towns and cities, a prey to speculators; but they will be at their stations in Florida—in their blockhouses among the Indians—where no speculator will ever come. Instead of a lottery drawn by a boy to distribute unknown lands among unknown men, every settler, if alive, must make his own choice, and, if dead, his heir at law, and not a purchaser; must make it for him. The entry cannot be made by a purchaser, assignee, attorney, or any body whatever, but the settler, if alive; and, if dead, by his heir at law. After the entry is made, there can be no alienation of the land, even by judicial sale, until twelve months after a patent issues; and if attempted to be alienated, a ready, perfect, cheap, easy, and certain method is provided for invalidating such alienations. In this respect, the bill before the Senate differs from all that have preceded it, so that there is not the least danger that these settlers will squander their lands. They are not soldiers, but tillers of the earth; they are cultivators, and therefore will hold on to their share of the earth. They do not take their land by lot, but by choice; and therefore they know what they get. They are not a thousand miles off, but at the spot, and ready to enter on their rights. They must make the entry, or the land cannot be had. They cannot alienate for a year after the patent issues, when they will know the full value of their property. For all these reasons, the objection of the Senator from South Carolina can have no application to these settlers, however just it might be in relation to regular soldiers.

Mr. B. then read the sections of the bill which related to the grant of land to the settlers, to corroborate the statements which he had made; and called upon the Senate to mark the effectual manner in which they secured his rights.

The following were the sections read:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That at the return of peace and removal of the Indians, each settler who shall have complied with these conditions, or his widow and heirs at law in the event of his death, shall be entitled to a bounty of three hundred and twenty acres of land, to be selected from any of the public lands in the district in which he settled, in the peninsula of Florida, or east of the Suwannee river, or adjacent keys and islands; the said selection to be made by the settler according to priority of settlement, so that first settlers shall have first choices; but when two or more settlers in the same district shall have settled on the same day, priority of choice between them shall be decided by lot."

"SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That as soon as the surveys can be safely commenced, all the public lands east of the Suwannee, and also in the peninsula of Florida, and in the neighboring keys and islands, fit for cultivation, shall be surveyed; and land offices shall be opened for receiving, in addition to their other duties, the entries of the settlers who can prove a compliance with the conditions mentioned in this act; and to aid such proofs, copies of the book containing the names of the settlers shall be deposited in such offices.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That one land office shall be opened in the district of country north of the latitude of the mouth of the Withlacoochee; another in the district south of that line, and north of a line drawn across the peninsula from the southern extremity of Tampa Bay; and a third in the district south of that line, and including the remainder of the peninsula; and the settlers within these respective districts shall each be confined to his own district, in selecting and entering his bounty land.

"SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the bounty lands hereby granted shall be free of taxes, and unalienable, even by judicial sale, until the patent issues, and also for one year thereafter; the said patent shall issue to the original settler, if alive, and if dead, it shall then issue to his heirs at law, and widow, if he has left a widow, to be held and divided by them according to the laws of Florida; and every alienation of any such bounty land, even by judicial process, made before the issuance of the patent, or within one year thereafter, shall be null and void; and the intrusive possessor, by virtue of any pretended sale, lease, devise, gift, or transfer, contrary to this act, may be turned out of possession at any time by an action of ejectment in the name of the original settler, or of his widow and heirs at law, or any one or more of them, or in the name of any subsequent purchaser, after the said land becomes legally alienable; and full damages shall be recovered in the same suit against the intrusive possessor as a trespasser and disseizor."

Having read these sections of the bill, Mr. B. appealed to the Senate to say if the objection of the Senator from South Carolina was not entirely inapplicable. The case was wholly different from that of the soldiers of the regular army. What happened to these soldiers cannot happen to the settlers under the bill. They would not sell their lands for a trifle if they could, and they could not if they would. The widow and the heirs at law, or the settler himself, or any subsequent purchaser, after the land was alienable, can easily set aside the sale, and that without limitation of time, and recover in the same suit all the intermediate rents and profits. If the soldiers' bounty lands of the late war had been placed under the same guards, and they had been required to go and make their own selections and their own entries, they would never have been squandered away for a few dollars in hand.

Objections are taken to the character of such settlers as may go; it is said that the climate and soil require large slaveholders; and that, on the contrary, none but the poor and indolent will settle under this bill. I dissent from these opinions, both as to the character of the settlers which the country requires, and the character of those which may actually go. I look at that peninsula under a military aspect—as the salient angle of the South—as the exposed point of that quarter of the Union—as the pointe d'appui of an enemy in time of war—as the tongue of land which runs far down towards the British West Indies, and constituting a bridge for the ingress of the black regiments which a cruel policy, in time of war, may direct against the Southern States. Looking at the peninsula under that aspect, and I consider large slaveholders as the most inappropriate population which could be placed there. Such a population would contribute nothing towards the defence of that salient point. By their large landed possessions they would prevent a dense population of white men; by their numerous slaves they would tempt aggression, instead of repelling it; and in case of actual invasion, would find in flight the only means of saving themselves and their slaves. And thus it is at present. The five depopulated counties of Florida were the seat of large sugar and cotton plantations; large slaveholders were settled in them. They fled before the Indians. They had to fly, and are still exiles from their homes, waiting for others to clear the country of the Indians before they can return to it. And so it will be again, and worse, with the same description of settlers who may go further down into the peninsula. No, sir, no. It is not the large slaveholder, but the small landholder—the yeoman—the three hundred acre man, that is wanted in that peninsula. We want there the man of muscle, nerve, and of labor—the cultivator, with the weapons of war in one hand, and the implements of husbandry in the other: we want such as the thirty thousand whom Mr. Jefferson proposed for Louisiana when it was first acquired.

The bill is calculated to carry such men there; and, to say nothing of more remote States, the Southern States themselves contain the kind of population which the occasion requires. It is a mistake to suppose that the Southern States contain nothing but large slaveholders: they contain many who own few, or no slaves—who labor with their own hands, and who have the muscle and bone—the sinew and the nerve—which a life of labor so largely contributes to strengthen and develope. Besides other parts of the Southern States, the whole South, from the Potomac to Georgia—from Georgia to Louisiana—contains a broad belt of land sprinkled over with a population of this kind. I speak of the pine lands which lie below the strip of red land which skirts the eastern base of the Blue Ridge and the foot of the Appalachi mountains. It is a broad belt, and more than a thousand miles in length, counting from the Potomac to the Mississippi; and very convenient to the proposed point of occupation in Florida. Throughout this extensive region is scattered a peculiar population; poor and laborious; owners of cattle and stock, with few or no slaves; healthy and active; cultivating an ungrateful soil of sand and gravel; and, for want of good land, finding it impossible to advance themselves in the path of wealth and honors. A bare subsistence, from generation to generation, is the scanty reward of a life of toil, of temperance, of economy, and of frugality. Few who remain where they were born, are able to emerge from the humble condition which a "pine woods" habitation, in the Southern latitudes, announces and imposes. As emigrants, and possessors of fertile land, a spirit of enterprise developes itself in these hardy and frugal men when they change their clime; and they are the kind of people whom this bill will invite into Florida, and which the public interest requires to be there. They will occupy small farms; they will work themselves; they will keep arms, and will use them. To every one his house will be his castle; and the defence of the whole peninsula will be the business and the object of all. Sir, I look upon this bill as having a peculiar recommendation in the precise fact that it is to people that exposed angle of Florida, with small landholders instead of large slaveholders.

Another objection to these settlers is the supposition that they are to do nothing; that they are to render no service to the country in return for the benefits which they receive. This is an error—an error of fact—which an inspection of the bill will expose. The settlers are required to render service, and great service to the country; and cannot have the benefits to be conferred unless the services are rendered, and proved to be rendered. 1. They are required to be able to bear arms, and actually to bear them. 2. They are to live in stations, not more than 100 nor less than 40 in a station. 3. They are to defend these stations when attacked. 4. They are to remain at their stations until the Indians are pacified, or removed. 5. They are to assist in putting up the blockhouses and stockades. 6. They are to cultivate the ground. 7. They are expected, by the provisions of the bill, to make pursuit and search after Indians. 8. They occupy posts, and they leave the regulars free to scour the country. 9. They will engage in such pursuit and search; for they will go forth to hunt, to fish, to visit other stations; to draw rations and ammunition at the military depots; and, above all, they will search every acre of land in the country in search of good land for their locations; and every going forth of this kind will be a military expedition, prepared to meet the Indians, and to fight them. And fight them they will. Prevented from fighting, they cannot be. The American of the United States is among the bravest of the brave; he is among the bravest of the race of man. Courage—that courage which toes the mark to conquer, or to die—is his: and this, not the prerogative of the few, but the characteristic of the mass. No mass of our Americans—no matter how collected together—no matter how included by a diagram—no mass of them can be found which, as a body, is not brave, and among the bravest of the brave. This is a fact which their history attests; and which philosophy accounts for from their descent, their residence in a new country, the freedom of their institutions, the abundant means of good living, the boundless fields of their enterprise, and the consequent energy of mind and body, and fire of spirit, which all these circumstances beget and engender. No, sir. Let all dismiss their fears. The men who may go to Florida under this bill, will be like the rest of their countrymen: they will be as brave as Cæsar, and as generous as brave. They will fight the armed enemy: when they have disarmed him, they will spare him: when they have taken women and children, they will give them food, raiment, and shelter. Thus it is now in Florida. Our soldiers spare the helpless, and bring in the little papooses on their backs, and give them "goodies."

Inefficiency of the bill is the main and the incessant objection of its opponents. They object to the efficiency of this measure without offering another in its place. They declaim against its efficiency, taking care all the while to speak as if the Administration intended nothing else for Florida but the settlers of this bill. Surely Senators forget that there are six regiments of regulars in that Territory at this time, implying a force of above five thousand men; that besides these, a part of the naval service is constantly employed on the coasts of Florida; and that, so far from intending to diminish that force, the Secretary at War, in his official report, expressly asks for an additional temporary and local force, confined to Florida, and limited to the war. Thus the settlers are only a part of the plan for the pacification of Florida. It is a part only, though attacked as the whole; and, since the Indians are driven from the field, it becomes that important part which is to retain possession of what the military conquers; and, by remaining in stations, free the regulars from garrison duty, and leave the whole of them disposable for active duty.

No, Mr. President, it is not because of their inefficiency, but for their efficiency, that these settlers are so much opposed. They will be too efficient! They will drive off the speculators as well as the Indians. They will receive and retain the lands which the Alagon, the Punonrostro and the Vargas birds now flap their wings over, and expect to settle down upon as soon as the Indians are driven away. These birds wish us to employ soldiers, not citizens. They wish us to send ten thousand soldiers, not ten thousand settlers; and the reason is, that they want the lands themselves. Give as much money as you please, but no land. This is the plan of the speculators and the large slaveholders. They want all the good land themselves, but do not want to fight for it; and this is an additional reason with me for pursuing the plan of this bill, and placing meritorious cultivators upon the soil to defend it both from Indians and speculators. The plan is efficient, cheap, humane, and framed on a principle to insure success, and to cost nothing if it does not succeed. It is efficient, because the ten thousand men will go. It is cheap, for the men are to be paid out of the land which they conquer, and will take but four millions out of twenty-six millions which they will conquer. It will insure its own success, for the settlers are to get no land until the country is pacified. It is to cost nothing if it does not succeed; for, unless the men go, they get no rations; unless they remain until the country is pacified, they get no land. It is the most humane, for it relies upon the plough and the axe to come in aid of the sword and the gun. It is a good plan, and only asks for a fair trial, accomplishing every thing if it succeeds, and costing nothing if it does not.

It is a good plan; I may call it a master plan; for I am going to celebrate it in the point which the sound practical sense of the Surgeon General, Dr. Lawson, illustrated in his letter which has been read. It is a plan which REVERSES the position of the parties in Florida—which makes US the possessors of the country, and leaves it to THEM to expel US. This alone changes the character of the contest—puts that labor upon their shoulders which is now upon ours—and gives them a work to do which they can never perform. This alone is a grand and striking recommendation of the bill—one which no military eye can overlook—which no military mind can undervalue.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN]

says it will take a whole year to build these blockhouses. That is a declaration which astonishes me, coming from a Western man. It would hardly be expected from a city gentleman, who never saw a blockhouse. He and I, as Western men, as coming from States where these blockhouses were the refuge of every family, in their early settlement; he and I should know better. We ought to recollect that a few neighbors would meet together, and build it in a day—build it from the stump; cut the logs, haul them, put them up: and the next day cover it in, and close it up. A blockhouse is nothing but a green log house, of two stories; the second story projecting a couple of feet over the first, and resting on a floor of split logs; the loopholes for firing being in the upper story, both in the sides, and in the floor, and in the projections. A dozen men will put up such a house in a day, and cover it in the next day; and four or five men, with six or eight rifles, or muskets with buckshot cartridges, and one good woman to load for them, would defend the house against all the Indians in America. This is the history of such buildings! A year to build blockhouses, indeed! Why, sir, a young cadet from West Point, brim full of science and book learning, could not discover the means of spending a week upon such a job; while an old frontier officer, like Col. Twiggs, would undertake to put you up a house a day, if the occasion required it, for every twelve men that he could employ on the work.

Besides objections to the bill, we have attacks upon one of the officers lately employed in the conduct of the Florida war. General Jesup is still the selected object of attack, and of disadvantageous comparison. Not content with extolling to the skies the officers of his own political complexion, the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] in order to enhance their praise, must incontinently draw contrasts, and sink some one as much below their level as he had raised his Federal or Whig heroes, above theirs. Now, sir, to all this praise bestowed upon the officers of his own political complexion, I have no manner of objection. He may make demigods of the whole of them; but I object to his making demons of Democratic officers. I object to his instituting disadvantageous comparisons; and giving the disadvantage in the comparison to him who has the advantage in merits. This is what has been done with respect to General Jesup. He is put below all others, when he has done more than all the others put together. In the year and a half which he commanded in Florida, he removed 2,200 of these Indians from that peninsula to the west of the Mississippi; all the rest of the generals put together, in the three years and a half in which they had the command, counting all their successes in killed, wounded, taken and removed, did not get rid of the one-third part of that number. He removed 2,200 of the hostile Florida Indians in a year and a half, and that is three times as much as all the other commanders together have done in three years and a half. Besides that, he removed 26,000 Creeks, in the summer of 1836, in six weeks, and at an expense which is but a fraction of what the removal of other Indians have cost. This is the historical truth due to General Jesup, assailed, and unjustly assailed, as he is here. He is the only commanding general who brings a scar from Florida; he has done three times as much, in half the time, as all the rest put together have done in that Territory. Yet he is the only one selected for attack: he is the only one assailed and disparaged by unjust comparison. Is it the complexion of his politics—is it his friendship for General Jackson, and some others of the Democracy, which brings these assaults upon him? If they are, it may be that a repetition of the assault may bring forth the details which will vindicate his title to the pre-eminence which I have assigned him. Sir, this is a business which I dislike. I heartily dislike the business of invidious comparison. Our officers, military and naval, without regard to politics, fight and die for their country. They do their best; and I wish to sustain all who do their best for their country. I wish to give support and applause to every one who stakes his life for this sacred mother of us all, whether fortune is more or less kind to him in giving him the opportunities which gild his banners with success. This is my disposition with respect to all; and I do hope and trust that no more disadvantageous comparisons shall be instituted here to call forth my vindication of the injured, and, by implication, to lower the exalted.

I have now gone over, and fully answered, the ostensible and public objections to this bill; but I should illy discharge my duty if I did not also advert to the real and occult objections to it. These are, first, that it will make a slave State; secondly, that it will make a Democratic State; thirdly, that it will take land which the Spanish grants to the Duke of Alagon, the Count of Punonrostro, and Don Pedro de Vargas, call for. These are the real objections; and it becomes me to say a few words in regard to each. And first of the slave State objection. I hold in my hand, Mr. President, a little book (showing it) entitled the Anti-Slavery Almanac, for 1840. It is covered all over, and find filled all up, with pictures, such as white people of the South branding slaves—hunting slaves with dogs and guns—cat-hauling slaves—shooting slaves—old Kentuck setting his dogs on slaves—lawless burning of slaves in St. Louis—chopping up living slaves with an axe, and throwing the chopped off parts into the fire; with many others of the same character, and all accompanied by figured representations and detailed explanations of the scenes they represent. At page 45, of this little book, commences a chapter headed, in large capitals, with these words:

"Will you make Florida a slave State?"

In this chapter there is a paragraph dedicated to the particular bill which is now under consideration by the Senate, and of which I will read a part:

"After this war had been carried on (the Florida war) by a succession of the foulest crimes, from from January 27, 1835, till the beginning of 1839, the United States Senate passed a bill for the armed occupation of Florida; which, in the language of a Senator (of the Opposition) was to establish a corps of citizen soldiers, grant them four millions of acres of land, and give them liberty to kill when, where, and how, and whom they pleased, without any earthly responsibility. Allen, of Ohio; Buchanan, of Pennsylvania; Hubbard and Pierce, of New Hampshire; Lyon and Norvell, of Michigan; Niles and Smith, of Connecticut; Robinson and Young, of Illinois; Wall, of New Jersey; and Wright, of New York, voted for the murderous bill."

This is what I find in the Antislavery almanac; and the whole Abolition press sings to the same tune. From the first day that the armed occupation bill was introduced, the black and fell spirit of Abolition pounced upon it. That spirit has been at work ever since to defeat it; and since Abolitionism has become strong enough to dictate a nomination to the two highest offices in the Republic, let no one despise its influence in the halls of legislation. It is strong here; it is strong abroad. It works incessantly to obstruct Southern measures, and to pull down Southern men and their friends. See its labors against this bill, because it will cause Florida to be settled; see its denunciation of the Democratic members of Congress from the non-slaveholding States which support it. From A to Z—from ALLEN, of Ohio, to YOUNG, of Illinois—all, all, are denounced, pursued, persecuted, and marked out for the assaults of fanaticism. Abolitionism is at the bottom of the opposition to this bill; but it has two strong allies, namely, Spanish grant speculators, and anti-Democratic politicians; and to these I proceed.

Another of the real objections to this bill, and which I have often heard stated, though it is not yet embodied in an almanac, is, that it will make Florida a DEMOCRATIC STATE. These three hundred acre men, it is said, will all be Democrats; their little freeholds will make them Democratic; they will support the Democratic cause, and make another Democratic State in the South. This is wormwood and gall to the Federal party, now called Whigs. They cannot stand it. Another Democratic State in the South! perhaps two more there to come in, with two Democratic States in the Northwest! it is intolerable and terrible. It is worse than gall and wormwood; it is hemlock itself; it kills poor Whigery, kills it dead; and unless these Democratic States can be stifled in embryo, all is lost, and the ghost of Federalism must flit from the stage. Here, then, is the root of a violent opposition to the settling of Florida with small landholders, instead of large slaveholders.

The last of the real objections which I shall mention is, that it will spoil the game of the Spanish grant speculators. These gentry are now in great force, owing to the vast extent of the grants under which they claim, and the broad basis which they have given to their interest by the wide diffusion of shares in the claims. They constitute an active, subtle, and powerful corps in opposition to this bill. They wish the country conquered. They are willing to have armies raised, and millions upon millions of money lavished on the conquest. But no land! oh, no! They want all the land themselves! Pay in any thing but land. Above all, do not send these ten thousand settlers there, with their pre emptive privileges, to pick and choose for themselves, and to take up all the best tracts in satisfaction of their own rights. These speculators, and for this reason, are among the most formidable objectors to the bill.

I have now finished the examination of all the objections, ostensible and real, which are made to this bill; and persuade myself that the propriety of passing it is only made more apparent by the arguments adduced against it. I have done with my replies to the remarks of the Senators who oppose it; and a few observations will close what I have to say. In one thing, I concur with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] namely, in the opinion that Florida has been too much neglected. I concur in the justice of the remark, but not in the sense in which he intends it. He intends it for the Administration; I intend it for Congress. I intend it to apply to our neglect—I say ours, for I mean to take a full share of the blame to myself—in neglecting the supervision of the Florida legislation! in not even reading the acts of the Legislative Council, which it was our duty to supervise before they became laws! The Territory is buried under corporations, and under debts, which the organic law referred to our inspection, and of which we knew nothing until the acts were consummated. The debts are void; for a Territory is not a State, and has no power but that which is granted to it by Congress; and Congress has not granted to its police government in Florida the privilege of contracting five millions, or any number of millions, of debt. The corporations, from what I have seen of their absurd and monstrous privileges, are either void or voidable. Congress has neglected its duty in suffering these debts, and these corporations, to be created in the first instance, and to remain so long unarraigned at our bar. Add to these the neglect of our domain, pounced upon, wherever the Indians permit, by the assignees of the three great fraudulent and nullified Spanish grants. In all these things, Congress has neglected Florida; but neglect is now to cease, and the affairs of this Territory—the civil as well as the military—are to receive their due attention. The President, in his noble message, has called our attention to the civil abuses there, especially to the power "assumed" by the Territorial Legislature to authorize the issue of bonds by corporate companies on the guarantee of the Territory. Under this call we cannot sleep; and henceforth the bonds, the corporations, and the Spanish grant speculators, must receive our attention as well as the Seminole Indians.

Mr. President, this is a large measure—this armed occupation bill—and both national and Southern. It is a large national measure, and one of constitutional obligation upon us to adopt. We have made our campaigns, and fought our battles in Florida. The military have done their part. For two years they have had the field clear of the enemy; for two years the enemy have been broken up, dispersed about, and driven into lurking holes and hiding places. For two years the country has been ripe for armed settlement—for settlement in stations—for military colonists; such as the Romans planted in the conquered countries after the legions had destroyed the armies, and captured the fortresses which defended them; and which colonists were rewarded with grants of land in the country which they occupied and held in subjection. This bill is on the same plan; and goes to accomplishing the great national object of terminating an expensive contest, pacifying a distracted territory, restoring exiles to their homes, and extending the ægis of the national protection to an integral part of the Union.

Every interest, national and Southern, civil, military, commercial and agricultural, requires the passage of this bill. Commerce requires the settlement of this peninsula. The wrecks of vessels, and the massacre of crews, loudly demand the re-establishment of our light houses in that quarter, the extension of law and government to it, and the peopling of it with an orderly, industrious, and law-abiding population.

The national defence requires its settlement. There is no plan of defence for the Southern frontier—no plan of naval defence for the Gulf of Mexico—which can omit the settlement, fortification, and strong occupation of this tongue of land which runs down almost to our naval station at Key West, and to the British possessions in the Bahamas. It is a strip of land—a long bridge—which must be the avenue of entrance to the enemy—to the black regiments of their cruel policy—unless occupied, held, and defended by us with a strong arm and iron hand.

Agriculture requires it, for it is the only part of our territory which approximates to the tropics, and can give us the rich tropical productions for which we now pay so much to foreigners. The orange, the lemon, the lime, the fig, the pine apple, the plantain, the cocoa, all grow there. The most delicious grapes, rivalling the Malaga, are found there. The famous Cuba tobacco, so sought for in the shape of Havana cigars, is at home in that peninsula. Cotton and sugar there approach five degrees nearer to the sun than in any other parts of the United States, and, consequent y, are five degrees nearer to their natal clime. Besides these more eminent productions, are many indigenous plants and roots, valuable as articles of subsistence, abound in that region. Of these, the wild potatoe, the cabbage tree, the brier root, the arrow root, and the palmetto, are the most considerable. The most valuable timber is found there, of which the live oak, so essential to our navy, is the chief. The forests abound with game, the seas with fish; and it is the opinion of General Jesup that the fisheries of this region, in proportion to their extent, will prove as valuable as those of New Foundland. In addition to all, such is the mildness of the climate, and the length of the growing season, that two crops of many classes of the products may be expected in the year. As to the silk worm, three crops of cocoons—the labors of three generations—are expected from him annually. Such is the interest which agriculture has in the settlement and cultivation of this country.

Sir, it is a great Southern object: the whole South is interested in the pacification, settlement, permanent, and strong occupation of this peninsula. It is a large Southern measure—the largest which has been seen for a long time—the largest which we now see. The Northern Democracy stands by the South in this great object. They stake themselves upon the contest, disregarding the infuriate howlings of Abolitionism, now reinforced by a powerful ally, and bravely expose themselves for what is RIGHT for the SOUTH, without regarding what might be PRUDENT for themselves. Never was the saying of Mr. Jefferson, that the Northern Democracy was the natural ally of the South, more signally verified than on this occasion.

ABOLITION PETITIONS.

REMARKS OF MR. COOPER,

OF GEORGIA,

In the House of Representatives, January 16, 1840—On the resolution of Mr. WADDY THOMPSON to amend the rules relative to the reception and disposal of Abolition petitions.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia rose and said: I voted yesterday on this question, to suspend further debate. The House had refused the previous question, and thereby indicated a disposition to hear. If, however, the House is indisposed to hear discussion, I am more than content to desist. If this be the pleasure of gentlemen, it is now in their power to give that direction. It is only necessary to give the intimation, and I will put the subject in such a shape as to accomplish their wishes. [Here Mr. C. made a short pause.] Without such a desire expressed, it will not be considered a trespass on the time to proceed with what I have to say on a subject of fearful import.

It would be my purpose, touching this matter, to make no move, to call for no action, but to sit with folded arms, resolved to leave it to those who bring such firebrands here, to propose such course as, in their opinion, the House should adopt. It is to be regretted that my friend from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] has felt it his duty to present a proposition. If I could flatter myself that a request of mine could prevail with that gentleman, I would ask him to withdraw his amendment.

[Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolin arose and said, that rather than have any difficulty with his friends, he would withdraw his proposition.

Mr. BIDDLE entreated the gentleman from South Carolina not to withdraw his resolution. He appealed to his generosity, and implored him to allow him an opportunity of explaining his views on this matter; an opportunity he had been seeking for in vain, for the last two years.

Mr. BLACK hoped the gentleman from South Carolina would withdraw his resolution, unless every gentleman on the floor who desired to address the House on this subject, should have the same opportunity of doing so.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina. Then I do not withdraw it.]

Mr. COOPER resumed: Two days ago, Mr. Speaker, when a question of reception was propounded on presentation of Abolition petitions, a well informed gentleman stated to us that, on a direct vote, less than one fourth of the members would be found voting to reject them. If at a crisis like the present such a result could obtain, let it be made known. Upon this, as upon all questions, it is the duty of the United States Congress to act with perfect frankness. An open and manly course is due to its own character, and that alone is calculated to exhibit its true sentiments to the people we represent. We should march directly up to the point, and pronounce, unequivocally, what we think is expedient and right in regard to the reception of these petitions. Any other policy on this occasion, argues either disrespect for the petitioners, or a fearfulness of responsibility, unworthy of a member of Congress. This plain, direct, and upright course, is demanded by the wishes of those who petition, as well as by the interests of those who are to be aggrieved by the petitions.

Sir, the welfare of the State of Georgia requires that you should pronounce an opinion rejecting these petitions; or if you would not reject them, that you should make it known. She has no party interests to serve by this. These are considerations too light, too trivial, too pitiful, to enter into her estimate at this time, and on this occasion. The same influences which bring these petitions here, and the same arguments which are invoked in behalf of the petitioners, have carried and sustained an open attack upon her domestic relations, and upon the rights of property held by her citizens. It is, therefore, she claims of you, by the obligation of duty you owe to her, to reject this class of petitions, saying to the petitioners, you are endangering the Government, and destroying the peace and harmony of the States. If you will not deal thus candidly with them, and are of opinion they ought to be received, let the South understand you. The State of Georgia may then, with prudence, safety, wisdom and efficiency, adopt her own policy in respect to matters about which she is deeply concerned.

I desire to disembarrass this subject of the party trammels that have been thrown around it. The ground on which you fight is sacred—rendered so by the Constitution. The people, affected by your political bandyism, are, by that instrument, urging on you the obligations of duty; are claiming the repose of peace and quiet. The football, which is the instrument of your sport in this game, wounds us at every impulse you give it. It is a weapon which, placed in the hands of either, deals death-blows to all around—death to us and our interests, or death to your Government. Sport on, therefore, if you must, and strive which shall receive most pleasure, or suffer least pain; in the wind up, your pleasure will turn to pain, and your joy into sorrow.

The subject before us is the reception or rejection of Abolition petitions—petitions praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia and the Territory of Florida. We complain of these petitions as an evil. I propose to examine into

The nature, source, and extent of this evil;
Our duty in regard to it; and The remedy.

The proposition of my friend from South Carolina, now on your table, is not the proper one, being at best, ambiguous, uncertain, and indirect. I desire a rejection of the petitions.

I proceed, however, to consider the first point, the nature, source, and extent of evil in these petitions. Here, sir, I am advised by some, the argument was exhausted on some former occasions, before another Congress. I will, nevertheless, offer the reasons which, as I conceive, in your wisdom should control this subject. I desire to do it dispassionately and deliberately, that the truths which I may utter may not be lost in a tempest, being ascribed to rage. I desire to do it without the aid of declamation. In its loftiest effort, the gravity of those truths would sink them beyond our view.

What I shall say is intended for this House, if it please to hear; for those especially who bring and advocate here these petitions; for them and their constituents, not for mine. When I address my constituents, I prefer to be near to them, and meet them face to face.

Before I proceed, sir, it is indispensable that I exact of gentlemen a concession of one point, without which, no argument can be maintained, no truth tested. What is that? It is this: The Constitution as adopted and written, shall prove the truth of our position, and form the sole measure of our right and wrong. Without this, we are thrown back on first principles. Each State stands for itself, and this Government is dissolved. You admit, then, the Constitution is the only rule and measure of our obligations and powers. That every assertion of power, every claim of right, or declaration of duty, is tested by its provisions. That no higher test can be referred to, to correct or overrule politically a decision, made by the application of its principles.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRANGER,] after expressing his contempt of local opinions and sectional interests, has pointed us to the "corrected opinion of mankind, the enlightened philanthropy of the age," to put us right on questions here involved. Sir, I have elsewhere heard of "obligations paramount" to the Constitution by which to test these political relations. This error is radical, strikes at the foundation of our Government, and prostrates the whole fabric. The States have created no such obligations, acknowledge none such politically, and will have none such forced on them. Such opinions are disorganizing and revolutionary. They give a death blow to all constitutional freedom, will establish the Church, and make the Pope supreme on earth.

The Constitution, then, is the true rule of our political faith, the sole test of rectitude in practice. It was made by the States, whose people had pre-existing political relations. It was made for them, according to these established connections. By these, the beings forming the subject of these petitions had no citizenship, but were as verily property as your lands. Is this denied? If so, the argument is exhausted, and the Union dissolved.

This instrument, rendered practical by agents appointed for that purpose, is the Government, and is formed for the States that made it, and for the people of those States, who then possessed a political relation to each other, and for no other; and for them in no other relation.

The rights and privileges then existing, not thereby surrendered or forbidden, with those which were by it created, were the objects to be secured to those for whom the Government was established. The right of property was one; yes, the right of property in slaves. Does any one deny it here? I pause for reply. Not one! (Sir, it has been denied elsewhere by high authority.) Without that, this Union would not have been formed. Is this denied? I pause for reply. It is admitted.

Among those privileges is the quiet and peaceful enjoyment of this right. Another is the freedom of speech, "the freedom of the press, and the right peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for redress of grievances." All of these, however sacred or inviolate, are in some sense more or less restricted, limited, and deniable in the exercise—the "right of petition" or freedom of speech, not less so than the right of property. This results from the fact that, as between the several States, or the citizens of each, the one has rights and privileges equal with the other; wherefore the Government cannot be administered, or long exist, unless you decline the exercise of a mere privilege when it destroys a right of property; the "freedom of speech," for instance, when it would rob me of reputation; the "freedom of the press," when the effect is the same, or to destroy the peace of a whole community.

This is right, too, on the plain principles of that "natural justice" which is such an idol in your worship. To speak, to write, or petition, in a matter that does not immediately interest you, with which you are not personally connected, and lies not at your door, if a privilege at all, is a mere naked privilege, the benefits of which results not to yourself particularly, but to "mankind at large." Do you not perceive it? Is not this going beyond the Constitution? And what is this but a second crusade? Sir, it wants but the armor, the military parade, and the battle array to make it literal.

Let it be remembered that it is the pride and glory of these States to have instituted the novel experiment of a written Constitution, without which, and beyond which, there is no power and no government; without that we have no rule of political action, and dare not express a political opinion. The "universal opinion of mankind" is not our rule; half of them have not seen or heard of our Constitution.

Now, sir, suppose the exercise of this mere naked privilege, which benefits another, not yourself, the loss consequent on which exercise falls not on you, but on another, whose rights you have not only pledged, but sworn to respect and defend, shall tend to take from me my property in person or thing? Have you a right to such exercise? By the Constitution, you must say no; by those "eternal principles of right" which these petitioners worship, for which they run rough shod over the charter of our liberty, and subvert the Union, you will answer, no.

Suppose again, under such circumstances, you refuse to receive petitions—is that a denial of the "right peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances?" If so, how do you check debate here? how does one man rise and speak whilst all are made to sit? how do you chain the slanderer's tongue, tie the hand of the libeller, or hang a man for inditing treason?

This privilege, or right of petition, in the cases before you, is inferior to my right of property, and the enjoyment thereof under the compact. The latter is greater, the former less, and must yield. Is this not so? Most certainly. If so, then the refusal to receive these petitions, which is made the false pretext for exciting the sympathies, and inflaming the passions of men, women, and children, is not only right, but becomes your duty, under the most solemn of all obligations. Duty to us requires it; that we may peaceably enjoy the rights that belong to us. Duty to them demands it; that they may turn their thoughts on themselves and perceive their error. And if you owe any thing to the opinions of mankind, to "justice," or religion, duty to all requires it; that men may not be "inquisitive about other men's matters, nor become railers nor disturbers of the peace;" that you may not do injustice, without warrant, to let what you call "natural justice" be done; and that this "opinion of mankind" may be corrected, by reference to your rule, of which they are ignorant.

Under our Government, there are not only mutual rights, but reciprocal duties. Your Government is under the same obligations, if not greater, to respect and maintain the rights of Georgia, than she is to obey your lawful enactments. So of these petitioners, and the people of Georgia. Having admitted our right of property, it is your duty not to move by petition or otherwise. This is true, whether the effect of your petitions be to destroy my property contrary to my will, or to lessen its value, by indirect means, beyond my control. If this be not so, what right have you to complain of your neighbor, who puts a torch to his own dwelling, which, by possibility, may communicate to yours?

There is one other political and historical truth I wish observed, for, in tracing the evils that surround us to their source, we shall illustrate, that a failure to notice this has led most of the Abolitionists into dangerous errors. It is this: Your Government was not made for negroes or slaves. If, in forming it, you had attempted that, it would have failed. Those who come here with petitions claiming justice need not startle at this; and if, in your excursions through Europe, you blush to be told of it, hide your blushes, come home, upset your Government, and form a new one. Do not hold us to the old one; and set up the "opinion of mankind," gathered in Europe, as the rule of our political action. Our people are about as ignorant of that rule as you, and half of Europe, are of the Constitution. We seldom go to Europe, because we pay you to go for us; hence, we do not suffer the infliction of that "opinion" as you do; but if that is your "grievance," you may stay at home and let us go.

This Union was formed for the States—the people of the States—that people who then had their respective constitutions and laws establishing their political, civil, and domestic relations. Negroes had no band in it, here or at home, and were not referred to when you proposed "to establish justice," and "secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." Do you think so? If so, speak out.

Now, sir, having presented these undeniable truths, with a view to trace existing evils to their source, I proceed to inquire, who are they that petition thus? Are they the owners of the property in slaves? Not so. Are they citizens of slaveholding communities? No. They are citizens of Massachusetts. Very well; as a general rule, we admit the right of Massachusetts citizens to petition.

To whom do they petition? To Congress, composed of members from slaveholding, as well as non-slaveholding States. By the same general rule, it is granted to be the duty of Congress to receive petitions.

When are these petitions offered? True, it is at the call of Massachusetts, but happens to be very prejudicial to very important money claims of my constituents, as well as those of other gentlemen, and possibly to the prejudice of still larger interests; and therefore it would have been better to have kept them back for a few weeks. Still it was their day, and no objection can rightfully be urged on that ground.

For whom do they petition? For themselves? No. For Europe, or Asia, or Africa, or the citizens of either? It is not so represented; and if it were, it must be admitted that they, as individuals, could not petition you. For whom then? It need not be disguised; these petitions are for, and on behalf of, the negroes or slaves of this District, and the several States. Yes, these petitioners have placed themselves by the side of the slaves of the South, inciting them to rebellion; aiding them to wage war with their masters; presenting petitions for those who have no right to ask any thing of you; joining an issue with their masters, which to make or join at home, and under the laws governing master and slave, is death; doing and saying that, which, being done and said within the jurisdiction of a State here represented, is incendiary, insurrectionary, and felonious. All this is done and said here to those who are deputed specially to represent the great interests of the South. And we, it is contended, are bound to receive all this, to bear it, and submit. If this be true, then do your worst, and you can only take one step farther under the banner of a "sacred right of petition:" that will be, to look a little closer into our domestic circle, and petition that our children quit their parents, and our wives have permission to leave their husbands. Where is the philanthropist who can insist on the reception of such papers; or where the Christian, with all the light before him, who can pray for such results? What true Republican can support such startling doctrines?

But for what do they pray? "For the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in this District and the Territories." This you have no power by the Constitution or laws to do. Why? The reasons are at hand.

Grant, for argument sake, that your Government has all the power in this District and the Territories, which the States have in their limits; you still have no power to do it, since it would deprive individuals of their property without their consent.

Government is made to protect and defend the rights of property, not to subvert them. There would be wanting even the pretext that the property was for public use. By numbers and the aid of the sword, you might effect your object; but the history of the last seventy years has proved that freemen will fight for much less cause.

Is it pretended that this Government has a "public use" for this property? Quite the reverse. What, then, do you do with that clause of your Constitution which says: "Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation?" And let it be remembered, this taking "for public use" is an exception to the broad provision that it shall not be taken at all. And what shall we do with our oaths to support such items?

But it is denied that Congress has the same powers here and in the Territories which the States have in their respective limits. Why? Because its powers are defined and limited, both as to the objects and purposes for which, and on which it may act. The "exclusive power to legislate in all cases whatsoever" in this District, is subject to corresponding limitations and restrictions laid on its powers in other respects, and must be consonant thereto, otherwise this grant of "exclusive power" would operate to subvert every right of the citizen here. Not only so, Congress is under obligations to Virginia and Maryland, as well as to all the slaveholding States, not to abolish slavery here or in the Territories. The existence of such obligation, is neither more nor less than, in other words, to assert a want of power to do what it is obliged not to do.

Consider these petitions in reference to their practical effect, and what is it but to ask you to rob us by form of law, to subvert our institutions, burn our dwellings, stir up civil war, and commit murder and rapine? Sir, we ask not your protection at home, we do not need it. If we we need it, it is against your ignorance of our rights or your wilful disregard to them, and to your solemn obligations of duty.

It follows then that there is no power to grant such petitions, that if there was, it would be manifestly unjust, as much so as to receive a petition from me to burn the dwelling of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRANGER.] Wherefore then the obligation to receive? In truth, is there not a positive duty to reject them?

The Abolitionists are not that worthless, disreputable, and unimportant class of people they are sometimes represented to be. And here I beg to correct the honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON.] In the large commercial cities, comparatively few respectable and intelligent citizens are found to be Abolitionists. There is an interest felt in those commercial communities, which bears down this spirit of fanaticism. But go into the country, the interior villages and towns; there you will find the soul and spirit of that body called Abolitionists; and they are far from being low, mean, or contemptible; they are sober, industrious, religious, and intelligent, on all matters pertaining to their own interests—most ignorant of our Constitution and laws, and our rights under them,

Unfortunately by education and habit they are confiding, and readily yield to the lead of those whose interest it is to have them follow. They have a fanatical zeal for this Abolitionism, and nothing causes them to pause but a conviction that the Government will be dissolved if they persevere. Knowing this, their leaders persuade them there is no danger. You have only to satisfy them that disunion results from Abolition, and they give it up. Am I right, or am I wrong? Two summers, spent north of this, have taught me that. I have it not from politicians, but from the unsophisticated farmer, having conversed with him in his fields. You, therefore, who represent this body of men, will allow us, through you, to address a word to your constituents. Do now what you have failed to do heretofore. Examine strictly your rule of political truth. Read our Constitution and the history of its formation. Call on your editors, lecturers, and agents, to disseminate, utter, and publish tracts on those subjects without comment; ponder well your duties and obligations under them—the respect you owe to our rights; compare the force of these with your sense of duty, merely to petition for Abolition.

Have you made no pledges to us in that instrument by which we united as States? As Christians, can you be insensible to the obligations of your promises? After you shall have answered these questions, and made the examinations demanded of you, then remember that among other grievances enumerated by the colonies during the Revolution, and published in your Declaration of Independence, inciting your slaves to insurrection was one. How can you expect us to cease to burn with indignation, whilst you, under the pretence of "a sacred right of petition" pray upon us the very grievance your fathers fought to revenge? You are inveigling and enticing our slaves, seducing them from the path of obedience, and inciting them to insurrection.

Sir, I call on the gentlemen from New York, from Maine, and from Massachusetts, when they go home, to give their constituents light on these points. Ask the Governor of New York what are his opinions? Are you prepared, with him, to deny this right of property? If so, let us all know it. Will you join issue with him—then publish his error to the four winds. Is not all personal property a subject of theft and larceny? But I forbear. One item of recent history strikes me here; it is this: "Larceny of a slave is no crime in the Empire State"—the obligations of your Constitution notwithstanding—since the Governor of that State—

[The SPEAKER here interrupted Mr. C. and informed him that it was not in order to allude to the Governors of the States.

Mr. BARNARD begged that the gentleman might proceed.]

Mr. COOPER continued. Mr. SPEAKER, it appears to me that a very large and respectable portion of this Union overlook, disregard, and habitually disparage the rights and interests of another portion. I refer to the North and South. So habitual is the disregard of the former for the latter, that they induce us to believe they consider this Government as existing almost exclusively for themselves. One would suppose, that to be tributary to their railroads, canals, and turnpikes, their fortifications and light-houses, their foreign and domestic commerce, their manufactories and banks, and, thereby, to their splendid cities, their farms and country seats, would suffice, and we might be permitted peacefully to use and enjoy a portion of the means that enable us to make contribution. But not so! So they petition loud, numerous, and strong, that we be compelled to give up that also; and if we deny their right so to petition, this denial of an undue exercise of a right of petition is the foundation of clamorous appeals to the "law of nature, "eternal justice," and the "opinion of mankind," which are claimed to be of higher obligations than the Constitution itself.

Idleness and a fanatical zeal for natural liberty, regardless of law, form the source of all the mischief those people are working through the country. Your Abolitionists have a "zeal without knowledge," which, being wrought upon by editors, hired, lecturers and agents, ends in wickedness. These, being otherwise out of employment, fan the flame whereby numbers are added, and contributions increased. Abolition excitement, therefore, is made the nucleus of a party that gives employment to the otherwise unemployed; clothes the naked, and feeds the hungry. Politicians watch the movement, and by leaning to them, or openly advocating them, ride into power. A few men of wealth, influence, talents and education, filled with the vanity of future fame, have thrown themselves in the attitude of leaders. So controlling have they already become in New York and Maine, that it has become a matter of interest and rivalship with the local parties, to address themselves more and more near to their views. It is not to be disguised that the two great parties in this House consider this subject more with reference to party effect, than the principles of your Constitution. One party, as a whole, is by profession and practice somewhat more friendly to our interest, on this question, than the other, resulting mainly from their respective positions; but either seem hitherto to have fixed limits short of what our rights and the Constitution authorize them to go.

How then are we to stay an evil that is sweeping the North, springing from the wants and necessities of men, being identified with the labor of the country, and fed by religious fanaticism; which is the theme of poetry and romance; the subject of lectures, sermons, and prayer meetings; which is cradled with infancy; instilled by education; caricatured in print shops; directed and lauded by an unrestrained press; which is addressed to and received by the beggar and the lordling; the male and the female, in city, town, and country; which is advocated by lawyers and doctors, judges and jurors, priests and laymen; is admitted to control politicians, Governors and State Legislatures; affects the Presidential controversy, influences this House, divides North and South, unites with Church and State, and now shakes the Union? How shall we arrest it? Ours is an awful responsibility. But the country requires us to take it; posterity will hold us accountable.

You have the remedy in your own hands, if you choose to apply it. Tell these petitioners this is a subject they ought not, cannot petition for. And when you return, meet them at their firesides, and in their fields; plant yourselves on the charter of our freedom; summon fact and reason; fail not to tell them, they are injuring their neighbors, and dissolving the Government.

Failing to apply this remedy here, sir, the South must take the alternative; yield her rights, permitting you to use the Government for your own benefit, and abuse it for our injury—or dissolve. Failing to do your duty here, Georgia, one of your confederates, willing to hear advice, but entitled to act for herself, must do what her interest and happiness requires. In her controversies connected with this subject, she cannot admit your power to decide for her—she cannot ask it—Maine could not submit to it—if she does—

[The SPEAKER here interrupted Mr. C.]

Mr. COOPER continued. I was going to say that if the power was claimed here and asserted, and your judges, marshals, posse, or army were ordered out to force Maine—

[The SPEAKER again interrupted.

Mr. EVANS and Mr. SMITH, of Maine, hoped the gentleman would be permitted to go on.]

Mr. COOPER said it was not his intention then, or ever, to violate order; he thanked the SPEAKER for his kindness in enforcing order, and the House for its courtesy in wishing him to go on. The reference to Maine and to New York, was made with the sole view of illustrating the propriety of applying a rule here, calling for a non-reception of these petitions, which might avert a more disagreeable alternative.

Gentlemen have said this is the way to multiply Abolitionists, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GENTRY] says receive, refer, and report on them, and the Abolitionists will be satisfied.

Sir, this subject was urged by petitions as early as 1790, by a most worthy and intelligent community of people, the Quakers. Georgia had her Baldwin and Jackson then to oppose them; a reference and report was made. Such, with little variance continued to be the course, till the object of the Abolitionists changed, and the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRANGER,] will permit me to correct him. In 1834–5, and before 1836, the excitement began to run high. Respectful treatment, reception and reports, only strengthened them, until, on this floor, honorable gentlemen asserted a power in Congress to abolish slavery in the States, and declared that slaves had a right to memorialize this body. Have gentlemen forgotten the course of Mr. Pinckney, the same now urged by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. GENTRY.] He had a reference and a report. Did that satisfy or check Abolitionism? No, the causes have continued to operate, and the effects to increase. Wherefore, then, do Southern men wish a reference again?

I have trespassed on your patience longer than I intended. The importance of the subject, and the interest of my constituents, is the apology. Sir, I leave this unpleasant subject with you; unpleasant it is in the extreme. Here—at home—throughout this Union—look at it in all its aspects, it is fearful to the North and the South. The issue is at hand, and you are bound to speak the language of truth and sincerity to the North and the South, to cease on this question your party movements, and tell us what you think. Reject these petitions through regard to the constitutional rights of the States—quiet the South, and let the North understand that the Government is tottering. Do this, and you effect much to avert the storm and silence the commotion of the elements. But let the influences that drive these documents here move on, yield yourself to them—and, we say, talk not to Georgia of her obligations to a Constitution trampled by others under foot. She is an humble, submissive instrument at the footstool of power, or she will rise and defy those who would "incite her slaves to insurrection."

REMARKS OF MR. WATTERSON, OF TENNESSEE,

In the House of Representatives, January 16, 1840—On the subject of Abolition petitions.

MR. SPEAKER: Differing as I do from a portion of my colleagues upon this subject, I feel that it is my duty to state some of the reasons which influence my course. I did hope, sir, that on the exciting and important question now under consideration, it would be my good fortune to battle, arm to arm and shoulder to shoulder, with all the Representatives from the State of Tennessee. It is to me a source of deep mortification that any Southern man should hesitate a moment in regard to the proper disposition of Abolition petitions, much less pursue a course which, in my judgment, is playing into the hands of those miserable fanatics. The resolution offered by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. CHINN,] proposing to receive and refer to a committee all memorials and petitions relating to the abolition of slavery in this District, in the Territories, or in the States, concedes every thing the Abolitionists are contending for at this time, and I must be permitted to express my great astonishment at the source from which it originated. Coming as he does from one of the largest slave-holding States in the Union, I regard the move as extremely unfortunate; but not more so than the zealous and able support which it has received from some of my colleagues and others of the same political party, who hail from the South. Sir, are not the votes of every Abolitionist in the House recorded upon the journal in favor of suspending the rule, for the purpose of adopting it? Did not the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] when a similar proposition was suggested by one of my colleagues, [Mr. BELL,] arise in his place and declare that it was all he desired? Well do the Abolitionists know that the goal of universal emancipation cannot be reached, but by degrees—that the ramparts of the Constitution cannot be torn down in a day nor a week; and hat if they can gain a single point at a time, they may ultimately succeed in eradicating slavery, not in the District of Columbia alone, but in the several States—and at the same time sunder the cords that bind together this glorious Union. Sir, I would rather these conspirators against the perpetuity of this Republic, and the rights and tranquillity of its citizens, should prate about grievances, which, if they exist at all, cannot affect them, to the end of time, than to acknowledge by my vote, that I am bound to receive, refer, and treat with common respect their petitions, which ask me to violate the Constitution of my country, which I have solemnly sworn to support. If we are to have peace upon such terms only, I, for one, am against peace. But have we so soon forgotten the past? Does not every gentleman upon this floor recollect, that the same argument was used in 1836, in favor of the reference of these petitions to a committee—that then, as now, it was contended, that such reference would be the most effectual mode of tranquilizing the public mind, and staying all further agitation of the subject on the part of the Abolitionists? Under this delusive hope, such a committee was raised, on the motion of a distinguished gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. Pinckney.] That committee went to work, and made an able report against the prayer of the petitioners, and what was the effect? Was the voice of Abolition hushed? Did their insulting and infamous petitions cease to pour into this House? Were the rights and feelings of the South any more respected? Let your journals for the last three years answer. Session after session are we called upon to repel their assaults against our domestic institutions, our homes, and our firesides. Instead of allaying, as it was alleged would be the case, it has increased their exertions. Shall we, then, resort to an experiment, which has already so signally failed? To do so would be nothing but downright madness. Better, far better, to stand firm like men, and give way on no part of the ground. If we once commence retreating, they will never cease their demands, until they have accomplished their unhallowed purposes. But the Abolitionists and their apologists contend that to refuse acting on these petitions is a violation of that article in the Constitution, which prohibits Congress from passing any law abridging the "right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." This I deny. Have we passed any law, or are we called upon to pass any law, abridging this right? Surely not. The people are at liberty to "peaceably assemble" at any time, and to petition upon any subject; but when it is presented here by an honorable member, by the rules of the House which we have adopted for our government, he has to state its contents; and after hearing such statement, are we not prepared to say whether it is of such a character as would justify us in rejecting it at once? By way of illustration, suppose the fanatics of Massachusetts, or any other State, should take it into their heads to send petitions to the Legislature of Tennessee, asking them to pass a law authorizing and empowering our slaves to cut all our throats by a given time, would it be a denial of the right of petition not to receive and refer them? Again: suppose the hot-headed Southerners, believing that the venerable ex-President, who sits across the way, was most essentially deranged upon the subject of slavery, and that by his course in this House their lives and their property were endangered, should ask Congress to enact a law, sending him to some place of confinement the remainder of a long and eventful life, would not the gentleman himself admit, that this was an abuse of the right of petition; or, in other words, that we would not be bound to receive and consider it? Gentlemen declare if we will only receive and refer Abolition petitions, it is all they wish; the House can then put the "broad seal" of condemnation upon them as soon as they please. Such declarations resolve themselves into this: that to refuse to receive and refer their petitions, is a gross insult; but the moment after reception and reference, we may commit them to the flames, without offence! Most logical and happy thought, truly! But I am not willing to trust them. Let us mark our indignation at the objects they have in view, by a prompt and decisive vote at the threshold. Let us say to them that we have no power to legislate on the subject; and if we had, it could not be exercised, without tearing down the fairest fabric that human wisdom ever reared, and spreading havoc and ruin where there is now peace and prosperity.

Mr. Speaker, by refusing to receive these petitions after we have heard their contents stated by the introducer, or by laying them on the table without any further action upon them, we avoid debate on this distracting subject. Sir, every debate here may kindle the fires of insurrection in the South. Let me ask, how can debate be prevented, if we receive, and refer them to a committee? The moment that reference is made, a member rises in his place, holds up a resolution in his hand, and demands its adoption. What is it? It is a resolution instructing the committee to report in favor of the prayer of the Abolitionists. He has the floor; no other member can get it in order to move the previous question; and he proceeds for hours, if not days, to plead the cause of these incendiaries. Every word he utters, through the secret agency of the Abolitionists, finds its way to the ears of the slave population of the South, and may excite them to rebellion and massacre. But, sir, suppose you succeed in applying the previous question at the close of this speech; cannot another member, and another, and so on, until the whole number is exhausted, bring forward resolutions of the like kind, and in that way keep up an everlasting debate in this House, and an everlasting disturbance out of it? This must be the inevitable result of receiving and referring such papers to a committee. Unlike my two colleagues, [Messrs. GENTRY and BELL,] I can never consent to such a reception and reference. It must lead to interminable discussion; and discussion here, I fear, will lead to the most direful consequences.

The gentleman from the city of New York [Mr. MONROE] has declared that the battle of Abolitionism must be fought at the North. Must be fought in the North, and by whom, sir? The political party (Whig) to which he is attached? If so, I have solemn apprehensions that our rights will be in peculiarly bad keeping!

Sir, were they fighting the battles of the South, when they were supporting a notorious Abolitionist [Mr. Bradish] for Lieutenant Governor of New York, when they gave him about nineteen thousand votes in the city, and near one hundred and fifty thousand in the State? Were they fighting the battles of the South, when they were rallying around the black standard of an Abolitionist for Governor of Pennsylvania in 1838? I mean Joseph Ritner, who received the full Whig vote in that State; and will any member present deny it? If so, let him speak. I hold in my hand a message which he delivered to the Legislature, December, 1836, and would ask leave to read a short extract from it. After speaking of the "base bowing of the knee to the dark spirit of slavery," he said:

"Opposition to the admission into the Union of new slaveholding States, and opposition to slavery in the District of Columbia, the very hearth and abode of the national honor, have ever been, and are the cherished doctrines of our State. Let us, fellow-citizens, stand by and maintain them unshrinkingly and fearlessly."

Here are "cherished" Abolition "doctrines" for you! But, sir, the voice of the ballot boxes, in tones of thunder, declared, that this message contained foul slanders upon the sound Republican principles of Pennsylvania. Ritnerism and Abolitionism were overthrown, and the banner of Democracy again waved its broad folds over that ancient Commonwealth.

Were they fighting the battles of the South, at the late Harrisburg Convention, when they nominated a candidate for the Presidency, who is in favor of appropriating the surplus revenue to the emancipation of slaves? Only hear him:

"Should I be asked if there is no way by which the General Government can aid the CAUSE OF EMANCIPATION, I answer that it has long been an object near my heart, to see the WHOLE OF ITS SURPLUS REVENUE APPROPRIATED TO THAT OBJECT."

Were they fighting the battles of the South, when they elected Abolitionists Governor and Lieutenant Governor of Vermont? Sir, I regret to say, that I have seen the success of these men trumpeted, even in my own State, by the Whig newspapers, as a Whig victory. "Vermont erect!" "Vermont ever true to her principles!" and like joyful exclamations, have frequently graced their columns, on hearing of a Whig Abolition triumph in that State. Heaven save the Democracy from all such triumphs!

In the State of Ohio, I understand, there was a line of Abolitionists from the Ohio river to the Lakes, who aided the slaves of Kentucky to escape into Canada. So frequent were the complaints on this score, that the Legislature of Kentucky sent commissioners to the Legislature of Ohio, asking them to pass a law punishing in future all such kidnappers. Accordingly, such a law was promptly enacted, in conformity with the wishes of Kentucky and the principles of common honesty. I believe it was termed the "Fugitive act." But mark ye: in the House of Representatives there were twenty-three votes against the bill, all of whom were Whigs, "good and true." In the Senate, there were fourteen negative votes, and not a Democrat amongst the number. Now, I would ask the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MONROE,] if these thirty-seven leading Whigs were fighting the battles of the South?

Were the Whig party fighting the battles of the South, when they were passing, and endeavoring to pass, Abolition resolutions in the Legislatures of New York, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Vermont, Connecticut, and several other States?

Was the present Whig Governor of Connecticut fighting the battles of the South, when in his very first message he thundered his denunciations against Southern institutions?

Was his Whig Excellency, Governor Seward, of New York, fighting the battles of the South when he recently refused the demand of the Governor of Virginia for three fugitives from justice, charged with having "stolen and carried away from the State of Virginia a negro slave, the property of a citizen of the borough of Norfolk?" Was he afraid of offending his Abolition friends, who published a circular immediately before the New York election, in 1838, to the "Anti-Slavery electors" of that State, urging them to cast their votes for him and against Governor Marcy, the Democratic candidate? Here it is. Let the South make their own comments.

CIRCULAR

TO THE ANTI-SLAVERY ELECTORS OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

We ask the privilege of brethren to set forth briefly, but frankly, the reasons which constrain us to cast our votes for William H. Seward for Governor.

1. Mr. Seward is the candidate of the party which, on the floor of Congress, nobly vindicates the inestimable right of petition, and as nobly asserts the freedom of debate; of the party, also, that sustain John Quincy Adams and William Slade; of a party whose views are liberal and tolerant.

2. Mr. Seward is the candidate of the party which, in our last Legislature, passed resolutions against the admission of Texas into the Union; against Patton's gag resolutions; in favor of the right of petition; and in favor of granting trial by jury to persons claimed as fugitive slaves. Instead of the denunciations and revilings with which our petitions were treated in years past—instead of threatening us with penal enactments, the Whigs received and treated petitions and remonstrances with that respect and comity due to their constituents.

3. Mr. Seward is the candidate of the party that opposes the re-election of a President who stands pledged to veto any bill abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia.

4. Mr. Seward is the candidate opposed to Governor Marcy, who, in his messages to the Legislature, has manifested, in sentiment and sympathy, the bitterest hostility to our cause; and who, as the presiding officer of a public meeting, while he was Governor of the State, recommended the passage of laws authorising a violation of the mails, and inflicting pains and penalties upon those who were disseminating intelligence and truth.

5. The re-election of Gov. Marcy would go very far towards the re-election of Martin Van Buren, whose measures and policy are so hostile to the cause of human liberty.

And, finally, because our knowledge of Mr. Seward lead us to confide in the general soundness and integrity of his principles. We view the great question of a Sub-Treasury, a National Bank, or the currency, of minor importance, compared with the great subject of human liberty; and believing that the election of Mr. Seward, and the defeat of Governor Marcy, will best promote the great cause of universal emancipation, we shall vote for him ourselves, and recommend our Abolition friends to do the same.

We are, respectfully, your fellow-citizens,

JEFFERSON MAYELI,
President Albany Young Men's Anti-Slavery Society.
CALVIN PEPPER, Jr.
Vice President.
JOHN WILSON,
Corresponding Secretary.
H. CARPENTER,
First Vice President.
WILLIAM GIBSON,
One of the Executive Committee Young Men's Albany Anti-Slavery Society.
NORMAN FRANCIS,
Chairman of the Executive Committee of Young Men's Albany Anti-Slavery Society.

S. A. HASTINGS, A. McCLURE, J. McCLURE, FORDYCE SYLVESTER, JAMES E. McCLURE, S. B. HALL, CHARLES E. BURTON, PETER M. McELROY, DAVID MARTIN, S. T. RICE, S. V. R. WATSON.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to the journal of the House of Representatives for the last session of Congress, and will show by the yeas and nays how certain members voted upon a resolution, against the right of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia and in the Territories, with a view to its abolition in the States. But, before I proceed, I would make a single remark in regard to the author of these resolutions, [Mr. ATHERTON, of New Hampshire.] His course has been denounced by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRANGER,] who charged him with being influenced alone by the strong tie of party and party drill. Sir, judging his motives from his acts, he was governed by a much higher consideration—a desire to stand fast to the Constitution, though he might fall in the conflict. Instead of meriting the censure, he deserves the gratitude of the whole country. In the name, and on behalf of my constituents, I tender him my heartfelt thanks. Would to Heaven we had more such men from the North.

I find, upon examination, that fifty-two Representatives voted against the second of the following resolutions. I shall read them both, because the latter refers to the first:

Resolved, That Congress has no right to do that indirectly which it cannot do directly; and that the agitation of the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia, or the Territories, as a means, and with the view, of disturbing or overthrowing that institution in the several States, is against the true spirit and meaning of the Constitution, an infringement of the rights of the States affected, and a breach of the public faith upon which they entered into the Confederacy.

Resolved, therefore, That all attempts on the part of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, or the Territories, or to prohibit the removal of slaves from State to State, or to discriminate between the institutions of one portion of the Confederacy and another, with the views aforesaid, are in violation of the Constitution, destructive of the fundamental principle on which the union of these States rests, and beyond the jurisdiction of Congress.

Out of the fifty-two votes that were given against the last resolution, forty-eight were Whigs, embracing nearly the entire Whig strength from the non-slaveholding States in this House at that time. I give their names, and the States which they respectively represented:

MASSACHUSETTS WHIGS.—John Quincy Adams, Nathaniel B. Borden, George N. Briggs, William B. Calhoun, Caleb Cushing, Richard Fletcher, Geo. Grinnell, jr. William S. Hastings, Levi Lincoln, John Reed, and Leverett Saltonstall.

PENNSYLVANIA WHIGS.—Edward Darlington, Edward Davies, Thomas Henry, Thos. M. T. McKennan, Charles Naylor, and David Potts, jr.

VERMONT WHIGS.—Heman Allen, Horace Everett, Hiland Hall, and William Slade.

NEW YORK WHIGS.—John Edwards, (Con.) Millard Filmore, Henry A. Foster, (Con.) Abraham P. Grant, (Con.) Richard P. Marvin, Charles F. Mitchell, Luther C. Peck, David Russell, Mark H. Sibley, Timothy Childs, and Harvey Putnam.

OHIO WHIGS.—James Alexander, jr. Joshua R. Giddings, Pattrick G. Goode, Sampson Mason, and Calvary Morris.

NEW JESSEY WHIGS.—John B. Aycrigg, William Halsted, John P. B. Maxwell, and Charles C. Stratton.

INDIANA WHIGS.—George H. Dunn, William Herod, and James Rariden.

MAINE WHIGS.—George Evans, Joseph C. Noyes, and Edward Robinson.

RHODE ISLAND WHIGS.—Robert B. Cranston, and Joseph L. Tillinghast.

Might I not, Mr. Speaker, again ask the gentleman from New York, if these Whig leaders were fighting the battles of the South, when they were declaring by their votes, as I have shown, that they believe Congress has the power to legislate on the subject of slavery in this District and in the Territories, to the end that it may be overthrown in the several States? Sir, should ever the practical administration of the Government unfortunately get into the hands of men holding to such principles, I awfully fear that the days of this Republic are numbered.

Mr. Speaker, it is certainly an alarming state of affairs, if it has become necessary for one of the great political parties to favor the views of the Abolitionists to any extent, in order to receive their aid in the election of a President. I would hope it is not so. But when I reflect upon the causes which operated in favor of the late Harrisburg nomination, I must confess that I am not without my doubts. It is a fact which cannot be successfully denied, that, had it not been for the influence of the Abolitionists, another distinguished gentleman (Mr. CLAY) would have been the Whig candidate for the next Presidency. Let it be borne in mind, let it never be forgotten, that Gen. Harrison did not receive a single vote in the Harrisburg Convention from a slaveholding State; and is it not marvellous, that, while every Southern delegate in the Harrisburg Convention opposed the nomination of Harrison, now, when it is known his nomination was effected by the influence of Abolitionism, against the will of the South, the whole Southern Federal delegation in Congress have embraced him as their candidate? When the nomination reached New York, what joy pervaded the ranks of the Abolitionists! The Emancipator could not restrain its feelings. It sounded this note of triumph in the excess of its rhapsody:

"THE HARRISBURG CONVENTION.—Well, the agony is over, and Henry Clay is laid upon the shelf; and no man of ordinary intelligence can doubt or deny that it is the Antislavery feeling of the North which has done it, in connection with his own ostentatious and infamous pro-slavery demonstrations in Congress. Praise to God for a great Antislavery victory! A man of high talents, of great distinction, of long political services, of boundless personal popularity, has been openly rejected for the Presidency of this Republic on account of his devotion to slavery. Set up a monument of progress there. Let the winds tell the tale. Let the slaveholders hear the news. Let foreign nations hear it. Let O'Connell hear it. Let the slaves hear it. A slaveholder is incapacitated for the Presidency of the United States. The reign of slaveocracy is hastening to a close. The rejection of Henry Clay by the Whig Convention, taken in connection with all the circumstances, is one of the heaviest blows the monster slavery has received in this country."

Such was the language of a leading Abolition paper, published in the city of New York. But I have more evidence of the same character, showing the manner in which Harrison's nomination was received by the Abolitionists. The Boston Liberator, edited by the notorious and infamous Garrison, came out with a similar article. Hear him:

"NOMINATION OF GENERAL HARRISON.—The National Whig Convention, assembled at Harrisburg on the 6th instant, nominated William Henry Harrison for the office of President of the United States. On the first and second ballot, the vote stood for Henry Clay, 103; for Harrison, 94; for Winfield Scott, 57. On the third ballot, the vote was for Harrison, 148; for Clay, 90; for Scott, 16 All the slave States went for Clay. We regard this as another important sign of the times—as a signal defeat of the slaveholding power in this country. Had it not been for Abolitionism, Henry Clay would undoubtedly have been nominated. We have faith to believe that no slaveholder will ever again be permitted to fill the Presidential office in this Republic."

Sir, if it were necessary, I could introduce evidence upon evidence, proving to a demonstration that Abolitionism done the work at Harrisburg; that Henry Clay was "laid upon the shelf," in consequence of the anti-Abolition sentiments which he avowed in a speech during the last session of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I rejoice that whilst this dark cloud of Abolitionism is hanging over the country, that we have a pilot at the helm of state, whose views are so sound upon the subject, that he has been denounced upon this floor and elsewhere, as a "Northern man with Southern principles"—by which I presume it is meant that he is a Northern man, with Republican principles. If so, I yield to the justness of the denunciation.

Sir, I assert that no man can be a Republican and an Abolitionist. The two terms are totally inconsistent, as much so as those of Democrat and Federalist. Gentlemen may specify a scattering Abolitionist, here and there, who occasionally co-operates with the Democratic party, from local causes, but all his principles, feelings, and sympathies incline him towards the Opposition. Moreover, the Democratic party, as a party, have repudiated the doctines of the Abolitionists. Look at the inaugural of the President, who stands pledged to veto any bill interfering with slavery in this District. Look at the address of the Democratic members of Congress to the people of the United States. Look at their votes in the various State Legislatures. Look at their resolves in their conventions, and in their primary meetings, and you will find abundant evidence of the truth of this assertion. Well did Mr. Jefferson remark, that the "Democracy of the North are the natural allies of the South." Sir, I am proud of that alliance. We fight in one common cause, and under one common banner. That cause is the Constitution of our country. That banner the same, which has so proudly waved over the Republican party, from the foundation of this Government.

APPENDIX AND PROOF.

In Mr. STANLY's reply to Mr. WATTERSON, he read a publication of Mr. PARMENTER, a Democratic Representative from the State of Massachusetts, which he thought committed him to the cause of the Abolitionists.

Mr. PARMENTER did not know if he understood precisely what the gentleman from North Carolina meant by an Abolitionist. I should like to hear him refer to any remark or writing of mine on that subject, or to any vote I have given, other than for the reference to a committee.

Mr. STANLY said he should like to know what the gentleman himself considered an Abolitionist, and read a letter written by Mr. PARMENTER, in which he gave his opinions on the subject of abolition.

Mr. PARMENTER said that, in the State of Massachusetts, it was essential to the quality of an Abolitionist that he should wish Congress immediately to adopt measures to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia and the Territories, without any regard to the consequences. It was true that he, in common with a very large portion of the people of Massachusetts, believed slavery to be a very great evil; and would be glad if it could be abolished without disturbing the peace and harmony of the Union, or violating the rights of others. Mr. P. added that the letter read by the gentleman from North Carolina, was not considered to be in accordance with the views of the Abolitionists, and accordingly they all voted in a body against him.

Mr. STANLY went on with his remarks, and spoke of a number of distinguished members of the Democratic party whom he stigmatized as Abolitionists. Mr. S. read some extracts from an address of Mr. Morton, whose recent election as Governor of Massachusetts, the Democratic party hailed as a triumph, to show that he also was an Abolitionist.

Mr. PARMENTER wished to make one remark in relation to Mr. Morton, the Governor elect of Massachusetts. The gentleman had read some extracts where Gov. Morton spoke his sentiments very strongly against slavery. But the gentleman did not draw the distinction between anti-slavery and Abolitionism. The one was a mere matter of belief, while the other was an intention to carry its objects into effect without any regard to the consequences. He would make another remark. The Abolition paper printed at Boston opposed the election of Governor Morton, and recommended it to the Abolitionists to support another candidate. Mr. P. wished the gentleman would define his ideas of Abolition more distinctly.

Mr. STANLY said he wished the gentleman would define his.

Mr. PARMENTER said he would define what he considered to be the views of an Abolitionist. It was a desire that Congress should abolish slavery in this District, and in the Territories, without regard to the rights of others, the peace and tranquillity of a large portion of the country, and the safety of the Union.

In addition to Mr. PARMENTER's remarks, I would state that there were four trials in his district before he was elected. Levi Farwell was the candidate of the Abolitionists, and Nathan Brooks the Whig candidate. Before the fourth trial, Mr. Farwell declined in favor of Mr. Brooks. Whereupon the Abolitionists issued a circular to their friends, urging them to vote in favor of Mr. Brooks. I subjoin the circular, as well as Mr. Farwell's letter.

TO THE ABOLITIONISTS.

Pause and consider, we beseech you, before you again throw away your votes. The District must not, cannot, go unrepresented. You cannot choose a candidate of your own. Of course Mr. Brooks or Mr. Parmenter will be eventually elected, and can you hesitate a moment for which of them to vote? Mr. Parmenter is pledged to the support of Mr. Van Buren, who has thrown himself into the arms of Southern slaveholders, and he is irrevocably pledged to war against abolition every where and at all times. Mr. Parmenter and his party revile and abuse you. They regard abolition as a "DISEASE," and contemptuously call it "NEGROPHOBIA," and declare it to be "decidedly worse than hydrophobia." From them the poor slave has nothing to hope but "stripes and fetters," and you nothing but sneers and abuse.

Will you not avenge yourselves by giving your support to Mr. Brooks, whose votes in the Senate prove him to be the slave's true friend, and who, in the opinion of the Hon. Samuel Hoar, and Hon. Levi Farwell, and many other respectable Abolitionists, is worthy of your entire confidence. If, by doing so, you can effect his election, would not your votes be "emphatically votes for liberty?" Your former pledges to scatter your votes have been thrice redeemed, and are no longer binding on you. Follow the example of the Abolitionists in other towns, who are determined "nobly to maintain principle," and cast your votes as patriotism and humanity dictate.

Read the following letter, and then pause, before you give your votes for slavery!!!

MR. FARWELL'S LETTER.

CAMBRIDGE, March 20, 1839.

GENTLEMEN: Inasmuch as, at your former session, you have seen fit to propose my name as one of the candidates to be voted for at the Congressional election, you will, I trust, excuse me in requesting that my name may not again be used for that purpose; first, because that, under no circumstances likely to occur, could I undertake to serve the district in that capacity; and secondly, because, from my long acquaintance with Mr. Brooks, and from his acts in the Senate of Massachusetts, I cannot but feel that his sentiments on the subject of slavery are such as to entitle him to the entire confidence of Abolitionists.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEVI FARWELL.

To the Abolition Convention sitting this day at Concord.

The following is the article from the Liberator, (alluded to by Mr. PARMENTER,) calling upon the Abolitionists to support the Whig candidate for Governor, Edward Everett, at the late election for Governor in Massachusetts.

TO ABOLITIONISTS!

We recommend to the attention of our Abolition brethren the following paragraph, which is a literal copy of the whole of an editorial paragraph in the last Liberator, written by Mr. Garrison:

EDWARD EVERETT.

The Governor of this Commonwealth has answered unequivocally in the AFFIRMATIVE to the questions, whether he is in favor of the immediate Abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and the slave trade between the several States. Edward Everett now speaks the language of a patriot, a Republican, and a Christian. We believe it is the real language of his soul. When, a few years since, he took opposite ground, he did violence to his convictions of right, and committed a grievous error. We are disposed to obliterate all that has gone before, and to commend him for his present honorable course. To refer individually to what he said when public sentiment was deeply corrupt, would be ungenerous; to charge him with being insincere at the present time would be unjust; to accuse him of seeking popularity would be equally uncharitable It is not yet a popular thing for the Chief Magistrate of this Commonwealth to avow himself in favor of immediate emancipation; and until he shall prove recreant to his present professions, it is to be taken for granted that he means just what he says. In our opinion, he ought to receive the undivided support of the anti-slavery voters of this Commonwealth; nay, they have pledged to him their support, inasmuch as he has declared himself to be in favor of their principles and measures.

We likewise recommend to the attention of our Abolition brethren the following unmutilated and literal extract of a communication in the same paper, by "A Member of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Board."

GOV. EVERETT'S LETTER IS SATISFACTORY. His endorsing Mr. Alvord's report does not weaken his answer, but strengthens it, for that report was full of the soundest Abolition doctrines. THE GOVERNOR SHOULD RECEIVE THE VOTE OF EVERY ABOLITIONIST. Some, who call themselves such, but whose hearts are more with their party than with the slave, may still go back to Edward Everett's old misdeeds. Let me tell them this is unfair. In the circumstances of the case, it is almost treacherous. Mr. Borden asked Governor Everett's opinions, not as an individual, but as representing the Abolitionists generally. The Governor answers at once and unequivocally. Is it for us to turn round, and charge him with insincerity? This would be a gross outrage. Why did we ask him if we did not mean to judge him by his answer?

Judge Morton's and Mr. Willis's letters are very much alike. They give no information. They do not answer the simplest of all possible questions, so that a plain man can tell what they mean. Judge Morton refers to a letter written two years ago, which, when you look at it, is no more of a reply than the present. That letter contained some very handsome and flowing periods about his detestation of slavery, &c. It, perhaps, served its purpose pretty well in its day; what would do for 1837, will not do for 1839. These vague professions of Judge Morton amount to just nothing at all. There is nothing in them you can put your finger on. If the Abolitionists are to be satisfied with such unmeaning generalities, let me tell you, the politicians will never give them any thing else.

Mr. STANLY also read a letter of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts, in which strong opposition to slavery was expressed. Whether MR. WILLIAMS is, or is not, an Abolitionist, I know not. But I have it from a source which cannot be questionedthat his Whig opponent for Congress (Nathaniel B. Borden) was an active member, if not President of an Anti-Slavery Society, and was supported by Garrison's Liberator, in Boston, the organ of the Abolitionists in that State, which opposed Mr. WILLIAMS, and did not consider him as coming up to their views. Moreover, I find, by reference to the journal of the last session of Congress, that Mr. Borden voted against Mr. ATHERTON'S resolutions throughout—even against that resolution which declares that Congress has no power to do that indirectly, which it cannot do directly.

One of the largest Democratic conventions ever held in the State of Ohio, was held at Columbus on the 8th of January, instant. Among other resolutions which were unanimously adopted, I find the following in regard to Abolition. They go the full length in support of Southern institutions:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this convention, Congress ought not, without the consent of the people of the District, and of the States of Virginia and Maryland, to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia; and that the efforts now making for that purpose, by organized societies in the free States, are hostile to the spirit of the Constitution, and destructive to the harmony of the Union.

Resolved, That slavery being a domestic institution recognised by the Constitution of the United States, we, as citizens of a free State, have no right to interfere with it, and that the organising of societies and associations in free States, in opposition to the institutions of sister States, while productive of no good, may be the cause of much mischief; and while such associations for political purposes ought to be discountenanced by every lover of peace and concord, no sound Democrat will have part or lot with them.

Resolved, That political Abolitionism is but ancient Federalism under a new guise, and that the political action of Anti-slavery societies, is only a device for the overthrow of Democracy.

Before the New York elections in 1838, the black Abolitionists of the city of New York held a meeting, at which they adopted resolutions "earnestly" requesting their "colored brethren" to vote the "WHOLE WHIG TICKET." Their proceedings are subjoined.

ALL MEN ARE BORN FREE AND EQUAL!
TO THE COLORED CITIZENS OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF NEW YORK!

At a respectable and numerous meeting of the colored freeholders of this city, held at Wilberforce Hall, Mr. John Fort was called to the chair, and William Johnson was appointed secretary.

After the minutes of the previous meeting was read, Mr. Fort, the chairman, moved that the minutes be so amended as to read, "that the colored citizens of New York be earnestly requested to vote the

WHOLE WHIG TICKET

Nominated at Masonic Hall;" which, after considerable discussion, was adopted. It was then moved and adopted:

1. That WM. H. SEWARD, having, in his letter to the committee of Abolitionists, shown himself more friendly to the abolishment of all distinction, as far as regards COLOR, than the candidates of the Democratic party, we agree to give him our unanimous support.

2. That LUTHER BRADISH has shown himself the unqualified friend of human rights, and, in consequence, shall receive the votes of every colored citizen in this city.

3. That the Congress and Legislative ticket of the Whig party shall also receive our support.

The following gentlemen were then appointed a Vigilance Committee:

THADDEUS SILAY,	JOHN PIPER,
JOHN BONSER,	GEORGE DOUGLASS,
TERENCE SAMPLE,	HANNIBAL ALLEN,
JOHN BLAKE,	CATO SMITH,
PARKER DOWNING,	WM. JOHNSON,
CÆSAR MOTT,	JOHN SMITH.
ANTHONY MOORE,

JOHN FORD, President.

WM. JOHNSON, Secretary.

The Vigilance Committee will be in attendance at this place during the three days of the election. Our friends who were not at the meeting will please provide themselves with tickets by calling on the members of the Colored Whig Freeholders Vigilance Committee.

The following confidential circular was also sent to the Whig Abolitionists, by Arthur Tappan, previous to the New York elections in 1838.

DEAR SIR: Enclosed you have a list of the publications by this Society, to which you will please direct any of our Whig friends who may desire a knowledge of the truth. I am gratified that our Abolition friends are to be found on the Whig side rather than the Loco Focos; for the cause of the country and of humanity ought to go together. ☞IF WE CAN RIVET OURSELVES FIRMLY ON ONE OF THESE PARTIES, WE CAN GAIN OUR OBJECT. Be careful.

I am yours, etc. per Arthur Tappan.

Nov. 1, 1838. B. LEROY.

To P. W. WESLEY, jr.

In the House of Representatives of the New York Legislature, in 1839, the Whig party had a majority. They introduced a preamble and resolutions denouncing the resolutions of Mr. ATHERTON in the strongest terms; and they passed that body by a strict party vote—the Whigs voting for them, the Democrats against them. They went to the Senate, where the Democrats had a majority, and were referred to a committee, of which Col. Young, a leading Democrat, was chairman. He made an able and eloquent report upon the subject, accompanied with a resolution recommending their rejection, which report and resolution were concurred in—the Democrats voting unanimously in the affirmative, the Whigs in the negative.

MAINE.

In 1838, John Fairfield, then a member of Congress from Maine, was nominated as the Democratic candidate for Governor. Mr. Fairfield was one of that gallant band from the non-slaveholding States, who had nobly sustained and defended the constitutional rights of the South upon the question of slavery. He had voted for the resolutions of Mr. Patton, of Virginia, touching petitions for the abolition of slavery, and subsequently for those of Mr. ATHERTON, of New Hampshire, upon the same subject. A letter was addressed to him by a committee of an Abolition society, propounding several interrogatories, which were replied to by him in the same bold, honest, and straight forward manner, which had distinguished his course in Congress. He was, of course, denounced by them and the whole Whig party, without any exceptions, mainly and principally on account of his votes upon those resolutions, and his answer to the aforesaid interrogatories.

Mr. Edward Kent was the candidate of the Whig party. A letter, similar to that addressed to Mr. Fairfield, was sent to Mr. Kent by the same committee. His answer to it was such as to conciliate and command the support of the whole Anti-slavery Abolition party of Maine. In the course of his answer he took occasion to denounce, in the most violent manner, those who had voted in Congress for the resolutions of Mr. Patton.

The whole Federal press in Maine were particularly abusive of Mr. Fairfield for his votes in Congress against Abolition petitions; but he was triumphantly sustained and elected by the Democracy of that State, with a full understanding of his opinions upon the subject of Abolition.

At the last election in the State of New Hampshire, held in March, 1839, John Page was the Democratic candidate for Governor and James Wilson the Whig candidate. John Page was decidedly opposed to the Abolitionists, whilst James Wilson answered their interrogatories to their entire satisfaction, and was supported in their papers as the candidate of the Abolitionists. Mr. Page was elected by over six thousand majority.

The Democratic candidates for Congress at the same election, were all opposed to the Abolitionists, and most violently abused and denounced by the Abolition papers—and yet they were all elected by an average majority of about six thousand votes over the combined forces of Whigery and Abolitionism.

Extract from the letter of James Wilson in reply to the interrogatories of the Abolitionists.

Congress has, in my opinion, power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia and in the Territories; and the slave trade there and between the States. I am of opinion Congress ought, without delay, to exercise the power that body has over the subject.

Mr. Wilson was also a prominent member of the late Harrisburg Convention.

In August, 1838, the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] made a speech at Lancaster, in that State, in which he showed conclusively that Joseph Ritner, the Whig candidate for Governor, was an Abolitionist, and urged the friends to the Union to vote against him, and in favor of the Democratic candidate, David R. Porter. Standing, as Mr. BUCHANAN does, at the head of the Republican party of Pennsylvania, his opinions on the subject of Abolition, may be regarded as the opinions of his political friends; and on that account, I introduce a short extract from the speech referred to:

Should Joseph Ritner be elected, the people of Pennsylvania will have declared, in a voice of thunder, that Florida shall not be admitted into the Union, because it will be a slaveholding State; that the question of abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia, shall again and again be agitated to disturb the repose of the Union; and that the doctrines of Abolition, from which these are but emanations, shall be maintained, no matter what may be the fatal consequences. Whilst his election will be hailed as a victory by the Abolitionists everywhere, it will be felt to the extremities of the Union as a most portentous omen of its dissolution.

I have studiously avoided producing any proofs that Joseph Ritner is an Abolitionist, except from his own solemn message, the doctrines of which have been recently reiterated in his letter to the Anti-slavery Society of Pittsburg. It is true I might have cited the efforts made by his political friends to obtain the hall of the Legislature as a place of meeting for the Abolition Convention; the cordiality with which he received its members, and the spirit thus infused into them by his countenance and conversation; his preference for leading Abolitionists, in making some of his most important appointments; and numerous other circumstances, tending to establish the same fact. I have thought it best, however, to confine myself to his own official declarations. That he is sincerely an Abolitionist, I do not doubt; and he deserves the merit of firmly adhering to his opinion, which would have been a great virtue in a good cause.

I might here, also, proceed to illustrate the effects of the triumph of this doctrine. What would be your situation, fellow-citizens, if negroes were admitted to an equality of political and social rights with white men and white women? You have already had a foretaste of it, in the scenes which were exhibited at Pennsylvania Hall. The subject is too disgusting, and I recoil from it.

Go, then, to the polls, and by your votes in behalf of the Democratic candidate, David R. Porter, declare to your sister States, and to the world, that Pennsylvania will be again, as she had ever been before Governor Ritner's election, the strongest and firmest pillar of the Union.

In connection with Mr. BUCHANAN'S speech, I would call attention to the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted at a Democratic convention, held at Reading, Pennsylvania, Sept. 10, 1838, and composed of more than three thousand delegates. Where can the Whigs point to a resolution against abolition which has ever been passed in any of their conventions? I would add that Reading is in Berks county, the strongest Democratic county in the United States.

9. Resolved, That the constitutional obligations due by the non-slaveholding to the Southern States, imperiously require the most rigid abstinence from any and every interference with their domestic institutions; that the subject of emancipation belongs to the latter, and ought to be agitated but by themselves.

10. Resolved, That the agitation in the free States of the question of abolishing slavery, is an impertinent and wicked interference with the constitutional rights of our brethren of the South; that it is one which cannot by any possibility lead to good, and but too well calculated (and we fear intended) to work mischief; that we have yet to learn in what manner the slaveholding States have intermeddled with our affairs; and that, in forbearing to encroach upon theirs, we are exercising no spirit of forbearance which is entitled to peculiar commendation, but pursuing merely that line of strict duty, to which every consideration of propriety, of respect for the feelings of others, and of regard for the national character and the common welfare, calls on us to adhere.

11. Resolved, That the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, which forms the great present effort of the Abolitionists to accomplish, we believe to be regarded by them as an entering wedge, through whose instrumentality they hope to be enabled to strike, hereafter, more easily and effectually at the tranquillity of the Southern States, thereby leading to the horrors of civil and servile wars, the arraying of one section of this Confederacy in embittered hostility against the other, and the ultimate, inevitable, and ineffable wretchedness of disunion.

12. Resolved, That it would be highly inexpedient and dangerous to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, without the consent of Virginia and Maryland—inasmuch as it would but serve to convert the said District into a city of refuge, to which fugitive slaves would not fail to hasten in crowds, and holding out to them temptations to seek its sanctuary—and would also furnish a convenient central magazine, wherein the zealots and incendiaries of Abolition would establish themselves to perpetually annoy and distract the deliberations of Congress; to fire their trains upon the surrounding Confederacies; and hurl their firebrands with sure and terrible aim.

13. Resolved, That, supposing Congress to possess the right to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, its exercise would nevertheless be, so long as the institution exist in the Commonwealths of Virginia and Maryland, a gross and monstrous abuse of power, and a flagrant violation of the implied national faith: That the said District having been ceded to the nation by two slaveholding States, it must necessarily have been with the understanding that its people would be permitted to remain in the unmolested enjoyment of those rights of property which, as citizens of Virginia or Maryland, they would have retained.

14. Resolved, That the manly and patriotic stand taken by the President of the United States upon the question of Abolition, in his inaugural address; in which, after referring to his previous avowal that "he must go into the presidential chair the inflexible and uncompromising opponent of every attempt on the part of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, against the wishes of the slaveholding States; and, also, with a determination equally decided, to resist the slightest interference with it in the States where it exists;" he adds: that "no bill conflicting with these views can ever receive his constitutional sanction," commands our cordial and unqualified approbation.

15. Resolved, That as Pennsylvanians, we regret to be compelled to contrast with the bearing of President Van Buren, referred to in the preceding resolution, the temper and spirit of that distinguished local functionary who has not scorned to prostitute the influence of his high office to aid in fanning into a devouring flame the evil passions of the disciples of the Thompson and Garrison school; and who has stooped to vilely traduce the character of the glorious Keystone State, because her Senators and a majority of her Representatives in Congress would not "basely bow the knee" to the mad and dark designs of the Abolitionists.

16. Resolved, That it is deeply mortifying to the pride of every Pennsylvanian, having aught of regard for the honor, and jealous of the reputation, of the Commonwealth, that the leader of the Abolitionists, and head and front of their incendiary faction, should be the Governer of this State; that the evidences of his approval of, and adhesion to, the dangerous creed of that school have been too lavishly furnished, and are of too grossly odious a character, to permit the eleventh hour denials of his alarmed satellites to impose upon the intelligence of a justly incensed people.

On the 6th of July, 1838, the Democratic members of Congress issued an address to the people of the United States, in which they set forth their political principles. The part which relates to Abolition is in these words:

The subject of Abolition has assumed a character so formidable in its appearance, and so destructive in its tendencies, as to call for a brief exposition of our views.

The existing relation of master and slave between the two races inhabiting the Southern portion of the Union, existed when the Constitution was formed, and is recognised in the apportionment of members in the House of Representatives, as well as in the imposition of direct taxes, and the clause guarantying the delivery up of persons held to service or labor in one State and escaping into another.

It is manifest that the power over this subject is one of those not delegated to the General Government, and, of course, is one of the reserved powers; as such, it is under the entire control of the respective States, within whose limits the institution may exist, and within which neither this Government, nor that of the other States, nor their citizens, have any more right to interfere, directly or indirectly, than with the existence of slavery in Cuba, or any other foreign country.

From this it follows that any such interference on the part of this Government, would be without authority, and a manifest breach of the Constitution. It would, in truth, be more than a simple breach of that instrument; it would be destructive of the primary object for which the Government was instituted, which was to preserve and protect more effectually the domestic peace and tranquillity of the States, and their citizens.

It also follows, that such interference on the part of other States, or their citizens, would be in violation of the national compact, which they mutually pledged themselves to each other to preserve inviolate on entering into the Union.

It also follows, that the States, separately and individually, where slavery exists, are alone responsible for it, either for good or evil; and the impression that any other State or its citizens are responsible, in any way, for its existence, originates in the gross and mischievous Federal conception, that ours is a great national consolidated Government, where the whole is responsible for the parts, just as the States are for counties, instead of a Federal Republic, composed of sovereign and independent States, united together for their mutual advantage, tranquillity, and security.

Such, and so formidable, are the barriers against an interference with this dangerous subject, within the limits of the States. Nor will those against an interference by the General Government, in any manner, in this District, be found less formidable, when duly considered.

We hold, in the first place, that, to attempt to abolish slavery in this District, as an intermediate step to abolishing it in the States themselves, by this Government, or the non-slaveholding States, or their citizens, would be as clearly and manifestly liable to all the objections, in their full force, to which a direct attempt to abolish it in the States themselves would be. It is the motive and object intended, and not the means, that determine the character of the act. There is no code of morals which justifies the doing of that indirectly which is forbidden to be done directly. If it be unlawful to burn our neighbor's house, it would be equally unlawful to fire another, or even our own, with the intention of burning his. If there be a difference, the latter, by adding craft to guilt, is of a deeper die.

We also hold that, however may be the individual opinions of public men as to the character of the domestic institutions of the slaveholding States, they have no right, when acting in public stations under the Federal Government, by any of their acts, to discriminate between their institutions and those of the other States. It must be borne in mind that ours is a Federal Republic, as has been already stated, formed by sovereign and independent States, for their mutual security and happiness; and that they instituted this Government, and clothed it with powers to carry into effect these important objects. Such being the character and object of our system, it is clear that this Government can have no right whatever to give a preference to the institutions of one portion of the Union over those of another, or to use its power to abolish one or establish the other; and to do so, be the pretext what it may, would be directly subversive of the object for which it was established, by destroying that which it was intended to protect. Instead of preserving peace and tranquillity, it would become an instrument in the hands of the stronger portion of the Union, for assailing the institutions of the weaker, and engendering thereby the bitterest feelings of hostility, which, in the end, would destroy the Union itself.

Resting on these broad and incontrovertible principles, we hold it to be clear, beyond dispute, that Congress has no right to abolish slavery in this District, with a view of abolishing it in the States, or to exercise any of its powers with that intention. Nor do we deem it material, in coming to this conclusion, to inquire what is the extent of its powers over this District; be they what they may, they are all conferred for special purposes, to be exercised, like all such powers, in subordination to the known objects for which they were granted. To pervert them to any other purpose inconsistent with the object of the grant, would be a violation of the Constitution, not the less dangerous because not expressly forbidden.

Thus regarding the powers of the Government, it is sufficient to sustain the conclusion at which we have arrived—that the Government has no right to abolish or interfere with slavery in the States, or to use its powers to give a preference to the peculiar institutions of one portion of the Union over those of another; this admitted, and the conclusion follows as a matter of course. It is on this broad and deep foundation that we bottom the course which we think ought to be pursued by the Government on this agitating and dangerous question. Here and there only, can a stand be made to arrest its progress, give peace and quiet to the country, and permanency to the Union. If this be surrendered, on no other ground can a stand be made; and we call on all who love the country, and value peace, harmony, and union, to take their stand on it, regardless of all minor differences.

In addition to what we have said, we should remind our country of the plighted faith of this Government to the States of Virginia and Maryland, of the sacred rights of property possessed by the inhabitants of this District, when they were surrendered by these States to the protection of Congress. We would also ask an attentive consideration to that state of anarchy and confusion which must exist at the seat of the General Government, when this District shall become the receptacle of the fugitive slaves from all the neighboring States. Some of us have witnessed, and others have heard, with deep regret, the deteriorated condition of the slaves, produced by this disturbing question; and in the name of the Union, we ask our fellow-citizens to forbear its further agitation.

DEFERRED REMARKS.

IN SENATE, TUESDAY, JANUARY 4, 1840.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

The VICE PRESIDENT having announced as the special order the bill to provide for the collection, safe-keeping, and transfer of the public money,

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said: I rise, Mr. President, to make a suggestion to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance. The importance of this bill no one will contest; the great extent of its consequences no one can doubt. In addition to the occurrence in this body yesterday, (the resignation of Mr. WHITE) the Senate is now wanting five of its members. This, I believe, is without example in the history of this Government. Five legislative bodies have not elected and returned their members to this House. And we know enough to know that in no instance has it been the fault of the people, and in every instance it has been because the legislative bodies of the States, who were charged with the election of Senators, have been unable to agree as to the election of Senators. Of these States, three are among the most important in the Union, and one of them so important as to obtain the denomination of the Empire State, which last will send a Senator fresh from the people, and expressing the wishes of the people of that State, and we hope it will be so from the others who will send members here.

These, sir, are the facts; and the want of Senators from five of the States, the importance of the measure itself, the necessity of a full consultation, and the benefit to be derived from those counsels, those lights on the subject which are all-important to portions of this body, seem to recommend that the bill should not be considered at this time, even if we did not know that the other House is in a condition which imposes no necessity of action here on an important measure. If this bill should be passed to-morrow here, it would be weeks before it could be taken up in the other House. Taking all these circumstances into view, I trust that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance, and the Senate generally, will acquiesce in the postponement of this measure.

Sir, I am quite sure the Senator from New York must be most desirous that his colleague may be with him on this occasion, that he may have the aid and counsel of his colleague, coming as he does from the people which they both represent. I trust, therefore, he will not now press the consideration of this measure. There are three or four of the States which, there is a high degree of probability, will in eight or ten days have elected their Senators, and they will be on their way here. Indeed, that event to which I have alluded as likely to give great pleasure to the chairman of the committee, will doubtless take place this week, or early in the next. At all events, I hope I shall have the concurrence of the chairman and of others in the suggestion, for I will not now make the motion, that the consideration of this bill be postponed to Monday week.

Mr. WRIGHT said he had no personal desire to press the action of the Senate on this bill; and, if at liberty to consult his own inclinations in this matter, his course would probably be what the Senator from Kentucky had so kindly intimated it ought to be. As a member of the committee which had reported the bill, his action on it was already discharged. He must, in candor, say to the Senator, he could make no motion to postpone, nor was he at liberty to vote in favor of any postponement. It was for the Senate to determine, in accordance with what they deemed to be their duty, on the course to be pursued in relation to the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky. This is the fourth session of the Senate, stated and special, since this measure was presented here; and I cannot forget, that, though it had twice passed this body, it had failed to receive, practically, any consideration in the other branch of the Legislature. That body at present, from peculiar circumstances, is a full month behind its usual advancement in legislative business. As to the vacancies in the Senate alluded to, he had not calculated the number of the friends or opponents of the measure, but from the Senator's own enumeration, he thought there would be little change in their comparative strength, if the vacancies were all filled. In three days he was induced to believe, he would have the consolation—and he hoped he might be permitted to say to the Senator that it would be a consolation—of having a colleague on this floor, who would, doubtless, intend to represent truly the views and wishes of their common constituents on this measure. The final action of the Senate on the bill would not be had until after his arrival. Mr. W. said, that under instructions from the committee, when the bill was reported, he had given notice that he would call it up yesterday. Why it was not then taken up, is well known to the Senate. Whether they will now call it up rests with Senators to determine.

Mr. CLAY. It gives me great pleasure to bear testimony to the fairness of the course of the chairman of the committee, and it is every way worthy of him, and highly reputable to him as chairman of the Committee on Finance. I now understand him to say that, without the possibility of his concurring in the postponement, he now submits it to the Senate, as suggested by me, and he adds nothing that can seriously oppose the proposition for delay. Five of the States, and three of them most important, are now unrepresented here, and this fact is unprecedented, as far as my knowledge extends in the history of the country. It is very true, as the Senator says, that this bill has not been fully discussed; and it is very true, also, as stated by him, that the usual business of Congress is back by one month. Still the considerations remain which I first brought up; and no urgency here can accelerate the movement of the bill in the other House.

And while I am up, I will make another suggestion. In the course of two years past there has been a reversal—a change—a very great change—and not an unimportant one, as it respects the origination of important measures. Prior to that time all such measures originated in the House of the people, and they ought to do so, for the election of that House by the people ought to be a restriction on us, and we ought to aim at augmenting and strengthening the power of that body, and that peculiar power which belongs to the people, or ought to belong to them, and would, if the Government were duly administered, of guarding the public Treasury. We ought, I think, to see the propriety of such bills originating with them. But if we now delay the consideration of this measure, I believe it will be for the benefit of the whole States, five of whom are now not fully represented; and I trust the Senate, to whom the chairman of the committee has, with so much propriety, referred the question, will concur in the motion which I now make, though only suggested before, that the consideration of this bill be postponed till Monday week. I am happy that the chairman of the committee will enjoy the company of his colleague earlier than I anticipated, and I hope the two other great States will be represented on this floor, and the Senator from Michigan may be here before passing the bill, if it should be postponed till that time.

I have one remark in reply to the honorable chairman. It is not essential only that his colleague, as well as other Senators, should be here simply to record his yea or nay on the passage of the bill, but he ought to be here during the whole discussion and the consideration of the amendments. In this, I trust, the Senate will concur with me.

Mr. WRIGHT said he had nothing more to say in reference to the time when the bill is to be brought under consideration. But he would reply to one remark of the honorable Senator in reference to the introduction of the bill into this body. I am bound to say that I concur fully with him in the change, the great change, which has taken place in the last ten years in the legislation of the two Houses of Congress, and I agree with him that this change is to be regretted. But he did not think that the Committees on Finance were responsible for the innovation. This is not even an appropriation bill. There is a small appropriation for carrying it into effect, but not touching in any way the raising of revenue. But, at the first session I was here, and it was a short session, two most important bills were passed, one for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, and the other the so-called compromise bill; one of them with an appriation most important, and the other came at least very close on a bill to raise revenue. Both these bills were introduced here by the Senator from Kentucky, and I believe that was one great step to the change of which he complains. I do not say this in the way of censure, but to defend the committee from the charge of originating the innovation alluded to. The circumstances in which the other branch were at present, and the course which had prevailed for some years past, were, in his estimation, a sufficient justification of the committee for departing from this rule.

Mr. CLAY. In the first place, the honorable chairman is inaccurate, though he did not intend it, in regard to the character of this bill. If I am not mistaken, the first section of it makes an appropriation to an indefinite amount.

Mr. WRIGHT. There are two or three small appropriations to carry the bill into effect.

Mr. CLAY. But I am extremely indebted to him for this opportunity to show the origin of those two measures, so important to the country—the land bill and the compromisee bill. Sir, how did that land bill originate? Has the Senator forgotten how it was thrown upon a committee, and the motives under which it was thrown—on a committee of which I was a member?

Mr. WRIGHT. That was before I was here.

Mr. CLAY. The history of it was this: The Committee on Manufactures, in which interest I now take, and have ever taken, a most lively concern, was raised; and some gentlemen entertained the extraordinary notion that the sale of the public domain was a tax, and, being so, was a subject appropriate to the Committee on Manufactures, and should be referred to that committee. Against this I expostulated, protested, and implored that they would not send it to that committee, of which I was a member. And what was the result? The political friends of the honorable chairman, uniting to a man, and apparently with a view to my personal embarrassment, threw the subject on the Committee on Manufactures. I then said, gentlemen, since you have thrown this matter upon me, I will off coat and go to work; and so I did; and the bill to distribute the proceeds of the public lands was the result. That was not a measure voluntarily assumed, and it was not in violation of that spirit of the Constitution which I am happy to find the Senator regards as myself. The measure was thrown, literally forced upon me, and it was passed by this House, and by a majority of more than two thirds of the other House, sent to the President, and (said Mr. C. striking repeatedly and emphatically on his pocket) you know what became of it afterwards.

In regard to the other, the compromise bill, look at the state of the country at that time. A civil war was then threatening the country, and every measure had failed of accommodating the unhappy difficulty in which it was involved. The House of Representatives was at a stand, in a perfect balk, incapable of motion. In that state of things I proposed the compromise bill. But was it a revenue bill? Was it to raise or augment the tariff? No; but to reduce, to cut it down. But I waive this point. A majority of the Senate decided that it was not a revenue bill, such as must originate in the other House. But to trace that bill in its progress and final passage, while we were disputing it here, the House brought it up as an original bill on their part, in its very words, passed it by acclamation, and when I first heard of it I was here upon my feet. It was then concurred in by the Senate, approved by the President, and became a law of the land. Such is the simple history of the land bill and compromise bill, and if the Senator can make any thing out of it affecting the argument or course which I now adopt, he is welcome to the whole benefit.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Senator seems to consider what I said as a matter of charge against him.

Mr. CLAY. Not at all.

Mr. WRIGHT. I spoke of these things as matters of reference, and though they refer to the other body of Congress, the only time that I was ever called to order in my life was by the Senator from Kentucky for referring to that body. If it is now proper so to refer to it, the Senator will agree with me that in its business progress it was never more effectually tied up than now.

Mr. WALKER said it was, he believed, at least so far as his experience was concerned, the first time that the Senate was asked to postpone the consideration of an important measure, because some five Senators are not present, in consequence of the failure of certain State Legislatures to discharge their constitutional duties by filling every vacancy in this body. The motion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] was to postpone the consideration of this bill till Monday week. Now, if the object of every Senator, was to have the presence and aid of every Senator, in commencing the consideration of this bill. This could not be effected by the motion of that Senator. The venerable Senator from Tennessee [Judge WHITE] had resigned but yesterday, and it was impossible that this vacancy could be filled, and his successor be here on Monday week. But why postpone the consideration of this bill? The consideration of the bill involves no vote upon it; and if it be considered proper to postpone a final vote here, to await the contingent and uncertain action of several States in filling every vacancy, this motion can be made at a future period, and constitutes no reason why we should not now consider and discuss the measure. But, sir, why delay our action here, because every vacancy in this body is not now filled? Two, at least, of the States, unrepresented in part on this floor, had declared in favor of the present measure; and no delay to discharge our duties would change the final vote, nor was it pretended that any such result would follow. Was it not known that not only a majority, but two-thirds, of the States of this Union, had, at their most recent elections, declared in favor of this measure, and that it will be adopted here, if the will of the people of the several States is respected, whether the vacant seats be filled or not? But the Senator from Kentucky objects to the origination of this and other important measures respecting the public revenue in this body, as a violation of the spirit of the Constitution, and an innovation upon ancient usages, and that such measures formerly originated in the House of the people, as it is called by that Senator. But why the House of the people, more than this body? Does that House more truly represent the will of the people of the several States, in that most important attitude, as confederated, coequal, and sovereign States? Was that most important State Rights feature of the Constitution to be disregarded, and are we to sit here, refusing to perform our constitutional duties, refusing to introduce here important measures, because they have not originated in the House? The Constitution makes it our right, and therefore our duty, to originate all measures here except bills to tax the people by raising a revenue. This is not alleged to be such a bill. It is not alleged that the Constitution forbids its introduction here; but that, as an important measure, it is an innovation upon former usages to introduce it in this body. Sir, if this be an innovation upon former usages, Mr. W. rejoiced that such innovation had been made, and that the States, as States and sovereignties, through their representatives on this floor, had asserted all their rights, had maintained the confederate principle of the Constitution, and originated all measures, however important, in this body, the origination of which here was not prohibited by that instrument. If any Senator felt disposed to abandon the constitutional rights of the States, by refusing or delaying to originate important measures in this body, Mr. W. was not disposed to follow any such pernicious example, or to consolidate more power in the other House than had been delegated by the Constitution. It had been truly stated, however, that the Senator from Kentucky had himself introduced important bills in this body, and bills deeply affecting the public revenue, namely, the land bill, and the tariff bill. But the Senator says, the land bill was forced upon him by a vote of the Senate, on the reference of the question to the Committee on Manufactures. But if it be a violation of the spirit of the Constitution to introduce important measures in this body, why did not the Senator leave this violation of the Constitution to some other member of the Committee on Manufactures, or why violate the spirit of the Constitution, either voluntarily, or by the compulsory instructions of other Senators? But this vote of the Senate in 1832, would not excuse the subsequent action of the Senator from Kentucky in regard to this land bill. Did not we all know—did not the journals of the Senate prove that the Senator from Kentucky had voluntarily, and without any vote or action upon the subject in either House, introduced and originated this very land bill, not at one session only, but for the last six years in this body? If, then, the Senator had done wrong in 1832, why had the Senator from Kentucky repeated that wrong, by introducing and originating that measure here for the last six years? And was not that land bill a most important measure? Did it not materially affect the public revenues? Was it not an appropriation bill? Yes; the largest appropriation bill ever proposed in this House, or in this country. By the official returns of the Secretary of the Treasury, now on the files of the Senate, this land bill of the Senator from Kentucky appropriated fifty-seven millions of dollars of the public revenue for distribution among the States; and, although not a tariff or tax bill in name, it was so in fact; for if a distribution of twenty-seven millions, already made under the deposite act, had involved the country in a debt not yet extinguished, the distribution of thirty millions more, as proposed in the land bill of the Senator from Kentucky, must have created a national debt, now due, of thirty millions, and rendered inevitable an augmentation of taxation and the tariff. It was, in fact, a tariff bill in disguise; and yet, for the last six years, the Senator from Kentucky had, at every session, voluntarily introduced into this body this important measure, involving so vitally the great interests of the country, appropriating in one bill fifty-seven millions of money, creating a vast national debt, and rendering an augmented tariff inevitable; and, as regards the tariff, the compromise act of 1833, originated by the Senator from Kentucky in this body, was not that a most important measure? did it not impose new duties on imports? did it not raise a revenue from the people? and if so, could it be introduced here? and was it any answer to the objection, that in some cases, but not in all, it reduced the duties? Reduced duties, by creating increased imports, might actually augment the revenue; and if so, was it constitutional to originate that measure in this body? Yet all this had been done by the Senator from Kentucky; and yet, now he would have no important measure, however constitutional its introduction, originated in this body; but we must wait the action of that other House, so lately denounced by the Senator from Kentucky as a servile body. Mr. W. never had, or would, denounce that House as a servile body, but yet he did not believe that there was any thing in their organization or superior wisdom, or greater despatch of the public business, that should induce us to refuse to introduce here all measures, however important, that could constitutionally originate in this body.

The question was now put on Mr. CLAY's motion to postpone the bill to Monday week, and decided in the negative by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell's, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Merrick, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, and White of Indiana—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Reane, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—26.

REMARKS OF MR. BUTLER,
OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, January 21, 1840—On the resolution of Mr. WADDY THOMPSON to amend the rules relative to the reception and disposal of Abolition petitions.

Mr. BUTLER, of South Carolina, rose and said:

Mr. SPEAKER: It has not been the habit of Southern members, and particularly from South Carolina, to discuss the subject now before the House. Nor, sir, do I intend, on the present occasion, to discuss the constitutional right to hold slaves, the moral influence of slavery, or its expediency. No Southern man will ever condescend to debate these questions on this floor, and if they are forced upon us, another field must be the arena of discussion. We do not fear the issue of such a discussion before an honest and enlightened world. We could show that slavery was coeval almost with the existence of the human race; that it was fully recognised under the Old and New Testament dispensations; and that to us it is a political blessing, instead of an evil. But, sir, no one has a right to coerce us into these matters, and no power on earth shall move us from our position. We cannot, however, sit tamely by and see these constant, repeated, and ceaseless attacks upon our institutions, and insults upon our characters, without feeling indignant and excited. It is to repel charges thus reiterated that I rise.

It has been alleged against the South that we are sectional in our prejudices, and slaves to local opinion. This allegation comes with with a bad grace from those who are bound down by prejudices, the most wilfully blind and pernicious. Slaves to local opinion! What, sir, could induce members of Congress, gentlemen of intelligence and character, to present Abolition petitions to this House, and demand their reference to a committee, but being slaves to local opinion? What but this could influence the course which Northern gentlemen take, in irritating the South, without profit to any section of this Confederacy? So far as I am individually concerned, I have always endeavored to allay sectional prejudices, and to look upon this Union as one great family of brethren. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GRANGER] asks why we of the South are now so excited at the presentment of Abolition petitions, when history proves that they have been presented for the last twenty-five years. He, sir, has furnished us with an answer. Abolition petitions, until within the last half dozen years, were confined to a few ignorant, weak, and misguided fanatics; but now they have wealth, political and local influence, talents, well organized and increasing societies, and numerous presses, devoted to their cause. Their baneful influence is felt and exercised every where in the free States, and political parties dread their opposition and court their favor. Members here cower before this local feeling; and, what is still worse, avowed Abolitionists are, on this floor, the advocates and eulogists of these fanatic incendiaries. Can it be thought wonderful, under these painful reflections, that the South should be deeply agitated? We should be less than men, if we could fold our arms, and patiently submit to these indignities. But, sir, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRANGER] says that the South seems to forget that other portions of this Union are to be heard and respected here. The South claims no such distinction, and how, let me ask, stands the case? When a protective tariff is to be imposed, onerous and unjust in its operations, who reaps the benefit? The North. When canals are to be opened, harbors surveyed and improved, roads to be built, and any other extravagant appropriations, for internal improvements, who share the "spoils?" The North. When a great National Bank is to be chartered, with capital and power sufficient to control all other banking institutions in the country, where is it to be located? In the North. National legislation has always been partial to the North, and although the South has deeply felt the injustice of it, she has sought for no selfish protection; the only protection she demands, is to be let alone in the management of her local concerns. It is said that we are ultra, upon the subject of these petitions, because we fear the effect it would have have upon our elections at home. This is a mistake; we stand upon higher ground than such pitiful considerations. We are defending our constitutional and unalienable rights; we are battling for the security of our firesides, and the sanctity of our domestic regulations; and, sir, let me tell gentlemen, for one, that if the course which they advise would put a stop to incendiary petitions, I would freely become the victim, if my constituents demanded a sacrifice. God forbid that for so ignoble a purpose, a single man could be found so base as not to render himself a willing sacrifice on the altar of his country. We are told, sir, that our course is ministering to the wishes of the Abolitionists, and our true policy would be to unite with Northern gentlemen in referring these petitions to a committee, and that a calm and temperate report would arrest the evil of which we complain. How plausible is this argument, yet how delusive and untrue. If such would be the result now, why has it not had that effect heretofore? In 1829 these petitions were referred to a committee, and a report was made against the prayer of the petitioners. Again, in 1836, they were referred, and Mr. Pinckney, chairman of that committee, made an able and lengthy report. Did this stop the evil—did it retard it for a moment? On the contrary, your table has, from that period, literally groaned under the weight of Abolition memorials, from men, women, and children. Sir, the movement which that gentleman made on that occasion (I do not impeach his motives) was unwise and impolitic, to say the least of it, and the irreparable mischief which followed, I fear, is not speedily to be cured. It opened the doors of this Hall to Abolitionists, and invited them to come in and prosecute their unhallowed purposes, and well have they improved the opportunities thus afforded them. Think you, sir, in the face of these facts, that any Southern member can be found on this floor, or elsewhere, so utterly regardless of his own interest, and so forgetful of his duty to his constituents, as again to be caught aiding and abetting the worst enemies of his country? Why, sir, no man here can believe that reception, reference, report, and all, would satisfy and quell the movements of men goaded on by a fierce and fanatical resolution to accomplish their ends or rend the Union asunder. They have the sagacity to see that they have advanced a step, at an early stage of their operations, much beyond their most sanguine expectations; and nothing, no, sir, nothing can now arrest their onward course but the adoption of some such rule as the resolution before you proposes. Pass that, sir, and you give us quiet and an assurance that you really mean to uphold our constitutional rights; reject it, and you prove to us that upon ourselves alone depends protection.

The "sacred right of petition" is said to be involved, and gentleman cannot come up to our proposition because their people will not sustain them. No one wishes to invade the right of petition; but do not, under color of this right, send memorials here of and about things in which the petitioners have no interest. I grant, sir, that all and every citizen of this country have a right to be heard here, by petition, upon such matters as immediately pertain to themselves; but does it follow that they are officiously and offensively to thrust themselves into other people's concerns, totally distinct and unconnected with them? Are we to be told, because the right of petition is guarantied by the Constitution, that citizens in the Northern States are authorized to petition Congress for the redress of imaginary grievances under which their Southern neighbors are laboring? Shall other portions of this Union impudently and arrogantly assume to themselves the duty of enlightening us upon subjects in which we are alone interested? Shall they become our kind guardians, and point out to this Legislature the blindness, the evils, and turpitude incident, as they allege, to our situation? If upon ordinary subjects, and there was no other objection, the very impudence of the thing would excite our indignation and contempt. But, sir, when we see systematic and ceaseless attacks made upon our institutions, our property, and our security, from those who have no earthly interest in the matter, we can but feel it as an outrage. Suppose the South was to imitate the North in this abominable crusade, organize societies, send out missionaries, erect presses, and load your table with petitions, to hang all Abolitionists, to pass laws compelling the free white and free black of the North to intermarry, or to do any thing else equally wrong and improper, and in what did not immediately affect us—would all this be tolerated by Northern gentlemen in their zeal to support the constitutional and sacred right of petition? Would such petitions be received, considered, referred to committees, and treated as in ordinary cases? I apprehend not; "circumstances would alter cases" with gentlemen, and those who are now so vociferous for this right would say to us, as we now say to them, these petitions ought not to be received. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. SLADE] has broadly admitted that Congress has the right to reject petitions of a mischievous tendency. Well, sir, this is conceding all I contend for. And is there no mischievous tendency in Abolition petitions? If to break down the barriers of constitutional rights, to produce discord and division in this nation, and ultimately to dissolve the Union, can give them that character, so they are to be regarded. That gentleman, as well as every intelligent man must see, from the unanimous feeling of the South, that such is their inevitable tendency; and if he has any regard for consistency, I would ask him, Abolitionist as he is, to pause before he goes farther.

I regret, sir, that gentlemen have thought it necessary, in this discussion, to offer highly wrought eulogiums upon Abolitionists. It is a melancholy proof to me that their mad and ferocious projects are more formidable than persons are willing to admit. Their presses teem with the grossest and foulest slanders upon Southern slaveholders, and they openly avow their intention to be immediate and uncompromising emancipation. Scarcely a mail comes from the North that does not bear me some of these vile publications, filled with the most barefaced and reckless falsehoods. Pictorial representations of cruel and unheard of punishments, are paraded in their sheets with all the apparent sanctity and semblance of truth. The slaveholder is denounced, both in body and soul, as the cursed of God. In fact, no lie is too enormous, no falsehood too flagrant for these publications to disseminate. Without descending to the disgusting details of these sinks of pollution, falsehood, and slander, I demand to know how it is, that gentlemen can rise in their places, and in the face of this nation become the apologists and panegyrists of such vile calumniators and incendiaries. The answer is too readily found in that slavish, local opinion and sectional prejudice, so much deprecated by gentlemen in theory, and so little observed in practice.

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. SLADE] is the especial advocate of Abolitionists, and, I suppose, is to be regarded as the exponent of their views on this floor. He has taken great pains to inform us that these people are the wisest and best Christians in all the land; that they are mild and harmless, and do not mean, just now, to abolish slavery any where but in the District of Columbia. I suppose we of the South ought to be grateful for this extreme act of mercy. But, sir, whom am I to believe, the gentleman or his compeers, in this officious, audacious, intermeddling in the affairs of other people's business? Their newspapers and other publications call for immediate and total emancipation, and denounce any of their tribe who do not go with them. That gentleman himself contended that the inevitable tendency of things was to this consummation. Who does not see through the flimsy guise, which is attempted to be thrown around their real designs? They have been permitted to come into this Hall, and have been heard; and as an entering wedge to all their schemes, they first desire to operate upon the institution of slavery in the District of Columbia, under the belief that it would be the prelude of their grand entry into the Territories and States of the Union. The first may be attained, though I do not believe it; the latter never, so long as a free white man lives in the South. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. SLADE] manifested great sympathy for his black brethren. Let me ask him if his benevolence is so limited as to be confined to this class alone? Has he any peculiar ties to that race, that would make him forget the direful calamities which may and will grow out of the movements of Abolitionists, if not arrested by the good sense of the country? While his pity is so ardent for one race, let me beg him to extend his kindness to another portion of the human family, whose skins, although not black, are nevertheless entitled to a portion of philanthropy so comprehensive as his. If the gentleman cannot find sufficient subjects for his tears in this slaveholding vicinity, I would advise him to make a pilgrimage to the Northern cities, and visit the haunts of the miserable, squalid, and starving free blacks, which are to be found every where there, that he may shed tears to his hearts content.

Mr. Speaker, the true issue has not been presented to this House and to this nation. The true question is not, whether the right of petition has been infringed; but whether the Union shall be preserved or dissolved, and I earnestly entreat the honest and honorable of all parties to go home and tell their constituents, that the real issue made now is one of Union or disunion. Tell them, that the South, though justly excitable on this subject, is long "forbearing and suffering." Tell them, if slavery is an evil, upon us rests the consequences; if there be guilt in it, on us is the responsibility. Assure them that the whole South firmly believe that it is a political blessing, and with this consciousness resting upon us, a new and craven generation must arise, and fill our places, before emancipation can be effected. Let them know that the South will become one great cemetery of freemen, and the abode of slaves only, before their designs can be accomplished. The South, sir, loves and values the Union, and she cannot forget, in a brief half century, that common toils, and common dangers, secured to us all, this great and glorious Republic. We cannot so easily tear from our memories, that our blood commingled in our Revolutionary struggle, and that the bones of our ancestors repose together on the fields of Eutaw, Yorktown, and Camden. Sir, we should deplore, as the greatest calamity, the sad and awful necessity which should render a separation of necessity; but rather than yield our dearest rights and privileges, we would see the Union scattered to the winds, and hold those who are now are brethren "enemies in war, in peace friends."

I have thus, Mr. Speaker, discharged a disagreeable duty; I have endeavored to do so in fairness and honesty, and while I am on this floor, I will recur to another subject, upon which South Carolina Nullifiers have been so often taunted. It has been asked of the small party with whom I act, how we could support the measures of an Administration, that, some years ago, hurled denunciation against us.

Sir, I do not, according to the fashion of the day, undertake to "define my position." I shall let my position define itself by my acts; but I have not the slightest objection to answer these repeated queries. In former days the present Chief Magistrate may have dealt some hard blows on the heads of the Nullifiers, but he gave us no blow which was not returned with interest. Our quarrel of that day is over, and the occasion which gave rise to the excitement has passed away, and we find ourselves still a part of this great Confederacy. We are in the National Legislature, where there are two great parties—the Democrats and Whigs. If we vote at all, we are compelled to take sides with one of these two great divisions; and we are so unsophisticated in the ways of the world as really to believe we ought to act with those who sustain us, and maintain our doctrines upon national subjects. Is there any thing unaccountable in this? The Democratic party, with the President, are opposed to protective tariffs; so are we: they are inimical to splendid schemes of internal improvements by the General Government; that is our doctrine: they are in favor of, and advocate a total separation of the finances of the Government from the control and direction of banks; they are opposed to a United States Bank; and last, though not least, they are opposed, and give us practical proof of their opposition, to the whole project of Abolition. These are our views and opinions; and shall we desert them because we find others maintaining them? No, sir, we support any party that is politically right. We are not, nor do we intend to become the partisans of the Administration, to be led and driven as party hacks; we shall act as our judgment dictates, although we do support its leading measures. Sir, if we had felt doubts as to the propriety and correctness of our course, when we first assembled here, they would have been dispelled by the events of the Harrisburg Convention. We believe the nomination of Gen. Harrison was effected by a combination of Abolitionists, and other factions, of which the first was predominant; for how otherwise could the pre-eminent claims of the gifted, and, I will add, patriotic Senator from Kentucky be set aside for one so far below him in all the qualifications for the Presidential office.

Mr. Van Buren had declared to the world, in terms which admit of no doubtful construction, that Congress had no constitutional right to touch slavery in the States, and that we believed it highly inexpedient to interfere with that subject in the District of Columbia, and boldly assumed the ground that he would resist, by his veto, such attempts, under as strong a sense of obligation as if such a clause was in the Constitution. He was no "non-committal" on that occasion, and, if words are capable of conveying any definite meaning, he has said all that the South could reasonably expect from a Northern President. His declarations have exposed him to the wrath and fury of Abolitionists from that day to this, and will continue to do so. Is there an Abolitionist on this floor that is so fiercely opposed to him? Is there one any where? The Democratic party throughout the Union, so far as I know, assume the same ground. In proof of what I say, I beg leave to read an extract from a paper which I hold in my hand. It is part of the proceedings of a great Democratic convention, held at Columbus, Ohio, on the eighth of this month, said to consist of at least three thousand persons.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this convention, Congress ought not, without the consent of the people of the District, and of the States of Virginia and Maryland, to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia; and that the efforts now making for that purpose, by organized societies in the free States, are hostile to the spirit of the Constitution, and destructive to the harmony of the Union.

Resolved, That slavery, being a domestic institution, recognised by the Constitution of the United States, we, as citizens of a free State, have no right to interfere with it, and that the organising of societies and associations in free States, in opposition to the institutions of sister States, while productive of no good, may be the cause of much mischief; and while such associations, for political purposes, ought to be discountenanced by every lover of peace and concord, no sound Democrat will have part or lot with them.

Resolved, That should there be any members of this convention who do not subscribe to the principles contained in those resolutions relating to the subject of Abolition, they be hereby requested to leave their names with the publishing committee, to be published with the proceedings of this convention.

Now, Sir, here is sound, correct; patriotic doctrine, emanating from an assemblage in Ohio representing every county in the State. Their resolutions go to the full extent, that any Southern man could or would ask; and I am authorized to say, not one man of that vast assembly dissented from these glorious and noble resolutions. They deserve, and will receive, the thanks of the whole country, for this timely and decisive movement upon a subject of such paramount importance and interest. Here are, also, two resolutions, passed by the Democratic Legislature of Ohio, on the fourteenth of this month, which I also beg leave to read to the House.

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That the subject of slavery, as it exists in particular portions of the United States, was settled and adjusted at the formation of the Federal Constitution.

Resolved, That in the opinion of this General Assembly, the interference of citizens of our State in the internal regulations of another, is highly censurable and improper, and that we view the unlawful, unwise, and unconstitutional interference of the fanatical Abolitionists of the North, with the domestic institutions of the Southern States, as highly criminal, and that it is the duty, obligatory on all good citizens, to discountenance the Abolitionists in their mad, fanatical and revolutionary schemes.

Such are the indications manifesting themselves in the Democratic party of the non-slaveholding States, and I sincerely wish I could see such manifestations from the Whigs in the same quarter.

The nominee of the Harrisburg Convention, however distinguished as a soldier, and entitled, as I willingly admit he is, to the gratitude of the country for his military and civil services, has given no such pledges, nor do I think he will. As late as 1833, he held this language:

Should I be asked, is there no way by which the General Government can aid the cause of emancipation, I answer, it has been an object near my hear, to see the whole surplus revenue appropriated to that object. With the sanction of the States holding slaves, there appears to me to be no constitutional objections to its being thus applied; embracing not only the colonization of those that may be otherwise freed, but the purchase of the freedom of others. By a zealous prosecution of a plan, founded upon that basis, we might look forward to a day, not far distant, when a North American sun would not look down upon a slave.

Are these views and opinions favorable to the constitutional rights of the South? Have they ever been repudiated or explained by their author? I know, in his Vincennes speech, he does maintain that Congress has no constitutional right to touch slavery in the States, but that does not go far enough, particularly under the suspicious circumstances of his nomination. If this distinguished individual is really disposed to resist all attempts of Abolition, any where in this Union, I should be unaffectedly rejoiced to hear it. It is matter of history that, on the eve of the last Presidential election, public calls were made upon General Harrison, touching this very subject, and he refused, or, at least, neglected, to set the public sentiment at rest. Why, sir, is it not known to every body, that Abolition papers did claim his nomination, over Mr. Clay, as a triumph of anti-slavery feeling? I cannot tell what amount, or kind of testimony, gentlemen require to establish a proposition, but adding all these facts together, I draw the conclusion that General Harrison is the favorite candidate of the Abolitionists, and, if so, this ought to deter every consistent State Rights man of the South from supporting him. I repeat my desire to do him justice; for I wish to see no man seeking the highest office in our Republic who would, for a moment, countenance the schemes of those who are plotting the dismemberment of the Union.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—Subsequently to the delivery of these remarks, a resolution has passed the House by a vote of 114 to 108, which conclusively demonstrates the correctnes of the positions assumed in the above remarks.

ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS.

IN SENATE,
FRIDAY, January 31, 1840.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Select Committee, to which was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. BENTON, and the resolution submitted by Mr. LUMPKIN, on the subject of the assumption of the debts of the States by the Federal Government, made a report thereon, which was read.

A motion was then made to print the usual number of copies for the use of the Senate, which having been opposed by Messrs. CRITTENDEN, PRESTON, and SOUTHARD—

Mr. GRUNDY remarked that he could neither be persuaded nor provoked to go into a discussion of the merits of the report, upon a mere motion to print. The object of the present motion is to have the report printed, and laid upon the table of each member, that he might examine it, and be enabled to act upon the subject understadingly. Instead of adopting this course, which was the usual one, gentlemen had thought proper to assail the report, which it was impossible for them to understand by hearing it read at the Clerk's table. If his suggestion had prevailed, then the knowledge of the contents of the report would precede the discussion, and Senators would not run the risk of ascribing to the report matters not contained in it. His purpose was not to go into an argument in support of the report; he would only reply to a few of the remarks which had been made in opposition to it. He intended, at the proper time, to give his views at large on the whole subject. He might profit (said Mr. G.) by some of the kind advice volunteered by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] but a portion of it he could not adopt. That Senator had taken exception to the report because we did not, when speaking of the State debts, also state the means of payment possessed by the different States. Mr. G. said he could not engage in the business of taking an inventory of the effects of a sovereign State of this Union, for the purpose of showing its ability to discharge the liabilities it had incurred. So far from this, whenever one of the United States had given a bond or obligation for the payment of money, he looked no farther; he took it for granted the money would be paid; and if Senators would look into the report, they would see that no idea is conveyed to the prejudice of the credit of any State; so far from it, neither the ability nor willingness to discharge their bonds is questioned in the slightest degree. Still gentlemen insist that the report will weaken the credit of the States, and depreciate their bonds. The credit of the States cannot be weakened by a declaration, by this body, that the General Government will not assume the payment of these bonds. If the credit of the States can be affected by such a measure, it was of a much weaker texture than he had supposed. For his own part, he considered the credit of the States as standing on a firmer basis. It has been stated by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] that the report does injustice to some of the States in this; that a large aggregate amount of debt is stated, and the amount of the indebtedness of each State is not specified. This shows that the course gentlemen are pursuing is erroneous. If the report was printed, such mistakes could not be committed; there is no aggregate amount of debt stated; it is spoken of as a very large debt; but no sum is named. It is true, in the original report, the debt was supposed to be about two hundred millions of dollars; but a question arising upon the propriety of considering certain contingent liabilities, as constituting a debt against a State, the committee, upon a revision of the report, struck it out, and have assigned their reasons why no precise amount can be stated. They say that the bonds issued by the States have not all been sold; a part have been hypothecated for partial advances on them, and others are now in the foreign markets.

He presumed no one would say that the aggregate of the debts of the States would not constitute a very large debt; he at least thought so, and the committee so considered it; but be the debts large or small, it did not affect the principles or argument contained in the report. Why is the printing of the report objected to? If there be errors in it, there is intelligence sufficient in the community to detect and expose them; and the authors of these errors, if they exist, will suffer in public estimation. He was willing to abide this test. There is the report; let it go forth among the people; let them see it and judge of it for themselves, and let not their opinions be formed of it, from mistaken representations made of it here. Gentlemen need not deceive themselves; this report would be published, and read with more avidity, on account of the efforts made to suppress it and prevent its publicity.

It is charged on the committee that they have gone beyond their duty, because the matters reported on were not properly before them, no application having been made to this body for an assumption of the State debts. The committee, said Mr. G. have acted under the authority and order of this body; they were directed, by the reference of the resolutions of the Senators from Missouri and Georgia, to investigate every subject embraced in the report; both the assumption of the State debts, and the distribution of the revenues arising from the public lands. Nor would the committee have discharged its duty to the Senate, had they omitted to do so.

Entertaining the opinions he did, he did not choose to stop at a vindication of the committee. He thought the whole proceeding was a proper one. Wise men would see danger at a distance and provide against it; and he considered this measure, when introduced by the Senator from Missouri, of that description. He viewed it as a judicious precautionary step, calculated to guard against great impending danger. Should public men, whose duty it is to give warning to their countrymen of every movement injurious to their interest, wait until they are encompassed and hedged in, so that the power of resistance is lost? When the schemes of their adversaries are matured, then resistance will be unavailing. He was therefore in favor of a prompt and full discussion, and a declaration of opinion on the part of the Senate, upon all the subjects treated of in the report. He was himself perfectly satisfied that this course would do no injury to the credit of the States. The committee had no design to impair their credit, nor is there a single expression in the report calculated to produce such an effect. The efforts to suppress this report, and prevent its publication, would, he believed, be more likely to injure the credit of the State bonds, than all the committee have said or done. He did not, however, think the credit of the States would be seriously affected by either. That credit was based upon their means of payment, which were known to be ample, and their character for good faith; and this sensitiveness which is manifested about their credit, is calculated to injure it more than any thing else.

It is urged that no one has applied to this body for an assumption of the State debts; and therefore, all action on our part is premature and uncalled for. It is true, no direct application has been made, but an influential portion of the press has made the proposition, and is urging it upon the consideration of the public for its adoption. Two or three days since, the resolutions of one of the States (Vermont) were presented to this body, asking for a distribution of the revenue arising from the sale of the public lands. It appeared in a newspaper of this city, published several days before the committee reported, that an honorable member of the other House [Mr. GENTRY of Tennessee] had given notice that he would, when in order, introduce a bill providing for the assumption of certain debts of the States, and appropriate the proceeds of the public lands for that purpose. There was assumption directly proposed; not, to be sure, a general assumption, but a partial one; the extent of which he could not define. But of one thing he felt confident: if this plan was commenced, it would end in a general assumption. He would not repeat the argument contained in the report of the committee, which, to his mind, proved conclusively that it would be as competent for Congress to take the moneys arising from imports, as the revenue arising from the sales of the public lands, and apply them to the payment of the debts of the States.

Mr. G. said he would now proceed to show that this project of assumption was not confined to our own country; that the largest capitalists in England—the very men who owned and traded most in these State bonds—had made a proposition plainly and distinctly in favor of the assumption, which the report of the committee combats. In the circular of the Barings, Brothers, and Co. there is the following language:

"But if the old scheme of internal improvements in the Union is to be carried into effect, on the vast scale and with the rapidity lately projected, and by the means of foreign capital, a more comprehensive guarantee than that of individual States will be required to raise so large an amount in a short time."

"A national pledge would undoubtedly collect capital together from all parts of Europe; but the forced sales of loans, made separately by all the individual States, in reckless competition, through a number of channels, render the terms more and more onerous for all, lower the reputation of American credits, and (as reliance is almost exclusively placed upon the London market) produce temporary mischief here, by absorbing the floating capital, diverting money from regular business, deranging banking operations, and producing an unnatural balance of trade against this country. It would seem, therefore, that most of the States must either pause in the execution of their works of improvement, or some general system of combination must be adopted."

Here, continued Mr. G. is a paper, which cannot be misunderstood. No more money can be had upon the bonds of individual States. "A more comprehensive guarantee will be required;" "a national pledge would undoubtedly collect capital together from all parts of Europe" Yes, make a national debt, to be paid by the General Government, and then all Europe will contribute her money for the purpose of increasing the debt. Will gentlemen say this is no proposition for the assumption of State debts? It was, to Mr. G's mind, not only a proposition, but one made to the American public, made to the indebted States, and those having State bonds not yet disposed of, in an especial manner. It is, in part, saying to them, you must obtain a guarantee from the General Government, or your improvements must be arrested.

Mr. G. said, other Senators may imagine there is nothing in all this; that an influential portion of the public press advocating the assumption; that some States asking for a distribution of the revenue arising from the public lands; that the proposition, in the other House, to assume certain debts of the States; and the direct proposition of the London bankers for an assumption, should not be noticed by this body. He, however, was of opinion, that they would not act the part of faithful watchmen over the true interests of the country, were they to be silent, and not give warning of the impending danger. For his part, he thought he saw much to be feared in regard to a national debt; much in regard to an increased and oppressive tariff; much in regard to the general prosperity and welfare of the country. Mr. G. remarked that he had transcended the limits he had prescribed to himself when he rose to address the Senate; he had intended to confine himself to the question of printing the report of the committee. If that were done, gentlemen would not have to conjecture respecting its contents; they could then base their arguments upon its true contents, and not subject themselves to those mistakes and errors which had been made concerning what was contained in it. A word or two only in relation to a past transaction. He was rebuked, because he had made a report now, when he would not make, at a former session, a report upon a portion of the President's message, respecting the bankruptcy of banks, which was referred to a committee of which he was chairman.

Mr. G. remarked, he had, in that instance, acted according to the convictions of his own mind. He differed from the President in the case alluded to, and a majority of the committee concurred with him in opinion; therefore no report was made upon the subject, and the committee was discharged from its further consideration on his motion, which was according to the usage of the Senate in similar cases. In the case now before the Senate, a majority of the committee, including himself, concurred in the general objects of the original resolutions, and had made the report now on the table of the Senate accordingly.

Reference is still had to the report first presented to the Senate, in which the debts of the States were said to be estimated at two hundred millions of dollars. Mr. G. remarked that he was by no means convinced that the estimate was too high. He wished it might turn out that he was mistaken, although, taking the report of the late Comptroller of New York, with the knowledge that several agents from different States had, in the course of the last summer, been in Europe selling these bonds, he apprehended the amount would not fall much, if any, short of the sum named in the first form of the report. He would probably, at a proper stage of this proceeding, give his views at large on the subject. At present, he considered it improper to do so. He should, therefore, forbear to say more at present.

REMARKS OF MR. HUBBARD.

Mr. HUBBARD remarked that he was desirous to say a few words upon this subject, and they should be but few at this time; as he might probably, on some future day, should the Senate afford the opportunity, address the Senate upon the resolutions which the committee had reported. He rose merely to call the Senate back to the consideration of the real questions which were now before them. It seemed to him that gentlemen had travelled out of the record; that they were attempting to make up a false issue before the country; to prejudge this whole matter; to present a course of reasoning based upon this report, which a fair examination of the report itself would not justify. They refuse to print; they will not consent to give publicity to this document; and yet make expositions of it, in their speeches, which, in his judgment, the report could not sustain. All he asked was, that the report and the resolutions should be printed, that every member of the community might have the opportunity to examine and to judge for himself. He asked this as an act of justice to the committee, to whom this subject had been, by order of the Senate, referred. He asked it as an act of justice to the Senate, which has seen fit to take cognizance of this matter, as a subject worthy of their consideration. He asked it as an act of justice to the whole country, that this report, word for word, letter for letter, should be given, without delay, to the public. He could not but feel a degree of astonishment and suprise that the printing of this report, as moved by the chairman of the select committee, should be denied; that it should even be delayed—that the deliberations of the committee—the result of their doings upon a subject, which, by the order of the Senate, had been committed to them, should be refused the usual and customary courtesy. But so it is. And he must therefore, as well as he could, present the true issue to the public. He could not, as a member of the committee, permit the sentiment to go forth uncontradicted, that by this report the States were arraigned for their prodigality, denounced and rebuked for their extravagance in expenditure, and that their indebtedness was put forth in such terms as to affect their credit at home and abroad.

He unqualifiedly denied these positions; and he felt assured that any fair and candid examination of the argument of the committee would show most satisfactorily that there is no foundation for such allegations.

He hoped the Senate would not lose sight of the true questions presented by this report. What were they? Would it be just? would it be expedient? would it be constitutional for this Government to assume and undertake to pay the debts of the debtor States? These were the only questions; and disguise it as you may, they are the questions. The argument, and the whole argument, of the committee, is based entirely upon those very propositions; and the conclusions to which the committee have arrived, are distinctly set forth in the resolutions accompanying their report. The arguments which have been offered upon the other side, seem to be grounded upon the supposed fact, that the report of the committee treats of the indebtedness of the States in such a way and manner as to imply censure to those sovereignties; to charge upon them extravagant and wasteful expenditure of the money of their people; that the report of the committee, according to their version, is but a bill of indictment preferred against the States for their prodigality. The report speaks no such language. It alludes not to the particular indebtedness of particular States, nor does it speak of the aggregate indebtedness of all the States. It may speak of the indebtedness of some individual States in the illustration of a principle; but not in the language of fault-finding or censure. It has scrupulously avoided discussing the subject of State indebtedness. It did not even occur to the committee, that the subject of State indebtedness was necessarily to be discussed, while executing the important duty confided to them; and, notwithstanding the course of remark on yesterday, and notwithstanding the remarks which have been reiterated this morning, the report will be found to run clear of all such objections. It will be found to be limited to a fair, full, and free discussion of the subject referred to the committee: and again, he would ask if there could be any possible doubt what that subject was?

The very first resolution submitted by the Senator from Missouri leaves no room to cavil, as to the extent of the power and jurisdiction of the select committee, to whom that resolution, with others, was referred. The resolution is as follows: "That there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States which can authorize the legislative power of the Union to assume the debts of the States, which have been contracted for local objects and State purposes." The other resolution, offered by the Senator from Missouri, declared, in the most direct and unqualified terms, the injustice and inexpediency of any such assumption. These, then, were the subjects plainly and intelligibly referred by the order of the Senate itself, to the consideration of its committee. And what has that committee done? Have they departed from the subjects committed to them? Have they undertaken to discuss new matters? Or have they confined themselves exclusively to the consideration of the subjects referred? Examine the report; let that speak for itself. He asked for no man's commentary upon it; he asked merely for its publication; and he hazarded nothing in saying that it would be perceived that the committee had confined themselves to their own jurisdiction. They had, according to their best ability, discussed, first, the palpable injustice of an assumption of the State debts by the General Government—secondly, they had discussed the inexpediency of such a project—and thirdly, they had discussed the unconstitutionality of the measure. And what are we told by Senators in the Opposition? That we have gone out of our way to attack the credit of the States, by exposing to the public the amount of their indebtedness; and by a gratuitous declaration that this Government would not become, under any circumstances, the endorsers for the States. He must, in reply, say that these allegations were entirely gratuitous. As he had before remarked, the report contained no attack upon the credit or the character of the States. No such attack was ever designed by the committee. Nothing could have been further from their thoughts; and no such attack has been committed upon the States. Is the debt of Pennsylvania, or the debt of Louisiana even stated, or is the debt of any other State of the Confederacy stated in a way to affect the credit of any such State? The debt of no particular State is mentioned at all in the report, except it be that of New York and Illinois. Why then this sentiveness upon the matter? We heard no complaint made from the States of Louisiana and Pennsylvania, against the terms of the committee's report. And we hear no complaint made of the report from the Senators of New York and Illinois. There is no just ground of complaint. But, nevertheless, it has been said, and said over and again, in argument, that the committee have gratuitously, and that they had, in truth, without right and without authority, made this report; that it was uncalled for; that no State had applied to Congress to have the General Government assume its debts. That may be true. But had the committee no authority for their action? Did they assume to make this report without right? It is not necessary that any corporation or that any one State should make a personal application to Congress to assume its debts, in order to give jurisdiction to the Senate over this subject. It is every day's practice for Senators to rise in their places, and to offer abstract propositions, and to ask the consideration of the Senate upon them. This may be done by a direct action of the Senate upon them, or through the agency of a committee appointed for the purpose. And will it be said that if the Senate elect to call in aid the services of a committee, that that committee are precluded from treating the subject in such a manner as to them shall seem most fit and expedient? A Senator rises in his place, and offers a resolution instructing a committee to inquire into the propriety of making a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States, for the purpose of internal improvement, or for any other purpose. Would not the committee to whom the subject should be referred, be fully authorized to discuss the injustice, the inexpediency, and the unconstitutionality of such a project? Would they not be authorized, from the very nature of the reference, to treat the whole subject as they should think proper? Would not such a committee, under such a reference, be fully authorized to report resolutions for the action of the Senate, declaring the injustice, the inequality, the unconstitutionality of any such distribution? There can be no doubt upon this point. Let us, then, examine and ascertain what was referred to this select committee, and see whether they have acted gratuitously and without authority, or whether the charge is not made against them without the shadow of justice or of right. Whether the Senator from Missouri were wise or unwise, reasonable or unreasonable, in bringing forward his resolutions, he should reserve for future consideration. Suffice it to say, they were presented, and presented upon the responsibility of that Senator—a responsibility which the Senator will not seek to avoid. The resolutions were before the Senate; their introduction and the course of proceeding thereon is now matter of record. They were in the following words:

"Resolved, That there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States which can authorize the legislative power of the Union to assume the debts of the States which have been contracted for local objects and State purposes.

"2. That the assumption of such debts either openly, by a direct promise to pay them, or disguisedly by going security for their payment, or by creating surplus revenue or applying the national funds to pay them, would be a gross and flagrant violation of the Constitution, wholly unwarranted by the letter or spirit of that instrument, and utterly repugnant to all the objects and purposes for which the Federal Union was formed.

"3. That, besides its flagrant unconstitutionality, such assumption would be unjust, unwise, impolitic, and dangerous, compelling the non-indebted States to incur burthens for others which they have refused to incur for themselves; diverting the national funds from national objects to State objects, and thereby creating a necessity for loans or taxes, or issues of Federal paper money to supply the place of the funds so diverted; prostrating the barriers of economy, moderation, and safety, in the creation of State debts by separating the function of contractor from that of payer of the debt, extinguishing the sense of responsibility in the contractor, and making the Federal Government the ultimate payer of all the obligations contracted by the States for their own purposes; establishing a dangerous precedent which must soon be followed up by new debts on the part of the States, and new assumptions on the part of the Federal Government; invading the rights and mortgaging the property of posterity, and loading unborn generations with debts not their own; creating a new national debt of large amount at the start, and of a nature to increase continually its own amount, and to perpetuate its own existence; begetting a spirit in Congress which must constantly cater for new distributions by preventing necessary appropriations, and keeping up unnecessary taxes; laying the foundation for a new and excessive tariff of duties on foreign imports to fall unequally on different parts of the Union, and most heavily on the planting, grain growing, and provision raising States, to their manifest injury and propable great discount; involving disastrous consequences either to the Union itself or to its members, as tending to the consolidation of the States, and their ultimate abject dependence on the Federal head as the fountain of their supplies; or, tending to the annihilation of the Federal head itself by stripping it of all its means of national defence and self-support, and reducing it to the hepless imbecility of the old Confederation; giving a new impulse to the delusive career of the paper system, already in a state of dangerous overaction; ensuring the establishment of another National Bank; and, finally, begetting a passion for periodical distributions of lands and money, and extensions of Federal credit, which could find no limit to its demands until the national domain was exhausted, the Federal Treasury emptied, and the credit of the Union reduced to contempt.

"4. That the debts of the States being now chiefly held by foreigners, and constituting a stock in foreign markets greatly depreciated, any legislative attempt to obtain the assumption or securityship of the United States for their payment, or to provide for their payment out of the national funds, must have the effect of enhancing the value of that stock to the amount of a great many millions of dollars, to the enormous and undue advantage of foreign capitalists, and of jobbers and gamblers in stocks, thereby holding out inducement to foreigners to interfere in our affairs, and to bring all the influences of a moneyed power to operate upon public opinion, upon our elections, and upon State and Federal legislation, to produce a consummation so tempting to their cupidity, and so profitable to their interest.

"5. That foreign interference and foreign influence, in all ages, and in all countries, have been the bane and curse of free Governments; and that such interference and influence are far more dangerous, in the insidious intervention of the moneyed power, than in the forcible invasions of fleets and armies.

"6. That to close the door at once against all applications for such assumption, and to arrest at their source the vast tide of evils which would flow from it, it is necessary that the constituted authorities, without delay, shall RESOLVE and DECLARE their utter opposition to the proposal contained in the late London Bankers's circular in relation to State debts, contracted for local and State purposes, and recommending to the Congress of the United States to assume, or guaranty, or provide for the ultimate payment of said debts."

It will also be recollected that the proposed substitute for the aforegoing resolutions, moved by the Senator from Georgia, in the language following,

"That the assumption by the General Government of the debts of the States, contracted for local purposes, whether it shall be a direct assumption, which would make the General Government responsible for said debts, or indirect, by a distribution of public money among the States, to enable them to pay their debts; or a pledge of public lands for the said purpose or otherwise, would be impolitic and dangerous, unjust and unequal, among the members of the Union, and wholly unauthorized by the letter or spirit of the Constitution," was in like manner before the Senate; and upon debate, upon full discussion, after the defeat of a motion to lay the whole subject upon the table, all these resolutions were referred to a select committee, of which the gentleman upon his right [Mr. GRUNDY] was the chairman. But it is said that the honorable Senator moved the reference himself That is true, but does that circumstance tend to abridge the powers of the committee? Does that fact tend to lessen their jurisdiction? The Senator did move the reference, and it is equally as true that the presiding officer of the Senate did, as he was in duty bound to do, appoint upon that committee a majority friendly to the very object contemplated by the resolutions of the Senator from Missouri. This was parliamentary, it was but an act of common justice; and it must have been known, therefore, to those who now make war upon this report, that the committee would act upon the subject referred to them, and would return to the Senate their argument and their resolutions as the conclusion of their argument for the action of the Senate. Will gentlemen read the resolutions referred to the committee? If they will, can they then come forward and express a doubt as to the power conferred, or as to the duty of the committee? Will they, then, assert that the committee have transcended their powers—gone away from the strict line of their duty? What is the sum and the substance of the resolutions of the Senator from Missouri, and of the substitute proposed by the Senator from Georgia? It is this, and it is nothing more and nothing less: Would it be just, would it be expedient, would it be constitutional, for this Government to assume the State debts? Would it be just or constitutional to divide the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States, or to apply any of the national funds for that purpose? Such, he undertook to say, was the length, and breadth, and depth, of the resolutions of the Senator from Missouri; and a consideration of these subjects, by a reference of the resolutions themselves, was necessarily committed to the charge of the select committee. And for what purpose were they so referred? To avoid action? to pass them away from before the Senate? to bury them in oblivion? No, sir: the Senate had refused to lay these resolutions upon the table. They, by that act, expected, and by the reference demanded, their consideration. They required, at the hands of the committee, a report; and it seemed to him that, whatever might be the conclusions to which the committee should come, the Senate had a right to expect that the committee would justify their conclusions by a full and deliberate argument upon the subjects.

The committee themselves entertained no doubt as to the course proper for them to pursue. They considered themselves called upon to present plain, definite, and distinct propositions for the action of the Senate. This they have done—they considered themselves called upon by self respect, and by a sense of duty to the Senate, to state fully and fairly the reasons which had induced these conclusions. This they have done. The report is but the reasoning, the argument of the committee. The resolutions are but the conclusions of that argument. Whenever this report shall be laid before the public—if such a destiny awaits it—it will be found to contain nothing more or less than an argument upon the propositions whether it would be just, expedient, or constitutional, for the General Government to assume the debts of the States, or whether it would be just or constitutional to set apart the avails of the public lands for such purpose? And the resolutions themselves tell plainly to what conclusions the committee have come. But notwithstanding the avowal just made by the chairman of the committee, gentlemen will have it, that such a report was uncalled for; that it is unjust to the States; and if given to the public, would be most mischievous to State credit. There is not, sir, one paragraph in this whole report which can have such a construction, or which gives evidence of any such design. He denied that the credit of the States could be injured, or in any respect assailed, by the publication of this report. What does the report say? That the United States cannot, according to the principles of equal justice, assume the debts of the several States. Is this position controverted by any one? If so, he had not heard it avowed here. How, then, can this deliberate declaration of the opinion of the Senate, unfavorably affect the credit of the States? Have the debtor States entertained the idea that at some favorable moment the United States would assume their debts? Have the creditors of the States—the money-lenders of Europe—entertained such an idea? If so, the Government owes it to itself to declare, in the most unequivocal and unqualified terms, its deliberate opinions. If the States have entertained no such sentiment, and if the money-lenders have imbibed no such opinion, it was difficult for him to see how the credit of the States could be unfavorably affected by the publication of the report, and by the adoption of the resolutions. It has been said, and with perfect truth, that the money-lenders can have no other and no better credit than the faith of the States. He fully concurred in the sentiment. The States were able to pay, and, beyond all question, will promptly meet every liability. There is not a letter or word in that report that contradicts the assertion. So far from it, the report speaks forth in high commendation of the ability and of the integrity of the debtor States. How, then, can the report, if published, in any way affect the credit of the States? It proposes no interference with their operations; it recommends no measure which can, by any possibility, embarrass the States in the prosecution of their works of internal improvement. The bankers of Europe have made advances to cities and corporations and States, upon their credit, and upon their credit alone.

The report does not seem to distrust the relations subsisting between the States and their creditors. He could not well conceive how a declaration on the part of the Senate—that it would be unjust to the Union—that it would be inexpedient, and in violation of the letter and spi it of the Constitution, for the General Government to assume the payment of State liabilities—could in any way affect negotiations between the States and their bankers. Can such a declaration tend, in the slightest degree, to lessen the resourses of the States, to augment their liabilities, or justly to alarm their creditors? Can such a declaration tend to reduce the income of State canals, or of State railroads, for the prosecution of which works this foreign capital has been mainly obtained? Not so. The States will go into the money market of our own country, or of England, or of France, or of Holland, just as well after as before the declaration. It is idle to say that the capitalists, at home or abroad, do not perfectly well understand the liabilities of particular States, as well as their resources. If Louisiana, for instance, should send her bond to the bankers of England for discount, will any Senator for a moment pretend that any accommodation would be granted, ignorant of the full extent of her indebtedness, and of her means? Such information is within the reach of every individual, and is, beyond all question, possessed by those dealing in stocks. There is annually given to the public, in the reports of State comptrollers and State treasurers, the exact condition of State finances. There could be no fraud practised, even if there was a disposition to fraud.

How, then, is the publication of this report to affect the credit of the debtor States? The extent of the indebtedness of each State is known at home and abroad. The true character of the works of internal improvement in the respective States, completed and progressing, is also perfectly well understood. In short, the liabilities and the means of the States is as well understood by the Barings and the Rothschilds of Europe, as they are by the States themselves. It is, then, in his judgment, idle to contend that you are doing an act of great injustice to the States, by giving publicity to this document. It is due to the debtor States themselves, at this eventful crisis; and it is most emphatically due to the States, unembarrassed by debt, to make their unqualified declaration of the opinion of this Senate upon this all important subject. It is due to the bankers of England and of the world, according to his sense of morality, to make this declaration, and to make it now. This is the accepted time, and for this reason; that there is abroad in the land, to some extent, a sentiment touching this subject, which favors the idea of assumption—a sentiment which cannot be tolerated by the independent States of America. He did not speak without authority upon this subject. There had already been given to the public, in our own State journals, alarming doctrines. And for one, he tendered his thanks to the honorable Senator from Missouri, in behalf of his own State, for having brought this subject thus early before the Senate.

It is a subject of deep and vital importance to this Union, and to the States respectively. He was perfectly satisfied that the people of his own State, from recent indications, were not indifferent to the action of the Senate upon this subject. He represented, in part, a State unembarrassed by any existing debt. She had never asked a dollar at the hands of this Government for any local purpose; and from her early history to the present moment, New Hampshire had never, received a dollar (to which she claims title) for any purpose of State policy. Her works are her own, and better means of intercommunication exist not in any State; her roads have been wrought by the hard hands of her industrious yeomanry; her canals and her railroads have been accomplished by individual enterprise. Such had been the influence of popular opinion, within the limits of his own State, that he was not aware that any movement had ever been made to accomplish any local object upon her credit. And should any such movement have been made, most resolutely and most triumphantly would her Legislature have resisted every attempt to pledge the faith of the State for the accomplishment of any local object. She has even refused to give authority to her town corporations to borrow money upon the credit of the town, for any purpose not expressly warranted by existing statutes. Such was the present condition, and such, he was happy to say, had been the policy of his own State; and New Hampshire may well congratulate herself upon her entire freedom from debt; and as one of the Senators from that State, he rejoiced that this subject was now engaging the attention of the Senate. New Hampshire asks no distribution of the avails of the public lands. She now holds in safe deposite the proportion awarded her of the twenty-eight millions deposited with the several States, under the act of 1836 That deposite she will honestly return to the public Treasury, if a return should be required. He could not well conceive what more equal benefit the States could desire from the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, than to have those proceeds constitute a part of the public revenues to be appropriated for the just support of the Government. The States are interested in the public revenues of the country, according to their representation. And if direct taxes are to be imposed for any public object, New Hampshire would have to bear her proportion to the whole amount, as her representation bears to the whole representation of the country. And if there were now to be a distribution among the several States of any particular sum, as the proceeds of the sales of the public lands for any one year, the State he represented would get, as her share, such a part of the whole sum to be distributed, as her representation bears to the whole representation of the Union. The proceeds of the sales of the public lands are but a portion of the public revenues; and there would be no more justice in setting apart that part of the public revenues for distribution, than there would be in setting apart that portion which arises from imposts. It cannot be questioned that, at a time like this, the Government stands in need of all its resources.

The revenue arising from imposts, as well as from the avails of the public domain, is now required for public use, and as a measure of expediency, then, there would be no more propriety in yielding one branch of the public revenue than the other, and no justice or constitutionality in yielding either. The public domain is the property of the whole Union—purchased with the means of the whole Union—and all he desired in behalf of his State was, that the proceeds of the sales should be appropriated, in common with the other means of the Union, for the just and economical support of the Government; and should the time ever come when more revenue shall be collected than shall be required for such an object, he would at once reduce that revenue, by saving the people from indirect taxation. These were his views; they were the sentimeats of his State, as will distinctly appear from the resolution of her Legislature, which had been by his colleague presented to the Senate at this very session:

"That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and the Representatives from this State be requested, to oppose every attempt which shall be made to divide the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States, or to make any other disposition thereof, except for the constitutional purpose of providing for the common welfare and general defence of the United States."

The injustice and unconstitutionality of any distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands had been discussed by the committee, and they had offered to the Senate, for its action, a distinct resolution upon that subject. And again, he said, he could not but regard this as a fit time, and an appropriate time, for the consideration of these momentous questions. And, from what had come to his knowledge, if the Legislature of his own State could have been assembled, after the promulgation of the resolutions which passed the Assembly of Vermont at its last fall session, and which have recently been presented to the Senate; could his own Legislature have assembled after the circular of the English bankers had been given to the public; they would have expressed their opinion, in the strongest possible terms, against the assumption of the State debts by the General Government, in any form or under any circumstances, either by pledging the credit of the Government direct, or by dividing the public domain, or by setting apart the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, or any description of the national funds, for any such purpose.

He could not mistake the sentiment of his own people upon this subject—a sentiment founded upon the principles of immutable justice.

Delegates direct from the people of his State have recently held their customary primary meetings preparatory to the annual election; and they had passed resolution upon resolution as expressive of their feelings and of their opinions. In his own county, the following resolution was introduced, and with entire unanimity adopted:

"That we disapprove of the assumption of the State debts by the National Government, either openly by a purchase of their bonds, or by becoming surety for the same, or disguisedly by setting apart the public domain, or any of the other resources of the National Government for that purpose, as a measure wholly unauthorized by the letter and spirit of the Constitution, and deadly hostile to the Union itself."

And in other parts of his State, resolutions, corresponding in feeling and in sentiment with the one just read, have been also adopted.

The people, then, of his State, he unhesitatingly believed, were most sensibly alive to the importance of this subject. They had moved forward, and unsolicited, unasked, had voluntarily expressed their convictions; and, uninfluenced by any consideration, save the vast importance of the measure itself, had spoken in a manner which he could not misunderstand. And was there nothing in the signs of the times calculated to excite the suspicion, or to alarm the fears, of a people jealous of their rights? He firmly believed that the opinion had gone forth, was now honestly entertained by some, and openly avowed, that this Government would, at some future time, assume the debts of the several States; that the importance of the great works of State policy now in progress, called for the assumption. Can it be doubted that this very sentiment has already been suggested on the other side of the Atlantic? And from what had already come to the knowledge of the Senate, he, for one, fully believed that this purpose had been suggested by one of the great bankers of England, to produce its effect here within the States, and made, too, in the belief that a response would be given. The language of the Messrs. Barings, Brothers, and company, is of no doubtful character. They say:

"But if the whole scheme of internal improvements in the Union is to be carried into effect on the vast scale, and with the rapidity lately projected, and by the means of foreign capital, a more comprehensive guarantee than that of individual States will be required to raise so large an amount in so short a time. A national pledge would undoubtedly collect capital together from all parts of Europe; but the forced sales of loans made separately by all the individual States in reckless competition, through a number of channels, render the terms more and more onerous for all, lower the reputation of American credit, and (as reliance is almost exclusively placed on the London market) produce temporary mischief here, by absorbing the floating capital, diverting money from regular business, deranging banking operations, and producing an unnatural balance of trade against this country. It would seem, therefore, as if most of the States must either pause in the execution of their works of improvement, or some general system of combination must be adopted."

In this short paragraph, it is very distinctly set forth that a national pledge—that is, the faith of the General Government—is required to collect together capital sufficient to carry into effect the whole scheme of internal improvement in the Union. Here is a distinct avowal by one of the great bankers of England, that the pledge of the General Government is necessary. That letter, it will be recollected, found its way into the public journals of the country just before the meeting of Congress. Was it not designed to call the attention of the American public to this subject? For what other earthly purpose could this circular have been written and published, at the time it was written and published? And it little accorded with his notions of right and with his sense of morality, to play dark upon this matter—to make any concealments; but plainly, directly, and unqualifiedly, to declare to the bankers of Europe, and to the States themselves, the gross injustice and unconstitutionality of such an assumption—to put the public mind at rest upon this matter. He, therefore, could not but regard the present time as the most appropriate and accepted time for the full discussion and consideration of this subject, and he rejoiced that it was now before the Senate, and that the opinion of this branch of Congress, at least, would be expressed.

He fully coincided in the sentiments of the report upon the table. It was but a temperate, candid, and free discussion of the questions submitted. These was no language used calculated to disturb the feelings of the debtor States. What he most anxiously desired was, that this subject might soon be disposed of. It is a fact well known, that State bonds are now in Europe; and, in his judgment, it was ardently wished, if not confidently believed, by the great money lenders, that this Government would endorse the paper of the States—would pledge its faith for the ultimate payment of State bonds. Does any man in this Senate doubt this? Is it not perfectly plain to the understanding of all? else why the circular of the Barings? else why this official declaration that a national pledge would be necessary in order to collect sufficient capital to perfect the great projects of internal improvement now in progress. What, then, is to be done? What should be done? What does duty demand? Keep silence, with this circular upon our tables? Lead the bankers to suppose, as they would by such a course, that this Government might come, ultimately, to the aid of the States, as it had, on a memorable occasion, to the aid of the District of Columbia? No, sir, this was not the course which, in his judgment, a sense of justice suggested. He would be frank, open, undisguised. He would declare to the world the sentiments of the Senate upon this matter. Let this be done, and done speedily. The British Queen has not yet arrived. Should the action of the Senate be delayed until after her arrival and departure; should there be no expression of the sense of this body upon this subject; should the sentiment be entertained in England that the United States might ultimately assume the State liabilities; it would lead to great speculations in State securities, with no benefit to the States, but with advantages only to the speculators themselves.

The credit of the States rested upon its own solid basis—their resources, and their honor. With such pledges the States could not fail to obtain all pecuniary accommodations, upon fair terms, necessary to aid them in the prosecution and perfection of their local objects. He would not interfere with State policy. He would do nothing to impair State credit. He would not hesitate, on all occasions, and at all times, to declare the entire ability and integrity of the States. He would do all this. And let it not be suppposed by any one, that the report now upon the table infringes either one of these positions. But he most earnestly appealed to the justice of the Senate to let the report be printed. He would not ask for an extra number until its true character shall be known; but let the usual number be printed for the use of the Senate. And he would only say, in conclusion, that it would be found to be a most forcible, if not convincing argument, showing the injustice, the inexpediency, and unconstitutionality of this Government, in any way or in any manner, directly or indirectly, assuming the debts of the States.

REMARKS OF MR. WRIGHT.

Mr. WRIGHT said he found himself compelled, from the course of remark of the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. SOUTHARD,] to make an explanation of an explanation. That Senator was proceeding to blame the committee, and charge them with error, in their statement of the amount of the debt of the State of New York. Feeling that, if error or blame were chargeable any where, for that statement, the charge should be against him, and not the committee, he asked leave of the Senator to explain, which was courteously granted. He had intended, in that explanation, to state the truth. He had said that he was called on by the honorable chairman of the committee, before the report was first made, to examine it upon this point; that he had told the chairman he thought their statement of eighteen millions, as the amount of the debt of New York, excessive, but that he believed he had the means of accurate ascertainment; that he referred to the annual report of the Comptroller, the fiscal officer of the State, made to the Legislature during its present session, took the amount of the debt, as he understood it to be, from that document, and, according to his recollection, himself erased the sum stated in the report of eighteen millions, and interlined, in his own hand writing, the words "about fifteen and an half millions;" and that this was done before the report was first made to the Senate.

This explanation he had made to exempt the committee from the charge of having stated that debt at eighteen millions, when their report was read in the Senate, and of having altered the sum after the recommitment on yesterday, as well as to exempt them from the charge of error at all, in the statement as it now appeared. In the alteration of the sum stated in the report, as well as in his explanation of it, he had intended to give the truth; and yet the subsequent remarks of the Senator had been made to show that he was in error.

[Here Mr. SOUTHARD rose, and inquired if Mr. WRIGHT supposed he intended to charge him with intentional error.]

Mr. W. said, certainly not: certainly not. He beged the Senator to be assured that he had made, and intended to make, no ill natured remarks. His object was, what he had declared it to be, in reference to his alteration of the report and his former explanation of that act, to arrive at the truth, and to give that to the Senate and the country upon this point at least.

Could he have obtained the floor when he first made the attempt, and so as immediately to have succeeded the honorable Senator, he should have confined himself to a more full explanation in relation to what he supposed to be the true amount of the debt of the State of New York, and the authority upon which he had assumed it to be what he had stated. He might now extend his remarks to a few other topics, but a severe cold made it laborious for him to speak; and, as well as the late hour of the day, would prevent him from being very tedious. And he would first complete his explanation in relation to the debt of the State he had the honor in part to represent here.

The honorable Senator [Mr. SOUTHARD] had produced and read from a document emanating from the State, to show that the amount of the debt was much less than the sum stated in the report of the committee, and, by necessary consequence, that he (Mr. W.) had misled the committee upon that point. He did not complain that the gentleman had produced the document, or of the use he had made of it. It was a document proper to refer to for the purpose for which the Senator had made the reference. It was the message of the Governor of his State; a document which ought to carry authority with it, and especially to his honorable colleague and himself. It was the document to which he first referred, after the inquiry in reference to the amount of their State debt was made of him by the honorable chairman of the committee. He remembered that their Governor had given a statement of the debt in his message, and there he first sought for the true amount. An examination of the document, however, was unsatisfactory to him. It spoke of certain deductions, without giving the amount of the items, and some of them were clearly parts of the existing debt of the State. An acquaintance, somewhat extensive, with these matters, in years past, satisfied him that the true amount of the State debt was not to be learned from the message of the Governor; and, having recently received copies of the annual report of the Comptroller of the State, the officer who keeps the books and accounts of the State, and whose duty it is, in this report, to show its true fiscal condition, he had recourse to that document for the information sought by the committee from him.

The report was made to the Legislature of the State on the 13th day of the present month; and appended to it, as exhibits connected with the fiscal condition of the State, he found two tables, marked H and I. The tables he now held in his hand, and the entire document from which they had been taken, was laying upon the desk before him. The first mentioned table, H, had this caption:

"Statement showing the amount of canal and general fund stocks outstanding on the 1st January, 1840, the rate of interest, and when redeemable."

Then followed the various amounts of stock, arranged under various heads of expenditure, and there was carried out in the last column a general aggregate, the footing of which was $13,697,931 03. The table I, printed upon the same sheet, had the following caption:

"Statement of stocks issued to incorporated companies on the faith of the State, and the amount authorized to be issued."

The table contains the names of the companies which have received portions of these stocks, a reference to the acts of the Legislature authorizing the emission, the amount of stock already issued to each company, and the further amount authorized, but not issued, with the aggregate of both. The table is, therefore, clear and intelligible, not confounding stock authorized to be issued with that actually issued, and constituting an existing debt, and from it the amount actually issued is shown to be $1,847,700, while that authorized and not yet issued is $2,762,300 more.

To answer the committee, then, Mr. W. said he took the first two sums above named as the existing debt of the State, and, adding them together, he found their amount to be $15,545,631 03, and from data of that authority, he had inserted in the report of the committee the words "about fifteen and a half millions" as the amount of the actual and existing debt of his State, instead of the eighteen millions previously written by the committee. Had he given the committee the true sum? Or had he led them into error? Had he done injustice to the State he ought truly to represent, and brought merited censure upon a committee of this body, by the same act, or had he told the truth without regard to consequences?

These were the inquiries which suggested themselves to his mind, and the inquiries he wished, so far as it was in his power, to enable the Senate to answer. The honorable Senator had shown to us the message of the Governor of the State, giving the amount of its debt, as stated by the Senator, at a sum not far different from $9,000,000. He (Mr. W.) had given the amount of that debt to the committee, and now gave it to the Senate, at $15,500,000, or about that sum, and had rested himself upon the official report of the fiscal officer of the State, and the political, and, he supposed, personal friend of the Governor. The difference of amount was most material, considering the sums given by either party. A mistake, or error, of six millions, in fifteen millions, is no inconsiderable variance from the truth, whoever may have made it.

Of the authority which ought to be ascribed to the respective documents which had been adduced, it did not become him to speak further than he had done. For their accuracy he certainly could not endorse, further than to give the official responsibility of the authors. Still he would venture to believe that no one, here or elsewhere, would be found attempting to impeach the accuracy of the tables appended to the report of the Comptroller, to which he had referred. Did their statements and results necessarily conflict with, and contradict, the statement of the Governor, as to the amount of the State debt? To the casual reader the difference was, unquestionably, wide and important. Here he thought that might not be found to be true; and indeed he was not prepared to say that, here, the errors and discrepancies might not be charged to him, instead of the author of either document.

Had he not listened to the debates in this body, on yesterday and this day, he could not have believed that, with all the facts before us, we could have differed about the amount of the debt of a given State. Yet those debates had shown him that this difference of opinion did exist among the members of the Senate, and that the point in controversy had a direct bearing upon the question, what was, in fact and in truth, the debt of his own State?

He referred to the position taken yesterday by several Senators, that the stocks, or other liabilities, of the several States—call them by what name you please—incurred for the benefit of incorporated companies and associations, or individuals, are not, properly speaking, debts of the States; and that, in speaking of the indebtedness of the several States, these liabilities should not be considered. He would not now consider this doctrine any further than it had particular application to the debt of his own State; though he hoped, before this debate should close, to have an opportunity to give his views upon it at length, and to expose what seemed to him to be its dangerous character and tendency, as it respects the credit of the States, the fiscal affairs of the States, and the people of the States.

What, then, was its application to the point in dispute—the amount of the debt of the State of New York? He had given to the committee the sum of fifteen and a half millions as about the amount of the true debt of his State, and he had now shown that the fiscal officer of the State had given it, on the first day of the present month at $15,545,631 03. In this amount, however, was included $1,847,700 of debt incurred for canal, navigation, and railroad companies; and should this sum have been so included? Was it, in truth, a part of the State debt? The Governor of the State had not so considered it, and had excluded it from his statement, which accounted for so much of the difference between himself and his comptroller. He, Mr. W. considered it a part of the debt of the State, and therefore included it in the sum given to the committee as the aggregate of that debt. Who was in error? What are the facts? The public stocks of the State have been issued for these amounts in the same manner as for any other debts of the State; these stocks have been sold in the market as the stocks of the State, not as the stocks of the companies, or associations, to which they were issued; they are, at this moment, in the markets of the world as the stocks of the State, without reference at all to the companies, or associations; they bear the same price in those markets as any other stocks of the State, having the same time to run, and drawing the same interest; and the holders and purchasers rely as confidently, and as exclusively, upon the State, for the payment of both interest and principal upon them, as do the holders and purchasers of any other of the stocks of the same State. Indeed, Mr. W. said he could not say whether there was any thing in the form, or upon the face, of these certificates of stock, which would distinguish them to a stranger from the certificates of stock issued for the exclusive benefit of the State itself.

It was true that the companies and associations had made certain pledges to the State for the payment of the interest upon these stocks, and the final redemption of the principal; and the theory of the transactions unquestionably was that these pledges were sufficient to indemnify the State against its liability. It was true, too, he believed, with a single exception, and that trifling in amount, that the companies and associations had, as yet, met the payments of interest. There was one case, however, where the payments, even of interest, had ceased almost with the issuing of the stock, and the State had been compelled to make those payments since, without any other hope than to be forced to redeem the principal without any indemnity. He hoped this was not a sample case for these liabilities, but a solitary exception. Yet was he, was the honorable committee, whose report was under discussion, at liberty to disregard these stocks, when giving to the Union and the world the amount of the debt of the State of New York? Were they permitted to proclaim to the holders of these stocks, and to future purchasers, that the State does not owe them; that they constitute no part of its debt? And were they to do this, to sustain the credit of the State in the markets of the world? He could not draw such conclusions from such premises.

There were other grounds upon which the Governor and Comptroller of his State differred, in their respective statements of the amount of its public debt. The Comptroller has given the exact amount of the solemn obligations of the State, outstanding and unpaid. The Governor has given the amount which the State would owe, in case all these pledges of the canal, navigation, and railroad companies, were actually redeemed, and certain money of the State, said to be on hand, were actually applied to the payment of its debts.

The state of facts in relation to one portion of the money spoken of in the message of the Governor, is this. The Erie and Champlain Canal fund, protected and pledged in the Constitution of the State for the payment of the debt contracted for the construction of those canals, has afforded revenue more than sufficient to meet the respective portions of the debts, as they become payable. The inconvenience and risk of accumulations of money constitutionally pledged to a particular application, have induced the State officers, having charge of this money, for several years past, to offer strong pecuniary inducement to the holders of these stocks to bring them in for payment before their maturity. These efforts for the final extinguishment of that debt, have failed as to a large amount of the stocks, they being principally five and six per cent. stocks held in Europe, and not redeemable until the year 1845. The amount thus outstanding is given in the report of the Comptroller referred to, at $2,167,558 94. For the payment of this portion of its debt, the State had done what he hoped it would always be able and disposed to do—had accumulated and was keeping the money to meet the debt when it should become due, or when it should be presented for payment. Yet were these stocks, in the hands of bona fide holders, less a debt of the State, because the money to pay them was provided? And could the debt of the State be truly given by this committee of the Senate, without including this portion of it? If the Federal Government were, upon this day, to assume the debts of the various States of this Union, should we be at liberty to say to the State of New York, we will not pay this part of your debt, because you had money enough in your treasury to pay it when we agreed to pay your debts? These stocks are in the markets of the world: and can the State, in justice to itself, to its credit, or to the holders of this portion of its responsible paper, say it is no longer our debt, because we have once prepared the money to meet it before it was legally payable, and before you could legally demand it? He had not been able to satisfy himself of the truth of any of these positions, and therefore he had included this amount as a part of the debt of the State in the sum furnished by him to the committee.

A single other ground of difference between the amount of the State debt as given by the Governor and the Comptroller would be noticed, though he did not hold himself particularly responsible to reconcile their statements. His Excellency states that nearly a million of dollars of the money borrowed to be expended upon two of the works named has not been expended, but is yet on hand, and this money he deducts from the debt of the State. The stocks, by which this money has been obtained, have been issued, and are now in the hands of bona fide purchasers, or are offered in the public markets as safe transferable securities for money. And are they no part of the debt of the State? Could the amount of that debt be truly given, excluding these stocks? To him it seemed not, and therefore this amount also was included in the sum given to the committee as the true amount of the State debt. Would the honorable Senator [Mr. SOUTHARD] differ from him in his conclusions upon these points? He would give him a familiar case to illustrate his views. Had he borrowed, or should he borrow, of the gentleman, one hundred dollars, and execute to him his promissory note for the amount, payable at a future day, with interest, would that note cease to be a debt in favor of the Senator, and against himself, because he should keep the same or some other hundred dollars of money in his pocket? He was very well aware that the hundred dollars in hand, if he chose so to apply it, would prove his ability to pay the debt, but it would be none the less a debt against him, until the application was made, payment perfected, and the evidence of indebtedness destroyed or cancelled. He was as well aware that it had been ingeniously attempted upon the other side to show that the mention of these State debts by the committee, and by the friends of the report in argument, was an insinuation of the inability or want of intention on the part of the States to pay, and in that way to introduce the doctrine for which they seemed to contend, that the disposition to pay the debts, and the ability to pay them, was equivalent to actual payment, and should abrogate the debts themselves in the statements of the report. Who had attempted to impugn the faith, or question the means of any one of the States to meet the debts it had contracted? No such idea or suggestion had met his ear as he listened to the reading of the report, and he challenged gentlemen to point out any such sentiment upon its face. Who had pretended to question, here, the willingness or ability of the State of New York to pay its debt, whether it should be called nine or fifteen millions? Certainly no one had, unless that inference was to be drawn from the attempt to show that the State does not in fact acknowledge as a debt, those transferable stocks which have been issued in pursuance of its laws, and sold in the market upon the strength of its faith and credit.

[Mr. CLAY of Alabama here inquired if Mr. WRIGHT would not give way to a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Executive business.]

Mr. W. said he was spending more time in this explanation than he had intended, and he would leave it. He desired, however, to make a very few remarks further this evening; was sorry to find he was exhausting the patience of the Senate; and would hasten to a conclusion.

What was the subject presented to the Senate for its action by the report of the committee under consideration? Was it the amount of the State debts, or their security in the hands of the holders of the stocks and bonds? Was it the soundness of the positions or the clearness and correctness of the reasoning of the report itself? It was none of these things. The resolutions presented by the committee were the only subjects upon which the Senate was requested to act, or could act. The report was nothing more than the argument of the committee to sustain their conclusions, which were given in the resolutions. What were they? Simple, concise, and intelligible declarations that it would be unjust, inexpedient, and unconstitutional for Congress to pass a law assuming the debts of the States, and charging their payment upon this Government. The amount and the existence of the debts of the States are mentioned in the report for no other purpose than that of argument and illustration to establish the conclusions to which the committee have come. Still the report, and not the resolutions, had been made the subject of the debate for two days. References to it as the argument of the committee to support their conclusions were manifestly proper, and refutations of their positions and reasoning was a fair mode of combating the conclusions based upon it. Had the debate hitherto seemed to have had that object? Did there appear to be any difference of opinion among the members of the Senate in relation to an assumption by this Government of the debts of the States?

The committee, it was true, had been called upon to say by what authority they acted at all in this matter? How it was that they had assumed to present to the Senate a long argumentative report and various resolutions, against a proposition which no man had made or contemplated? They had answered that they acted by special order of the Senate; that they were constituted a select committee of the body solely to consider and report upon this subject; that it had been referred to them in the form of resolutions submitted by a Senator not a member of the committee; that they were in no way responsible for bringing the matter before the Senate, and had acted upon it under the express order of the Senate, according to their best judgments, and in the conscientious discharge of what they believed to be their public duty. These answers of the committee had not appeared to be satisfactory, and the complaints against them for having acted at all upon the subject were continued, while all seemed to express astonishment at the very idea of an assumption of the State debts by this Government. This he understood to be the spirit and tendency of the remarks of the honorable Senators from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] and Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] yesterday, of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] on both days, and of the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. SOUTHARD] to-day.

[Mr. WEBSTER here rose to explain. He said he did not express astonishment at the idea of the assumption, but at the manner in which the subject had been brought before the Senate, without the application of a single State in the Union, or even of any individual citizen.]

Mr. W. said he asked the pardon of the Senator. He certainly did not intend to misrepresent him. He had listened attentively to his remarks, addressed to the Senate on yesterday, and had inferred from them that he was distinctly opposed to the assumption, and astonished that the matter should be treated as one in the serious contemplation of any body. If he and his friends were in favor of the assumption, he had wholly misapprehended them, and was glad to be corrected, as he would not designedly misrepresent their opinions upon this, or any subject.

[Mr. WEBSTER rose again in explanation. He said he had not declared himself in favor of the assumption; and he called upon the Senator to refer to any thing he had said which constituted such a declaration.]

Mr. W. said he was again at fault, but certainly unintentionally. He had quoted the honorable gentleman as against the assumption, and was corrected. He had now spoken of him as for it, and was again corrected. It was evident, therefore, that he did not understand his position, and he would leave its explanation to himself. He had been felicitating himself that there was no division of sentiment in the body in relation to the resolutions tendered by the committee; but in that, too, he was probably mistaken.

He was very properly reminded by a Senator near him, that the question now depending was simply upon printing the report and resolutions. Upon that question he had not one word to say. He had followed the course of the debate hitherto, and if he had wandered from the proper point for remark, that had led him away.

He must follow it one step further, which should close what he had to say at present. This report had met a resistance, upon its very entrance into this chamber, which had been offered to very few papers of any character since he had had the honor of a seat here. The principal matter of the charge, too, had surprised him quite as much as the time and manner of it. What was the great and grave objection which had been rolled with so much force and energy from this to the other side of the hall? It was that the report was an attack upon the sovereign States of this Union; a violent infringement of State rights; a servile war upon them. A proper regard for the rights of the States, as members of the Confederacy, was said to be one of the professed doctrines of the party to which he belonged, and yet a flagrant violation of every principle of it was supposed to be proclaimed in this report. For himself, he could say, as did the honorable Senator who sits before him, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] he had never made much pretension upon this point, but he believed he regarded the principle and the duty of preserving the State sovereignties in our system, as deeply as most public men. Yet he was bound to say the danger to them from the paper presented by this committee, and now upon the table of the Secretary, was not so perceptible to him as it seemed to be to those who had not even professed to belong to the State Rights school.

What was the violation of right complained of, and whence the danger apprehended? Giving the amount of the debt of a State was the violation of its sovereign right, and talking about that debt was to be the destruction of its public credit? Talking about it how? Suggesting the inability of the State to pay? No: for no such suggestion is contained in the report, or has been made in debate. Impeaching its faith and intention to pay? No: for no such impeachment is put forth, or even insinuated, in or out of the report. Talking, then, of the debts as existing, of their amounts, of the revenue arising to the States from the objects of expenditure for which the debts have been contracted, and of the impolicy of separating the one from the the other, and of leaving the revenues to the States, while the debts, interest, and principal, are thrown upon this Government for payment. This is the manner in which the report speaks of the State debts, and here, if any where, must be found the support for the grave charges which are made against it.

Mr. W. said he would take his own State for an example. The report assumed to state the amount of its debt. It was apprehended that the statement was excessive, and yet the report declares that the revenues annually accruing from the objects of expenditure are more than sufficient to meet the interest upon the amount of debt given. Is the statement of these facts, in a report to the Senate by one of its committees, an infringement of the sovereign rights of that State? Are the facts stated calculated to destroy its credit at home and abroad, and thus to bring unmerited injury upon it? In short, Mr. President, said Mr W. is the credit of any one of the free and proud States of this Union so frail and feeble, and sustained upon so unreal a basis, that the simple truth, told in relation to its pecuniary liabilities, will destroy it? Will any man in these seats claim the fact to be so as to the State he represents here? Will any one assert or believe it as to the State from which I come, and of the financial affairs of which I suppose I am permitted, at all times, here and elsewhere, respectfully and truly to speak? Sir, she has hitherto paid her debt faster than it has fallen due, and so long as wisdom shall guide her councils she will continue to do so. She has the means to preserve her faith and her credit, without depending upon the ignorance of the world as to her liabilities; and if the time shall come when she shall be willing to pledge the former, or to send forth the latter for a market, relying upon such a dependence, that will be the time when the truth should be known, regardless of the consequences to her.

Take her debt, sir, and who believes it unjust to her to urge the inexpediency of separating it from her rich revenues, and throwing it upon this Government for payment? To her it is light, because, in the course of its contraction, she has laid the foundation for permanent revenues, more than sufficient to meet the accruing interest. Transfer it here, without those revenues, and it becomes a dead weight. So with the debts of all the other States. They, too, must be separated from the revenues, which have been made consequent upon them, if they are assumed by this Government; and in such a general arrangement, the existing burdens of New York could not be lessened, while they might be fearfully increased. Her proportion of any debt of this Government would rest as directly and as heavily upon her people, as an equal amount of her own debt, while the interest would be met, and the principal redeemed, not by her revenues, set apart for the purpose, but by the heavy operation of the taxing power here.

Think you, sir, she will call upon you, under such circumstances, and with such prospects, to assume her debt? I confidently hope and believe not. She has been to you once. I believe she was the first to ask your aid for objects of internal expenditure. You refused her rightly then, and I pray she may be the last to invite another refusal.

Let the States manage their own affairs in their own way, in reference to their local expenditures, and the debts to be contracted for them. They will have the revenues to be derived, and let them meet the payments to be made, not separate the one from the other, and tie the debts, with the weight of a millstone, about the neck of this Government.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 16, 1840.

Mr. BENTON moved to strike out from the 19th and 20th sections of the bill the clauses which permitted the reception and disbursement of Federal paper; and read the sections to show how they now stood, and what would be the effect of the proposed amendment, if made. The sections were in these words:

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That from and after the thirtieth day of June, which will be in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty, the resolution of Congress of the thirtieth day of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, so far as it authorises the receipt in payment of duties, taxes, sales of public lands, debts, and sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States, to be collected and paid in the notes of specie paying banks, shall be so modified as that one-fourth part of all such duties, taxes, sales of public lands, debts, and sums of money accruing or becoming due to the United States, shall be collected in the legal currency of the United States; and from and after the thirtieth day of June, which will be in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, one other fourth part of all such duties, taxes, sales of public lands, debts, and sums of money, shall be so collected; and that from and after the thirtieth day of June, which will be in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, one other fourth part of all such duties, taxes, sales of public lands, debts, and sums of money, shall be so collected; and that from and after the thirtieth day of June, which will be in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-three, the remaining fourth part of the said duties, taxes, sales of public lands, debts, and sums of money, shall be also collected in the legal currency of the United States; and from and after the last mentioned day, all sums accruing, or becoming payable to the United States, for duties, taxes, sales of public lands, or other debts, and also all sums due for postages or otherwise, to the General Post Office Department, shall be paid in gold and silver only, (or in such notes, bills, or paper, issued under the authority of the United States, as may be directed to be received by law in payment of the public dues.)

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the thirtieth day of June, which will be in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-three, every officer or agent engaged in making disbursements on account of the United States, or of the General Post Office, shall make all payments in gold and silver coin only, (or in such notes, bills, or paper, issued under the authority of the United States, as may be directed to be received by law;) and any receiving or disbursing officer, or agent, who shall neglect, evade, or violate, the provisions of this and the last preceding section of this act, shall, by the Secretary of the Treasury, be immediately reported to the President of the United States, with the facts of such neglect, evasion, or violation, and also to Congress, if in session, and, if not in session, at the commencement of its session next after the violation takes place.

Mr. B. said that these two sections constituted the specie feature of the bill; but as they now stood they were very far from being what the act of 1789 was, and to which act he wished to carry back the fiscal action of the Federal Government. That act, made as it was by the framers of the Constitution, and immediately after they had framed it, declared that the revenue should be collected "in gold and silver coin only;" and these two sections, after repealing the same enactment to take effect on the 30th day of June, 1843, went on to add an exception in favor of Federal paper money, which ran in these words: "or in such notes, bills, or paper, issued under the authority of the United States as may be directed to be received by law." The act of '89 contained no such exception as this; and it was very clear that, leaving this clause in the two sections, and the whole currency of the Federal Government might become paper—its own paper—and not a shilling of hard money be received or paid out by the Federal Government. I know very well that the Finance Committee, which reported this bill, does not mean to defend this clause. The two sections which contain it, were copied from the bill as it passed at the extra session of 1837; and were part of the amendment then offered by a Senator not of the committee, and adopted by the Senate. At that time an issue of Treasury notes, receivable in payment of public dues, was a part of the policy of the Government; and an exception in their favor seemed to be necessary. But that necessity no longer exists. The last of the Treasury notes now out would be redeemable on and before the 30th day of June next; and trusting that no more of these notes will ever be issued in time of peace, I am for closing the door upon them with the expiration of the present issue, and cutting them off from Federal payments and receipts as soon as the specie clause takes full effect. This will not be until June, 1843; that is to say, until three years after they cease by the law of their creation to be receivable in payment of public dues. As the interest will cease upon them in June next, it is probable that none of these notes will be outstanding three years after that period. If they are, they can be paid in gold and silver at the Treasury; and it would be too much, for a contingency so improbable, and for an object so inconsiderable, to mar a main feature of the bill, by making any provision for their reception. But the clause, as it now stands, goes entirely beyond the receivability of present outstanding Treasury notes: it is not limited to the present issue of these notes, or even to Treasury notes themselves; but extends to the general and permanent reception and disbursement of the "notes, bills, or paper" issued by the authority of the United States, and directed to be received by law in payment of public dues. This is opening the door, not merely to present Treasury notes, or even future ones, but to every species of Federal paper money whatsoever; and consequently is, in my opinion, opening the door to an unconstitutional and most dangerous practice, totally at war with the idea of a hard money Government.

I am opposed to Federal paper money just as much as I am to bank notes, either local or national. So far as mischief is concerned, I consider Federal paper money the most dangerous which our country could see; for I consider the mischiefs of paper money to be in proportion to the power and irresponsibility of the issuer. The greater that power, and the more irresponsible, so much wider will be the sphere of its paper circulation, and so much the more helpless its holders, in the event of the catastrophes to which all paper money is subject. This was the case with the paper money of the Continental Congress. Their issues at first were moderate, and their bills were equal to gold and silver; but, having no superior to check them, they went on with their issues, until they amounted to two hundred millions of dollars, and the whole fell dead upon the community. The men who did that were as honest, as patriotic, and as wise as their posterity can ever be. They were among the best and greatest which the history of the human race has revealed to our view. They deserve the applause and the gratitude of the latest generations; yet, in the irresponsible issue of paper money, and its dreadful effects, they have left us an admonition never to adventure upon it, if we had the power. But we have not the power. The illustrious sages and patriots who, in their dire necessity, and in the throes and convulsions of our national birth, had recourse to the expedient of paper money to save the life itself of the country, took care to interdict their posterity from the same dangerous resort. They gave them a Constitution for their guidance; and in that Constitution they adopted gold and silver as the only legal currency of the land, and utterly prohibited the legal tender of any thing else. This is what they did to save us from the misfortunes into which they fell; and regardless we must be, both of constitutional obligations, and of the warning voice of history, if we do not profit by their care to save us.

The two sections which I have read are intended to restore the fiscal action of our Government to the standard of the Constitution; and, as far as bank paper is concerned, they do so; but this exception in favor of the "notes, bills, and paper," issued under the authority of the United States, is a sad and ruinous qualification of "the specie clause." It repeals that clause in toto! It subjects the Government to become, not a hard money Government, but a mere paper machine, doing all its business in paper, and making our sub treasuries mere warehouses of paper. It recognises the habitual use of Treasury notes; that most easy and seductive mode of going into debt, and that entering wedge to the paper system, and stepping stone to a depreciated currency! I detest these Treasury notes; in time of peace, I abhor, detest and eschew them. In time of war only are they fit to be thought of; and if the Federal Government can do its duty in relation to the currency, there will be no occasion for them even in time of war. Our hard money currency has risen, in eight years, from twenty millions to ninety millions; and may be increased in a few years more to such an amount as to enable the expenses of the most extensive war to be defrayed exclusively in gold and silver coin. The Great Emperor raised the currency of France from all paper to all specie, in six years. In 1799, when placed at the head of affairs as First Consul, he found the currency a mass of ruin—nothing but assignats and mandats depreciated a thousand per cent; yet in six years thereafter, when called to celebrate the immortal days of Austerlitz, Jena and Friedland, when the gigantic wars, the internal ameliorations, the national defences, and the almost fabulous magnificence of the imperial court, had carried the annual Government expenses to eight hundred million of francs—one hundred and sixty millions of dollars—the whole was paid in gold and silver! and the same precious metals constituted the exclusive common currency of the forty millions of souls which constituted the population of the empire. This is what one man did in six years; and can we not, in three or four years more, increase our specie from ninety millions to as much as will defray all the expenses of our Government in any war in which it can be involved, and furnish the common currency of our population besides? Surely we can; and nothing but the errors of vicious legislation can prevent us from doing so; and thus save a recourse, even in time of war, to the perilous resort of Treasury notes.

Sir, these sentiments which I now express in relation to Treasury notes, are not new conceptions with me. They are old principles, deep seated in my bosom, and often declared on this floor. Often have I declared them; and, not to fatigue the Senate with multiplied quotations, I will limit myself to the citation of some part of what I said three years ago, at the called session, and when the Government found itself reduced, in consequence of the deposite of its money with the States, to the deplorable necessity of proposing an issue of these notes. I then said:

"I will now say a few words on the policy of issuing Treasury notes in time of peace, or even in time of war, until the ordinary resources of loans and taxes had been tried and exhausted. I am no friend to the issue of Treasury notes of any kind. As loans, they are a disguised mode of borrowing, and easy to slide into a currency; as a currency, it is the most seductive, the most dangerous, and the most liable to abuse, of all the descriptions of paper money. 'The stamping of paper (by Government) is an operation so much easier than the laying of taxes, or of borrowing money, that a Government in the habit of paper emissions would rarely fail, in any emergency, to indulge itself in the employment of that resource, to avoid, as much as possible, one less auspicious to present popularity.' So said General Hamilton; and in that, all the fathers of the Republican church—Jefferson, Madison, Macon, Randolph, and all the rest—concurred with him. These sagacious statesmen were shy of this facile and seductive resource, so liable to abuse, and so certain of being abused. They held it inadmissible to recur to it in time of peace, and that it could only be thought of in time of war; and that after exhausting the direct and responsible alternatives of loans and taxes. Bred in the school of these great men, I came here at this session to oppose, at all risks, an issue of Treasury notes. I preferred a loan, for many and cogent reasons," &c.

This was my language in relation to Treasury notes three years ago; it is my language now. No earthly consideration could now induce me to vote for an issue of these notes, even a single issue, confined to a special occasion, and limited to a particular amount. How then could I vote for these sections, with this clause in them, which goes to recognise as an habitual practice, the issue of "notes, bills, or paper" by the Federal Government, and to make this indefinite paper the ordinary medium of payment in the receipts and disbursements of the Federal Government. Limited to the reception of the Treasury notes, actually now out, and it might pass without strenuous objection; but there is no necessity for such limit even, for the reasons I have before given. Limited to these, and the clause might stand without exciting a strenuous objection; but unlimited and indefinite as it now is, and going to recognise and invite an issue of all sorts of paper by the Federal Government, the clause becomes unconstitutional and indefensible, and directly at war with our hard money professions. But it will not stand. The committee which reported the bill, and retained this clause, because it was adopted by the Senate in 1837; this committee will not defend it; and I believe I know enough of the mind of the Senate to say that it will be rejected by an almost unanimous vote.*

I believe it will be almost unanimously rejected, and the two sections thus brought to a precise conformity with the great act of 1789—that act which required the revenues to be paid in gold and silver coin only. Yes, sir, in these coins only! or, as I might say it in the old English idiom, one-ly; for our only is a contraction of the old English one-ly; which is more expressive than the contraction, and plainly imports integrity and individuality—the one thing by itself. The clause will be struck out; the act of 1789 will be re-established; that act which General Hamilton repealed and reversed by construction, and to prevent any future Hamilton from doing which a penal sanction is now added to the section. The twentieth section of the bill, after providing for this restoration of the act of '89, goes on to guard it from future violation in these words: "And any receiving or disbursing officer, or agent, who shall neglect, evade, or violate the provisions of this and the last preceding section of this act, shall, by the Secretary of the Treasury, be immediately reported to the President of the United States, with the facts of such neglect, evasion, or violation; and also to Congress, if in session; and if not in session, at the commencement of its session next after the violation takes place." This is the penal sanction to prevent the future violation of the great act of 1789, restored to its original force by this Independent Treasury bill. The violator of the act is to be reported to the President, who, as sworn to see the laws faithfully executed, will well know what disposition to make of the offender. If the President should fail in his duty, the two Houses of Congress will have the information which will bring the case before themselves.

Mr. President, this is a great point in the great measure before us; it is one out of the two great points which the Independent Treasury system presents. That system presents but two points, namely, first, the exclusive use of gold and silver coin by the Federal Government; secondly, the exclusive keeping of its own money by its own officers. These two points constitute the system; all the rest is detail; and this system effects the total divorce between Bank and State; and not only between Bank and State, but between the State on one side, and the whole paper system on the other. I am now employed upon one of these points—the first one of the two. The motion which I have made, and the speech which I am making, go to the first point; and in the success—the probable success which awaits it—I see the consummation of a long and cherished object, at which I have faithfully labored for ten years—labored as long as the siege of Troy lasted. In the very first speech which I delivered against the rechatter of the Bank of the United States—a speech delivered in the session of 1830–31—I took the ground of a hard money currency for the Federal Government, and its total disconnection from the paper system. I had seen the evils of a resort to local bank paper by the Federal Government. I had seen the error—the great and grievous error—of those who terminated the first Bank of the United States, and left the Union without any national currency, either paper or metallic. I had seen the evils of that error in the deplorable state of our finances and currency during the war of 1812–15; and, in laboring to terminate the existence of the second Bank, which was born of the error committed in relation to the first one: in laboring to terminate this second Bank, I aimed at avoiding the error of my precursors of 1811, and to provide a national currency of gold and silver in place of the national currency of bank notes. I was determined to avoid the error of 1811—to eschew the use of local bank paper—and, in escaping from the arms of the great monster, to take good care not to fall into the claws of the little ones. This was disclosed in my first speech against the Bank, delivered on the 2d of February, 1831; and here is an extract from it, which establishes what I say:

'I am willing to see the charter expire, without providing any substitute for the present Bank. I am willing to see the currency of the Federal Government left to the HARD MONEY mentioned and intended in the Constitution; I am willing to have a HARD MONEY GOVERNMENT, as that of France has been since the time of assignats and mandats. Every species of paper might be left to the State authorities, unrecognised by the Federal Government, and only touched by it for its own convenience when equivalent to gold and silver. Such a currency filled France with the precious metals, when England, with her overgrown bank, was a prey to all the evils of unconvertible paper. It furnished money enough for the imperial Government when the population of the empire was three times more numerous, and the expenses of Government twelve times greater, than the population and expenses of the United States; and, when France possessed no mines of gold or silver, and was destitute of the exports which command the specie of other countries. The United States possess gold mines, now yielding half a million per annum, with every prospect of equalling those of Peru. But this is not the best dependence. We have what is superior to mines, namely, the exports which command the money of the world; that is to say, the food which sustains life, and the raw materials which sustain manufactures. Gold and silver is the best currency for a republic; it suits the men of middle property and the working people best; and, if I was going to establish a working man's party, it should be on the basis of hard money; a hard money party against a paper party."

Thus, Mr. President, near ten years ago, I disclosed my sentiments on this subject. I then proposed the restoration of the gold and silver currency of the Constitution to the Federal Government, and the total disconnection of the Government from the paper system. This plan I have kept in view from that day to this; and have faithfully labored to accomplish it. Three years ago, believing that the time had arrived for executing the plan which I had so long meditated, I brought into the Senate a bill entitled "to re-establish the currency of the Constitution for the Federal Government," the enactments of which were consonant to its title. It proposed the gradual disuse of paper, and the progressive return to the hard money standard; and was both in its mode of operating, and in the time it would require to attain its object, the exact substance of the two sections before you—the exact substance of what they will be when the amendment is made, which I have just had the honor to propose. That bill was in these words:

"A bill to re-establish the currency of the Constitution for the Federal Government.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That bank notes and paper currency of every description shall cease to be received, or offered in payment, on account of the United States, or of the Post Office, or in fees in the courts of the United States, as follows: Of less denomination than twenty dollars, none shall be so received after the third day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight; of less denomination than one hundred dollars, none after the third day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-nine; of less denomination than five hundred dollars, none after the third day of March, eighteen hundred and forty; of less denomination than one thousand dallars, none after the third day of March, eighteen hundred and forty-one; and none of any denomination, from and after the third day of March, eighteen hundred and forty-two.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any person holding an appointment under the laws of the United States, and any bank employed to keep public moneys, which person or bank shall neglect, evade, violate, contravene, or in any way elude, or attempt to elude, the provisions of this act, shall be guilty of an offence against the laws; and the person so offending, shall be liable to be dismissed from the service; and the bank so offending shall, on satisfactory information, be discontinued as a depository of public moneys."

This was my bill; and now, Mr. President, behold the workings of time, and the results of experience. When that bill was brought into the Senate, it stood here, so far as my knowledge and information extends, without a solitary supporter except its author! Solitary and alone he stood at its back: in a minority of one he ran the chance to be left in any vote which should be taken upon it. Then it was that I had an opportunity—one out of many which a friendly intercourse of near twenty years has afforded me—to test the goodness of the heart, and the kindness of the feelings, of the Senator from Pennsylvania who sits over the way, [Mr. BUCHANAN.] That Senator saw the predicament of my bill: he saw it would get no support. He had seen me solitary and alone on many occasions; and rightly judged that a public man might be disparaged in the public estimation, who appeared habitually without supporters in a public body. He came round to me from the seat where he now sits, to the place where I now stand; and, after a suitable introduction, to prepare my feelings for the catastrophe, he proposed to me to ask leave to withdraw my bill, or to have it laid upon the table, as the means of extricating myself from the solitary exhibition which awaited me. Now, it so happened that I had not the least objection, so far as I was personally concerned, in standing alone in support of that bill. I had fully committed myself for it by bringing it in; I looked ahead and saw the day that I might be proud of it: but, deference for the kind feelings of my friend, and to show him that his intimations were taken in the sense in which they were intended, I agreed to have it quietly dropped, by being laid upon the table: and another friend, [Mr. WRIGHT, of New York,] with the concurrence of the author, moved to lay it upon the table. It is a gentle motion—something equivalent to backing out—and is rarely opposed; but on that occasion it was opposed, and some little effort was made to hold the bill up for a vote; but the Senate permitted it to go down upon the table. It went down without noise. No yeas and nays were called upon it; and thus I lost the honor, in 1836, of voting alone for a measure which, in 1840, will command the unanimous vote of my party. The day has come which I foresaw. Time, and its events, have accomplished what my endeavors could not effect; and two suspensions of the banks in three years have brought the Democratic party to the point I was at many years ago,

*It was so rejected: the vote being thirty-three against, six for the clause.

The bill which I proposed in 1836, and the nineteenth and twentieth sections of the Independent Treasury bill (when amended as they will be) are identical. They propose the same end, approach it in the same gradual way, arrive at it at the same time, and guard it with the same sanctions. They are both to re-establish the currency of the Constitution for the Federal Government; and this re-establishment of that currency is one out of the two principles which constitute the Independent Treasury system.

My motion now is to strike out certain words from the specie feature of this bill, and thereby to make it conformable to the words, spirit, and meaning of our Constitution, and to the great act of 1789. My motion is, in effect, to restore that act, and to restore it completely, by excluding Federal paper money as well as bank paper money from the receipts and disbursements of the General Government. Sir, this is a great point in the case, and I mean to make it clear. My assertion is, that the act of 1789—the first act for the collection of Federal revenue—made gold and silver only receivable in payment of the public dues—that General Hamilton, then Secretary of the Treasury, nullified and reversed that act by construction—and that the specie clause in this bill is intenced to restore the act of 1789, and to prevent any future Hamilton from construing it away. This is my assertion; and the proof is for hcoming to sustain it. At page 27, vol. 2, of the laws of the United States, (Duane's edition,) being the 30th section of the first revenue law ever passed by Congress, is found these words: "The duties and fees to be collected by virtue of this act SHALL BE RECEIVED IN GOLD AND SILVER COIN ONLY." This is the act—these the words of the fundamental act, for the collection of the Federal revenue. The bare reading of them establishes the fact that the first Congress which ever sat under the Constitution, and composed, in great part, of the men who actually framed that instrument, the bare reading establishes the fact that this first Congress enacted an exclusive specie currency for the Federal Government. This point being established, the next inquiry is, how came the Government to slide off immediately into a paper money currency, and to remain ever since involved and enthralled in the miseries and losses of the paper system? The answer to this question is, that the then Secretary of the Treasury, General Hamilton, took upon himself to nullify the act by construction, and to construe the words "gold and silver coin only," to signify bank notes; and upon this construction, ordered these notes to be received, and thereby involved the United States in the banking and paper system, which has continued to the present day, and from which it is the object of the present bill to extricate us. Upon this point Gen. Hamilton shall have the benefit of his own words; and I will read to the Senate the report which he made to Congress on his construction of this act, and which contains his argument in vindication of his conduct. He says:

"This section (the 30th of the act of 1789) provides for the receipt of the duties in gold and silver coin only. The Secretary has considered this provision as having for object, the exclusion of payments in the paper emissions of the particular States, and the securing the immediate or ultimate collection of the duties in specie, as intended to prohibit to individuals the right of paying in any thing except gold and silver coin; but not to hinder the Treasury from making such arrangements as its exigences, the speedy command of the public resources, and the convenience of the community, might dictate; those arrangements being compatible with the eventual receipt of the duties in specie. For instance, the Secretary did not imagine that the provision ought to be so understood as to prevent, if necessary, an anticipation of the duties by Treasury drafts receivable at the several custom-houses. And, if it ought not to be understood in this sense, it appeared to him that the principle of a different construction would extend to the permitting the receipt of the notes of public banks, issued on a specie fund. * * * * * Such were the reflections of the Secretary with regard to the authority to permit bank notes to be taken in payment of the duties. The expediency of doing it appeared to him to be still less questionable. The extension of their circulation by the measure is calculated to increase both the ability and the inclination of the banks to aid the Government. It also accelerates the command of the product of the revenues for the public service, and it facilitates the payment of the duties," &c.

This was the reasoning of General Hamilton, that eminent and bold man, who was the great founder of the Federal sect. To nullify express words by construction—to judge a constitutional question by its expediency—to sacrifice gold and silver to paper—to marry the Government and the banks together—and to make the former dependent upon the aid of the latter; this was his conduct and his policy; and this has been the conduct and policy of the sect which he founded for the fifty years which it has existed.

This was the reasoning of General Hamilton; this his argument, to show that gold and silver coin only signified bank notes! Certainly nothing more fallacious—not to say audacious—ever fell from the lips of man. It was an insult to the understanding, and a contempt for the spirit of those to whom it was addressed. But it was addressed to a Congress of Federal members; to a Congress in which the Democracy had no weight, and the majority of which immediately proceeded to chain the whole Federal Government to the British paper system, by chartering a National Bank with British stockholders, funding the soldiers' certificates, assuming State debts, and creating a stockjobbing interest to feed and fatten upon the credit and revenues of the Union—to rule its politics, and to consider the administration of the Government as wholly subordinate to their own schemes of wealth and aggrandisement. This was the Congress to which General Hamilton made his report, and which received it with the submission and acquiescence which might be expected from such a body. They shut their eyes upon the mockery which was made of the law, and they submitted to the insult to which the excuse implied to themselves. This was fifty years ago; and now, at last, after half a century's suffering from the effects of that violation of law, and after the glorious revival of Democracy under the administration of General Jackson, a Congress sits to do the work which ought to have been done by the Congress which received General Hamilton's report. That Congress ought to have rebuked his conduct, re-enacted its hard money clause, and guarded it with penal sanctions from future violations. This is what they ought to have done. It is what they did not do; and it is what we are now doing for them. The Independent Treasury, with its specie clause, is to do this; and the contest upon this bill—the division of parties for and against it—is the contest, and the division, of the Hamiltonian Federalists and the Jeffersonian Democrats of fifty years ago.

Believing this point to be now sufficiently established, and that this enactment will be looked upon in its true light, as a mere restoration of the fiscal action of the Government to its primitive and constitutional course, I proceed to the more general observations, connected with the second feature, and the general policy of the bill. The second feature of the bill is, that the Federal Government shall be the keeper, and the exclusive keeper, of its own money. The heavy losses in the revenue, twice in three years, from employing banks to keep our money, have opened the eyes of almost all to the folly and impolicy of employing such keepers. The impolicy of it is given up by almost all: the Federal party only wish for a National Bank to be employed as the keeper. The Democracy refuse the custody of the public money to all banks: they go back to the Constitution, which required it to be kept in the Federal Treasury, and not to be drawn out of that Treasury, except by a Treasury warrant founded upon a law of Congress. The Constitution is express, that, no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law. This is the Constitution; and its mandate is clear that the United States shall have a Treasury, which Treasury shall contain all our money, and from which no money shall be taken except on a Treasurer's warrant, founded on a law of Congress. All this is clear; and conformable to it was the first action of the Federal Government. There was no National Bank when the Constitution was made, nor for some years after; there were but three local banks then in the whole Union; the public moneys, in the first years of Washington's administration, remained chiefly in the hands of the receiving officers, whence it was drawn out upon the Treasurer's warrant. The revenues were in the custody of the Government officers, subject to the warrants of the Treasurer. This continued until General Hamilton got his banking system into operation; and then the public money went into banks, to be kept by bank officers, subject to be drawn out of the bank like the private money of the institution, and to be used at the discretion of these bank officers, not only without a law of Congress, but without its knowledge or consent. This is what General Hamilton established, and permitted to be done; and now the intention of the Independent Treasury bill is to go back to the Constitution—to define and establish the Federal Treasury—to have the public moneys put into it—and to keep them there, untouched by any hand, until a Treasurer's warrant, founded upon a law of Congress, goes to demand them. This is the second, and the remaining feature of the Treasury bill. It is merely to reform the action of the Government, and to restore it to the constitutional intention. It is a reformation, and not an innovation. It is giving a practical operation to the words of the Constitution. It is the correction of General Hamilton's second great perversion of the Constitution; and as such divides now, as it did fifty years ago, the two great political parties of the country.

The reasons for establishing an Independent Treasury are now too apparent to require argument here. Two suspensions of the banks in three years, shows that they cannot be relied upon by the Federal Government. Besides, our whole banking system is a dependency of the British system; its centre is in London; its masters are there; and, in addition to its own inherent dangers, great enough, in all conscience, it is also subject to the misfortunes, and to the orders, of the mother system in England. It must shut up, and blow up, as ordered, or suffered there; and thus the Federal Government, in keeping its money in our banks, is virtually keeping it in London, subject to the orders of Englishmen, and to the wants, or policy, misfortunes, or crimes, of their own paper system. Surely it is time to break such a dependence.

Mr. President, it is now twenty years that I have meditated, and ten years that I have been acting, on the subject matter of this bill. I came into this body at a time, and in a state of the country, calculated to make those think, and seriously think, who were elevated to the high function of national legislation. I was elected to this body in the year 1820, when the hollow and delusive paper system was undergoing one of its habitual and disastrous convulsions; and when my progress to this place—my journey from the Mississippi to the Potomac—was one long ride amidst the crashings and explosions of banks, and the cries and lamentations of a deceived and plundered people. The National Bank was then in the third year of its age; and, so far from affording a remedy for the evils, it was itself the mother of the evils, and notoriously bankrupt, except for the credit and revenues of the United States, which were lent and extended to save it. I saw with my own eyes that a National Bank was no remedy for the evils of the banking system—that it was itself the greatest and most potential author of all these evils. I saw a vast ruin overspreading the land, and I had my opinion of its cause, and of its remedy; but I was a new Senator, and a young man—novus homo, as the Romans would say of one who had appeared for the first time in the public affairs—and I was here a long time before I could act on this subject, or on any one of general and national importance. The election of General Jackson was the signal gun for the commencement of operations. With that great man in front to lead me on—with his great power behind to back me in the contest—I commenced at once the system of measures which I had so long meditated and carefully planned. It was, indeed, a SYSTEM, and a large one, and of many parts, but all tending to one object, and to one end. I commenced with a map of the whole work before me—with a financial chart spread out—on which was placed every object to be attempted, and every consequence to be deduced. Finance and commerce were placed together, according to their natural and indissoluble connection; and each were considered in relation to the other. The extinction of the national debt; the termination of the National Bank; the revival of the gold currency; the increase of the silver currency; the suppression of small bank paper; the re-establishment of the currency of the Constitution for the Federal Government; the total divorce of the Federal Government from the paper system; no surplus revenue; and the principle of reciprocity in foreign commerce: these were the objects laid down upon my map; and which, together, constituted the system at which I was to labor.

I proceeded upon a plan, consisting of many parts, but coherent in all its parts. All that I did in relation to financial, commercial, and currency questions, was subordinate to this plan, and tending to the result which I had proposed to myself. I was always moving upon my plan, howsoever detached and even insignificant the motion might seem to be; for I am not a man to act by fits and starts, sporting crude or vagabond conceptions, without regard to utility, and without consulting the auspices of propriety and effect.

Here, indeed, was a great work carved out—a large work to be performed—a great deal to be pulled down and cleared away, before any new erections could be commenced. The Bank of the United States was the centre and the citadel of the existing order of things. It was to be got rid of before any thing else could be attempted. It was the corner stone and the pillar of the paper system; and besides its general capacity to sustain that system, it was in possession of the two precise faculties which were incompatible with the existence of an Independent Treasury. It enjoyed the chartered privileges of paying the public dues in its own notes, and of keeping the public moneys in its own vaults. Now the Independent Treasury system required the Federal dues to be paid in the constitutional currency, and the Federal moneys to be kept by Federal officers. It is evident, then, that the Bank privileges must be got rid of before we could begin to build up an Independent Treasury. All this I saw from the beginning, and therefore labored to get rid of one before I began with the other.

All these objects were began; some have been pursued to success; some are on the point of being accomplished; and some even yet but inceptively presented to the public mind. Of the latter, were my anti-surplus revenue resolutions of 1828, and my commercial reciprocity resolutions of 1831. These two latter may justify a moment's elucidation at this time, so far as to show what they were; as the time is at hand when action will be attempted upon them again.

1. My anti-surplus revenue resolutions. They were brought in at several different times, and were intended to effect the repeal of the law which authorised a surplus of two millions beyond the appropriations to be permanently retained in the Treasury, to meet the contingencies of a deficient revenue. The proposition was to abolish this law; and, in lieu of keeping surplus money on hand to meet contingencies which might rarely occur, to invest the Government with contingent authority to borrow two millions or less, if, in the recess of Congress, there should be a deficiency in the Treasury to meet the demands of existing appropriations. The subject is as important now as it was then, and must command the attention of Congress sooner or later. The Secretary of the Treasury has repeatedly asked for legislation on the subject of these contingent deficiencies, and we cannot get over this session without considering his request.

2. The commercial reciprocity, and anti-public debt resolutions, are too elaborate, inferential, and argumentative to be paraphrased; and I will, therefore, give them in their own words. They stand thus on our journals:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 26, 1831.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolutions; which were read, and ordered to be printed, and laid on the table:

Resolved, That the powers conferred on Congress by the States to lay and collect duties, and to regulate commerce, are distinct and incontrovertible powers, aiming at different objects, and requiring different forms of legislative action; the levying power being confined to imports, and chiefly intended to raise revenue; the regulating power being directed to export, and solely intended to procure favorable terms in foreign ports for the admission of the ships and products of the States.

2. That the power to lay and collect duties on imports was solicited by the founders of the present Federal Government, and granted by the States, for the express purpose of paying the public debt, and with the solemn and reiterated assurance that the duties levied for that purpose should cease the moment the debt was paid; which assurance was given in answer to objections from the States, and to quiet the apprehension expressed by some of them, that the grant of power to Congress to raise revenue from the commerce of the States, without limitation of time or quantity, and without accountability to them for its expenditure, might render Congress independent of the States, and endanger their liberties and prosperity.

3. That the public debt will (probably) be paid off in the year 1834, and the amount of about twelve millions of dollars of revenue will then be subject to abolition, and ought to be abolished, according to the agreement of the parties at the establishment of the present Federal Government, and in conformity to the present actual condition and interest of the States.

4. That an abolition of twelve millions of duties will be a relief to the people from about sixteen millions of taxes, (estimating the retail merchant's advance upon the duties at one-third;) and that the said abolition may be made without diminishing the protection due to any essential branch or pursuit of domestic industry, and with manifest advantage to most of them.

5. That, for the purpose of enabling Congress to determine with entire safety to every interest, and with full satisfaction to the public mind, what branches and pursuits of domestic industry may be entitled to protection, and ought to be guarded from the injurious effects of foreign competition, a joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives ought to be appointed, to take the examinations of practical men (producers, consumers, and importers,) in all doubtful cases, and to report their evidence to the two Houses of Congress.

6. That the said committee ought to be appointed at the commencement of the next stated session.

7. That the power to regulate foreign commerce was granted to Congress by the States for the express and sole purpose of enabling Congress to obtain and secure favorable markets abroad for the exports of the States, and favorable terms for the admission of their ships, and to effect these objects by establishing an equitable system of commercial reciprocity, discrimination, and retaliation, which should measure back to every foreign nation the same degree of favor or disfavor which itself measured out to the commerce and navigation of the United States.

8. That the power to regulate foreign commerce, although one of the first of the enumerated powers in the Constitution, and the inducing cause to its adoption, has never yet been exercised by Congress.

9. That the approaching extinction of the public debt, and consequent obligation to abolish, and advantage in abolishing, about twelve millions of annual revenue, will enable the United States to receive a large portion of her foreign commerce, say the one-half thereof, free of duty; and that the fair principles of a just reciprocity, the dictates of obvious policy, justice to the States, and the constitutional duty of the Federal Government, already too long deferred, will require this Government to demand equivalents from all nations which may wish to be admitted to a participation in the enjoyment of this great amount of free and unrestricted trade.

10. That the free importation of the following articles (among others) may be admitted into the United States without compromising the prosperity of any branch or pursuit of domestic industry, and with manifest advantage to most of them; namely, linens, silks, wines, coffee, cocoa, worsted stuff goods, several descriptions of woollens, several qualities of fine cottons, several kinds of spirits, &c. &c.

11. That the free importation of the said articles ought to be offered to all nations which shall grant equivalent advantages to the commerce and navigation of the United States, and will receive the products of their industry; namely, fish, furs, lumber, naval stores, beef, bacon, pork, grain, flour, rice, cotton, tobacco, live stock, manufactures of cotton, leather, wood, and silk, butter and cheese, soap and candles, hats, glass, and gunpowder, lead, shot, and sugar, spirits made of grain and molasses, &c. &c. or some adequate proportion thereof, either free of duty, or upon payment of moderate and reasonable duties, to be agreed upon in treaties, and to continue for a term of years, and to no other nations whatever.

12. That there is nothing in existing treaty stipulations with foreign powers to prevent the regulation of our commerce upon the foregoing principles.

13. That all commercial nations will find it to their advantage to regulate their commerce with the United States on these principles, as, in doing so, they will substitute a fair and liberal trade for a trade of vexations, oppressions, restrictions, and smuggling; will obtain provisions for subsistence, and materials for manufactures, on cheaper terms and more abundantly; will promote their own exports; will increase their revenue, by increasing consumption and diminishing smuggling; and, in refusing to do so, will draw great injury upon themselves in the loss which will ensue of several great branches of their trade with the United States.

14. That the agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation of the United States would be greatly benefitted by regulating foreign trade on the foregoing principles: first, by getting rid of oppressive duties upon the staple productions of the United States in foreign markets; secondly, by lowering at home the price of many articles of comfort or necessity, imported from abroad.

15. That the safest and most satisfactory mode of regulating foreign commerce on these principles would be by combining the action of the legislative and treaty making powers, Congress fixing, by law or joint resolution, the articles on which duties may be abolished, and the Executive negotiating with foreign nations for the grant of equivalents.

16. That to be in readiness to carry this system of regulating foreign commerce into effect at the extinction of the public debt, it will be necessary for Congress to designate the articles for abolition of duty at the next stated session.

I do not stop to make any remark upon these resolutions; the time is at hand when it will be proper to renew them, and to discuss them; and the important report from the Secretary of State, (Mr. Forsyth,) called for by the Senate, at its last session, on my motion, and now in the hands of the printer, will furnish us with the means of discussing them to advantage. For the present, I will only remark, that if the principle of these resolutions had been adopted, instead of enacting that Procustes-bed act, commonly called the compromise act, whereby high duties were to be cut down, and low ones stretched up, and many abolished in toto, without equivalents; and all without "rhyme or reason," or the slightest regard to any constitutional principle or national interest—I say, if the principle of these resolutions had been adopted, in lieu of such anomalous legislation, we should not now have to lament an importation of fifty millions of free goods, without equivalents, and from countries which load our exports with taxes, and fetter them with restrictions.

I return from this digression, and proceed with the subjects immediately connected with the bill before the Senate. My financial map presented a large work; and it required time, and patience, and much labor to conquer success. To prepare the public mind for such changes—for so much pulling down, as well as building up—was the first step in the herculean undertaking; and, to do this, many speeches were to be digested and delivered; and speeches of a different kind from those which the rhetoricians teach us to pronounce. We live in an age of intelligence and activity, and when the public mind is powerfully directed to objects of utility. In speaking to such a people, I concluded that, of the six parts of the regular oration, four parts might be thrown away: that I could dispense with all except the facts, and the application of the facts, cemented and enforced by reason. Upon this plan I spoke. My speeches were stripped of ornament, stinted of phrases, and crowded with material. They were brimfull of facts and reasons; and this was a compliment to the intelligence of the age in which I lived. The compliment was not misapplied: the intelligence of the age was not overrated. The event has proved that it was not. At the end of some years the public debt was paid—the National Bank was laid in the tomb—the gold currency was revived—the silver currency was vastly augmented—a return to the constitutional currency for the Federal Government became a measure of the Democracy—the separation of the Government from the paper system became equally their measure: and political parties, returning to the debate and controversy of original principles, exhibited themselves on the respective grounds of Federalism and Democracy which they stood upon in the early days of Hamilton and Jefferson.

Besides preparing the public mind for great changes, the means and machinery of the changes were also to be prepared; and this led to an almost infinite number of propositions offered at different times, in detached parts, by instalments as it were; but all tending to the same end, and to the same ultimate object, of re-establishing the hard money Government of the Constitution. It would be tedious, and in fact, impossible to detail all these propositions at this time; but a few of them, selected from the mass, and in different years, will show the steadiness of the pursuit, and the earliness of my action on the subject. I have already shown that as far back as the 2d of February, 1831, in my first speech against the Bank of the United States, I raised the hard money standard for the Federal Government, and denounced its total separation from the paper system. Following up the plan therein indicated, I brought forward in the winter of 1833–34, namely, on the 2d day of January, 1834, specific propositions to correct the gold standard—to legalize the circulation of foreign silver—and to repulse from the Federal Treasury all bank paper of less denomination than twenty dollars. In a speech against the Bank of the United States which I then delivered, I gave the notice for these resolutions, and pledged myself to bring them in, and follow them up to a decided issue. I will here read an extract from that speech which will verify what I have the honor to say. This is the extract:

"The reform of the gold currency, Mr. B. said, was a part of his original plan in opposing the renewal of the United States Bank charter. It was still the darling object of his heart—the splendid vision of his midnight dreams, and mid-day thoughts; and, with the leave of the Senate, he would read, as a part of his present speech, and in illustration of his sentiments on the currency, a set of resolutions which he had long since drawn up, and only awaited the proper occasion of victory over the Bank of the United States, to lay before the Senate, and claim their action upon them. He would read them, without offering them at this time for consideration:

Reform of the gold currency.

"Resolved, That it is the true intent and meaning of the Constitution of the United States that the Federal currency of the United States shall consist only of gold and silver coin; and that there is nothing in the present state and condition of the country, to justify any supposed plea of necessity for departing from that plain intent of the Constitution, by issuing, or permitting any corporation to issue, any species of Federal paper currency whatever.

"Resolved, That the quantity of gold derivable from foreign commerce, and from the Carolinas, Virginia, Georgia, and Alabama, and the quantity of silver derivable from foreign commerce, are amply sufficient to supply the people of the United States with hard money, if not expelled from the country by unwise and erroneous laws, made by Congress.

"Resolved, That the value now set upon gold and silver coin, both foreign and domestic, by the laws of the United States, is erroneous, and prejudicial to the country, and has (with the aid of a Federal Bank) occasioned the total expulsion of gold coins, and the partial expulsion of silver dollars from circulation; and that it is the bounden duty of Congress to restore these coins to circulation, by restoring them to their true value, refusing to recharter the Bank of the United States, and discountenancing and rejecting from receivability in payment of Federal dues, all bank paper of less denomination than twenty dollars.

"Resolved, That it is the true intent and express meaning of the Constitution, that foreign gold and silvercoins shall circulate in the United States as freely as domestic coins; and that to comply with such intent of the Constitution, it is expedient that foreign gold and silver coins, (of the principal commercial nations,) and of approved fineness, recent coinage, not clipped or fraudulently reduced in weight, should be authorized by law to pass current in the United States, by count, and not by weight like the coins issued from our own mint.

"Having read these resolutions, Mr. B. pledged himself to the American people, in the face of the Senate, to attempt the reform of the gold currency, if some more competent hand did not anticipate him, the moment Congress was disembarrassed of the great contest for power and supremacy between the people of the United States and the Bank of the United States, which was now raging so furiously in both Houses of Congress."

It was in the month of January, 1834, that these resolutions were read in the Senate; in the month of March following, they were offered; and have since been followed up by the measures which were necessary to give them effect, and to lead to the accomplishment of the great object on which we are now engaged. The mint was branched, both to increase the coinage and to serve at New Orleans and Philadelphia as depositories of the public money; the gold standard was corrected; foreign silver was admitted to a legalized circulation; small notes under twenty dollars were cut off from the receipts and expenditures of the Federal Treasury; the Treasury Order was issued, and remained in force two years. All these measures, with ten years of discussion—the increase of our specie from twenty to ninety millions—two explosions of the paper system in three years—the inability of the Bank of the United States any longer to sustain the Opposition, and to deceive and distress the country; all these events have prepared the public mind for the adoption of the Independent Treasury system; and made it, as I believe it to be, the most popular political measure of the times in which we live.

The bill re-establishes an exclusive metallic currency for the Federal Government; it does no such thing for the State Government or the people. It establishes no exclusive metallic currency for them; and all the harangues to that effect—all the affected alarms about the fall of prices—the decline in the value of produce and property—the reduction of wages—the ruin of labor, and so on, are nothing but a new edition of the old panic speeches; and a fresh crop of the woful vaticinations of the United States Bank prophets years ago. The Independent Treasury bill will have no direct action upon the currency of the State Governments and the people; it will only act upon it indirectly, and incidentally, and that to improve it by infusing a larger portion of gold and silver into it.

The effect of this great measure upon the Government and the country, cannot be otherwise than beneficial. It will give the Federal Treasury a hard money currency; and in that will save it from the loss and degradation of using depreciated paper. It will give it the keeping of its own money; and in that will save it from the loss of its revenues as often as the banks chance to blow up, or choose to shut up, either in consequence of their own misconduct, or in obedience to orders, or an impulsion from London. In supplying the Federal Treasury with hard money, it also supplies the people with it; for the Government does not eat the money it receives, or export, it; but pays it out in return for services or purchases; and the whole goes back to the people as fast as it comes from them; and will not require as much in a year as the Bank of the United States ships to England in a few months. It will keep up the specie standard in the country; it will keep up a supply of specie; it will enable the community to obtain the gold and silver which is indespensable to their safety and prosperity.

The Independent Treasury will not require as much specie to be collected from the people in a year, as the Bank of the United States ships to England in a few months; with this great difference, that, what the Government collects, is immediately returned to the people; what the bank ships is lost to the country forever! Not less than scores of millions have thus been shipped by this Bank, counting all it has sent away, both in its original and in its metamorphosed state. Mr. CLAYTON's committee in 1832, showed it had extracted from the States, chiefly of the South and West, up to that time, forty-two millions of dollars, and shipped nearly the whole. No committee has since been permitted to examine the "Great red Harlot," and to discover the subsequent amount of her exactions and exportations; but the custom-house books, and the boastings of her parasites, show them to be immense; and they probably exceed, since 1832, the operations of any given number of years before that time. The Legislature of South Carolina, at their last session, made a report upon this point, as it concerned that State alone, founded upon the testimony of the late president of the United States Branch Bank in Charleston. The result was startling, and showed the abduction of specie from that State, by this institution, to have been enormous and ruinous. Certain it is, the Bank of the United States has abducted from the States, and exported to England, to be lost to this country forever, not less than sixty or seventy millions of dollars, while the Independent Treasury system cannot take out of circulation more than four or five millions at a time; and every shilling of it to be returned to the people, from whom it came, through the daily expenditures of the Government. And yet it is this Bank and its orators, and paragraphists, who affect alarm, and are actually trying to hatch another little panic, on the ground that the Independent Treasury will deprive the country of its specie! Oh, truth! where is thy signet? Oh, shame! where is thy blush?

If any one asks when it was that I began to labor for the establishment of the Independent Treasury, I answer, that I began this labor on the day in which I began my labors to terminate the existence of the Bank of the United States. That Bank was in the possession—in the chattered possession—of the two precise privileges which would constitute the new system; the privilege of paying the public dues in her own notes, and the privilege of keeping the public moneys. Now it is evident there could be no Independent Treasury until these bank privileges were abolished; and to abolish them the Bank itself must be brought to a close. So long as there was a National Bank, that bank would have the keeping of the public moneys in its own vaults, and the payment of the public dues in its own paper. It was necessary, therefore, to get rid of that institution before we could begin to erect the Independent Treasury. Demolition was to precede erection; and for seven long years I labored at the preliminary work. Those who defended the Bank during that time, fought seven years against the Independent Treasury system; those who attacked the Bank fought for the system. They were antagonist systems, and one must be got rid of before the other could be adopted. True the transit was not direct from one to the other. There was a half-way house between them! as indispensable to be stopped at, and tarried in a while, in going from a National Bank, as in returning to one. This half-way house, as every one understands, was the State bank deposite system. We stopped in it three years—from 1834 to 1837—when it blew up, and we escaped. Congress aided to blow it up by the State deposite act of 1837, which called for thirty-six millions of dollars, which we knew this half-way establishment had lent out, and could not return, in the prescribed time, without ruin to itself or its debtors. It blew up, and we left it; and the Democratic party then took the decisive ground of going the whole distance, and erecting the Independent Treasury; basing it upon the two pillars of KEEPING its own money, and USING nothing but HARD MONEY. This system had been presented before, but at periods of time not propitious to its adoption. A member of the House of Representatives from Virginia, [Gen. Gordon,] presented it in that body in 1834. It was opposed by the Democratic party, and if I had been in that body, I should have opposed it with them; for, although right in itself, it was wrong timed, and would have caused a reaction in favor of the Bank of the United States. In that light it was seen by both political parties, and each acted accordingly. The public mind was not ripe for the step; the half-way house was still the lodging place; and it would not do to pass it or quit it, until its insufficiency was ascertained. Two years after, and before this half-way establishment had failed, I made two experiments in the Senate to see if we could gradually get out of it. Both these experiments failed—signally failed—and left me without hope until that catastrophe should arrive, which I foresaw, and stated to be at hand. The first of these attempts was made on the 6th day of January, 1836, and took the form of a proposed instruction to raise a select committee on banks and currency in the District of Columbia; and, among other things, to inquire:

"Into the necessity, if any, for banks of circulation in the District of Columbia, in contradistinction to banks of discount and deposite; also, to inquire how far banks of any kind are wanted for the uses of the Federal Government in this District; and wherefore the Treasurer of the United States may not act as KEEPER and PAYER of the public moneys within the District of Columbia, and drawer of checks or drafts in favor of those who chose to receive their money elsewhere."

This was a gentle attempt at the experiment of an Independent Treasury here, at the seat of Government, where we have a Treasurer and a Treasury building, and officers enough to keep and pay out our money. It was a gentle attempt to sound the Senate upon the subject; but it did not get as far as to sound them. As it was read, its fate was determined; and when it was finished being read, it was laid upon the table upon the motion of an Opposition Senator, without debate, without yeas and nays, and without a division.

The next attempt was six months later, to wit, on the 13th of June, of the same year; and took the shape of an amendment to the famous Deposite act; so as to allow public moneys to be transferred from the deposite banks to the mints, for the two fold purpose of supplying metal for coining, and for safekeeping. On this occasion the Senate was sounded: its sense in relation to the commencement of the Independent Treasury system was ascertained; and as the circumstance is an era in the history of that system, I will read what our journals present in relation to it. I read from page 430, of the session 1835–36:

"On motion by Mr. BENTON to amend the reported amendment by inserting, at the end of the twelfth section, the following proviso: 'Provided, That it may be lawful for the President of the United States to direct transfers of public money to be made from time to time to the Mint and branch mints of the United States, either for supplying metal for coining or for safe keeping.'

"A division was called for by Mr. BENTON; and being taken on the first division thereof, ending with the word 'coining,' it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 22, nays 17. The YEAS were: Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hendricks, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Morris, Niles, Page, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, White, and Wright. The NAYS were: Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Kent, Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Swift, and Webster.

On the question to agree to the residue of the purposed amendment, viz: 'or for safe keeping,' it was determined in the negative—yeas 13, nays 28. On motion by Mr. Grundy, the yeas and nays being demanded by one-fifth of the Senators present, those who voted in the affirmative are, Messrs. Benton, Brown, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, McKean, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Robinson, Ruggles, Walker, and White. Those who voted in the negative are: Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Shepley, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Webster, and Wright."

Thus ended the second attempt to begin the great work of establishing an Independent Treasury for the Federal Government. It ended discouragingly enough. No more than 13 Senators voted for including the mints in the list of the public depositories: but I was not discouraged, and looked ahead for the forthcoming of an argument which would convince the nation. That I was not discouraged, and did not mean to give up the ship, I happen to have some higher evidence to prove than my own assertion could now be: I happen to possess a letter, dated in September of the same year, and addressed to Mr. Wm. M. Gouge, of this city, so well known for his meritorious writings on banks and banking. It was written in September, 1836, and was in answer to a detailed plan for a Sub-Treasury system, which he addressed to me where I then was, namely, among the Virginia Springs. I kept no copy of my letter, but have lately obtained one from him; which, with his answer to my request for the copy, I will read, both in justice to him, as one of the early and steadfast friends of the separation of Bank and State—justice to General Jackson, as one of the early approvers of the plan—and in justice to myself, as not despairing under defeat—as being fully impressed with the impending dangers of the paper system, determined to compromise nothing, relying upon the people, and fully anticipating future success—actually anticipating the very measure, even to its form, which we now have before us. His letter to me, sending the copy of my own, is this:

WASHINGTON, January 9, 1840.

DEAR SIR: Enclosed is a copy of your letter to me from Warm Springs.

It may not be amiss to mention, that on the 4th of March, 1836, (the day on which the charter of the United States Bank expired,) I addressed a short letter to General Jackson, signifying my intention, if it should be acceptable to him, to address him at length on the subject of entirely separating banking and fiscal concerns. Having received a favorable verbal reply, through a mutual friend, I set about the task, but, through press of business, could not complete it till August of that year. The address filled nine foolscap sheets, and the substance of it was published immediately after the Bank suspension in 1837, in pamphlet form, under the title of "An Inquiry," &c. My letter to you, which filled three foolscap sheets, was an abridgment of my letter to Gen. Jackson.

Very respectfully, yours,

WM. M. GOUGE.

Hon. T. H. BENTON, United States Senate.

And this was my letter to him:

WARM SPRINGS, Vir. Sept. 22, 1836.

DEAR SIR: Your esteemed favor of the 2d inst overtook me at this place, and I am very sensible to the importance of all you say. The people are with us; the politicians, even of our own party, are mostly against us. I shall, however, have no compromises; and work on with those who will work with me. I am fully impressed with the impending dangers of the paper system, and wish to see the Federal Government wholly disconnected from the local banks. The disuse of their paper, and the disuse of their vaults, are both desirable to me; and I had looked upon the mints and branch mints, with a few additional ones, as places of deposite for the public moneys. A modification of your plan of sub-treasuries, so as to connect them with the mints, seems to be feasible; and I shall be glad to talk with you on the subject at Washington, and, in the meantime, to hear from you as often as convenient. I go to Lexington in this State. Yours truly,

THOMAS H. BENTON.

WM. M. GOUGE, esq. Washington City.

Mr. President, these are tedious details, and both minute and individual in their bearing; but now that the end has crowned the work—now that the Independent Treasury system has become the leading policy with the Democratic party, and is supported by an immense majority of the American people—at such a time there is something more than selfish gratification—there is justice and utility in looking back to its humble commencement—its slow and doubtful progress—and to review the labors of those who were its friends when it had so few.

The catastrophe of 1837, was preparing; and I saw it as distinctly before it happened as afterwards. In the winter of 1836–7, I pointed out this catastrophe to the then President elect—the now President—of the United States. I invited him into the Finance Committee room of the Senate in the winter '36–37—four months before the banks exploded—and made known to him my opinion of the coming danger. I spoke to him in his high character of President elect, and to warn him of the tempest which was to salute his nascent Administration. I should not mention this, if it was not that the President himself well remembers it, and often mentions it. I had no more doubt then of the coming explosion, than I had after the nine hundred banks of the Union had actually shut up. My opinion was not guess work; but a conclusion of reason and judgment, formed from a view of facts, and as demonstrable as a proposition in Euclid. I judged from these facts: 1. That the Bank of the United States, the mother of the paper system, was rotten and wicked, and would fall, and would draw down the rest with her. 2. That the whole paper system was distended to the bursting point. 3. That the smaller class of our deposite banks were ready for bankruptcy, many of them having from twenty to thirty, and even forty dollars of liabilities for one dollar in specie. 4. That the deposite act, requiring thirty six millions to be deposited with the States in nine months—from the first of January to the first of October—in addition to furnishing nearly as much more for the expenses of the Government—that this act must compel the large deposite banks to choose between crushing their debtors, or closing their doors. These were the facts I went upon; and while the three first were sufficient for the event, the fourth insured it. Of this I was so certain at the time of the passing of the act, that, denouncing it as a consequence, I also demanded if it was an object of that act? This is what I said—one passage, among a thousand similar:

"Now what is the object of all this? Is it the object to take all the money for the purpose of distribution, and leave none for the defence of the country? Is it the object to break all the deposite banks? Is it the object to distress the country, by making the deposite banks call in all their loans in six months? Is it their object to ruin the currency, by enabling the Whig States to draw their distributive shares in specie, and compelling the banks to stop payment, and then calling for the Bank of the United States as the only remedy for the evil? Whether all this is the OBJECT, it will be the effect; and to do all this, it is necessary to reach back three years to find money in the Treasury which is not there, and thus make a larger sum for distribution than the deposite banks can pay."

This is what I said—a little of what I said—on the 13th day of April, 1836, while the deposite act—that child of many fathers, was still in the chrysalis state—still struggling amidst the confused embraces of its contending progenitors—each of whom saw, or thought he saw, the honors of the Republic awaiting the brows of the fortunate man who should impress his name and his features on the babe. I, on the contrary, saw nothing in it but woe and shame—mischief to the country, and humiliation to its authors.

The catastrophe came; the bank explosion of 1837 came; the month of May, 1837, saw it arrive: and, at one stride, the Democratic party stepped up to the place where I had been standing "solitary and alone" for seven long years. The catastrophe came; the President, in a noble message which approved him the worthy successor of Jackson, and the worthy choice of the American people; this calm, sagacious, firm, patriotic President hung out the banner for the divorce of Bank and State—for a return to the Constitution, and the act of '89, in the establishment of an Independent Treasury for the exclusive keeping of the people's money, which money was to be the exclusive gold and silver currency of our wise and venerated Constitution. The President did his part; the people backed him; but their Representatives faltered; and a second explosion of the paper system had to add itself to the argument before the minds of the doubting could be convinced, and the spirits of the wavering confirmed. The second suspension came, and the argument was conclusive.

This also was an event foreseen, and foretold by me. The Senate will bear with me if I go into some personal details. I am no ex post facto prophet; I am no ambiguous oracle. I neither prophesy after the fact, nor ambiguously before it. I speak beforehand; speak plainly, and to the point, and write it down; and here is what I wrote down, beyond the Mississippi, at different periods, and in different letters to my constituents, during the twelve months which preceded the second suspension, that of October, 1839.

To the Democratic citizens of St. Louis, under date of the 25th of October, 1838—twelve months before the event—I wrote:

"Since the veto session of 1832, the political part of the banks and their confederates have convulsed the country with alternate expansions and contractions of the paper currency, to make the people cry out for a National Bank; and they are now preparing for another convulsion of the same kind. New banks are created, paper money is forced into circulation, small notes are multiplied, a vast quantity of bills of exchange is accumulating upon New Orleans and New York; and while this preparation for another catastrophe is going on, we hear it unanimously repeated by all the initiated of the party, that the resumption of specie payments was premature and unsafe—that it cannot last—and that there can be no lasting and permanent resumption until a National Bank is established. This is what is going on, and this is what is said by those who have had the power, heretofore, to make good their predictions, and have charged all the mischief they create upon some act, no matter what, of the Administration. But the next suspension may not be so easy a job as the last. The process of resumption has developed a division among the banks. We have seen a resumption and non-resumption flag; in the next attempt to close vaults we shall see a suspension and non-suspension flag. The business banks will resist the suspension; the political ones will force it if they can; and in this division the community and the laws will find an auxiliary in the non-suspending banks which may enable them to prostrate the machinations of the architects of mischief.

"The bank suspension (which was a contrived piece of business, and one of the objects of the distribution law) was fully counted upon to restore the Federal party and its tutelary deity, the Bank of the United States, to full power; but it was made at the wrong time. It was a master stroke, but wrong timed. It should have been made in the fourth, instead of first, year of Mr. Van Buren's administration. It was premature. Its authors did their best to make it last until the next Presidential election; but the Democracy of the New York banks forced the resumption; and now there is no alternative but to make a suspension for the elections of 1840. It is a bad chance, but it is the only chance. They are dead without it; and accordingly all the preparations are now in full progress for that catastrophe. The preliminary steps are already taken. An expansion of the paper currency has commenced, to be followed at the proper time by a sudden contraction, and the consequent stoppage of the banks, and the general derangement of the business of the country."

To the Democratic citizens of Calloway county, one hundred and fifty miles beyond the Mississippi, and under date of the 10th of November, 1838—eleven months before the event—I wrote:

"The United States Bank notes received are themselves remitted to the East as Eastern funds; and thus the State loses both the specie which it had, and the notes which it received for them. In fact the notes are sent out to capture specie, and to return with it. This is the case with the Eastern notes which are imported; not so with the Western and with the miserable post notes! these are retained for domestic consumption, and sent into the country, and perseveringly pushed into the hands of the farmers; and in a little time, if these operations are allowed to go on, there will be nothing but this trash in their hands. The State will then be ready for the new suspension, the new panic, and the new distress; which will be charged, of course, to any thing that Mr. Van Buren may do, or say, or no matter what, about that time."

To the Democratic citizens of the Ozark Mountain, two hundred and fifty miles beyond the Mississippi, and under date of the 1st day of June, 1839—four months before the event—I wrote:

"The present paper system of the United States cannot stand, even if there was no pecuniary or political object in blowing it up every three or four years. A thousand banks issuing small notes and post notes, and doing business upon each other's paper, could not stand, even if all hands were in favor of saving them; but this is not the case. Many are in favor of periodical explosions of the banks, both for pecuniary and political objects, and especially to cause a resuscitation of the National Bank; and these will accelerate the event, which would come of itself in a few years; and thus periodically afflict the country with a broken bank currency." * * *

"I look upon the establishment of the Independent Treasury system as an event which sooner or later must take place; but it may be that another 'suspension' must be added to the argument before it can be carried."

To the Democratic citizens of Howard county, near two hundred miles beyond the Mississippi, and under date of July 5, 1839—three months before the event—I wrote:

"Certain I am that there is a clear line of distinction between the different classes of banks of the United States—a line that was drawn at the time of the resumption, and which separated the commercial and business institutions, which were in favor of resuming and doing the best they could, from the political and gambling banks, which were against resumption, and in favor of perpetuating the evils of an irredeemable currency. I traced the line in March, 1838, two months before it was developed to public view. It exists now, and the latter class of banks are as intent upon another suspension now, as they were against resumption. Unhappily, they are able to make the mischief which they predict and wish, and the vast gambling operations in which they are concerned, in cotton and stocks, may accelerate the event which is so essential to their designs. I look upon the banks which are engaged in the great cotton and other speculations as no more worthy of credit that the gambler whose whole fortune is nightly staked at the faro table."

This is what I wrote—a part of what I wrote—to put my constituents on their guard against the second suspension; and guarded they were: for, when the blow came, they were prepared for it, and nailed the specie flag to the mast, and repelled the British-Bank-born imp, SUSPENSION, from all their borders.

This would seem to be prophecy enough in relation to this second suspension; but the citation would be incomplete if I did not add one more instance, though not of a written character. It so happened that, in the month of April last, just before I left this place for the Great West, I met the President on horseback near the lower bridge in Georgetown; it was soon after the day of the exit of an old, and the entrance of a new president, through the portals of a certain marble banking house in the city of the loving brothers—Philos adelphos—and when that shifting of characters naturally led to a certain topic. I then said to the President, what he has done me the honor to remind me of since, that the second suspension would take place before we met again; but that it would not be a total eclipse—only about half on the southern limb of the sun.

Yes, it has come! The second suspension is upon us, but in diminished terror and mischief; to the former, as the whelp to the lion—as Hyperion to the Satyr. The fatal Bank, of foreign ownership and foreign impulsion, was the chief agent in contriving them both, and proudly lorded it over the first ruin it had inflicted; but now, no longer proudly eminent, or standing like a tower, it

"Peeps through the horizontal misty air,
Shorn of its beams; and, from behind the moon,
In dim eclipse, disastrous twilight sheds
On half the STATES."

It has come! and with it the demand of an immense majority of the American people for the instant and total divorce of Bank and State, and the permanent establishment of a National Treasury, to be the exclusive keeping place of the exclusive money of the people. And here I will close this chapter of predictions past and fulfilled, with making one more, whose event is yet in the womb of time; and that is this: That, if the Independent Treasury is not now adopted, it will be established after the next general election with perfect ease, and in a stronger and better form.

Mr. President, I approach the termination of a long and toilsome work. The financial map which I spread before me ten years ago, sees the last of its objects on the point of consummation. I have a right to the pleasures of retrospect—to the joys of an honest exultation—at the successful conclusion of so much labor. For seven long years, under the lead of the hero President, and backed by a few friends, I battled on this floor against a combined political and moneyed power, which was able, during all that time, to counterpoise the weight of the Government and the people; and, to crown its audacity, by dragging the MAN of the AGE to the bar of the Senate, and branding him with a sentence, which the JUSTICE OF THE PEOPLE has REVERSED, and ordered to be EXPUNGED from our records. This once powerful combination is now dissolved and broken; the political part limps over the field; the moneyed part lies in the dust—a mass of ruin, of infamy, and of crime. No more the object of hope or fear to any, its enemies pepare for it the tomb and the winding sheet; faithful history prepares for it an immortality of odium and abhorrence; and its friends, they—like the table familiars of Timon—

"From its ruined fortunes, Slink all away."

Mr. President, a faint attempt is made here to resuscitate the ghosts of the panics which have acted so formidable a part in our politics for many years past. It is sent forth that this bill is to impose an exclusive hard money currency upon the people and upon the States; that it is to cut down the price of all labor, produce, and property, to a specie standard; that all debtors are to be ruined, and all laborers beggared. This, sir, is what is sent forth; but it is a mere experiment on the public credulity—a mere assault upon the nerves of the timid. The bill will have none of these effects, but the contrary. It only applies to the receipts and expenditures of the Federal Treasury; and its only influence upon the general currency will be to improve it, by infusing a larger portion of gold and silver into it. The country need not be alarmed. After triumphing over so many great panics, it may look with contempt on this starveling affair which begins so faintly in this chamber, and which the moneyed power is no longer in a condition to patronize. Without the patronage of that power, a panic is impossible. It takes money to make one; the want of money, the application of money, and the extraction of money. Politicians, with their alarm speeches, can do nothing in such a case without a mammoth bank, and its iron screws. This they have not now; and I predict a total failure in the present attempt to alarm and terrify the country. Far from having an exclusive metallic currency, the danger is that we shall have an exclusive paper currency. Twice in two years it has been exclusively paper, once over the whole Union, now over the half of it; and the friends and authors of this exclusive paper, and depreciated paper, affect an alarm for too much specie! They accuse others of meditating this specie currency, while they themselves, twice in three years, have actually imposed an exclusive, universal, and broken down paper currency upon the people, and now have it upon half the Union. No, sir. It is not danger of specie, but danger of paper, that we have to dread. That is the evil which has afflicted us for thirty years. It is the evil which now afflicts us, and which will continue to do so until the Federal Government returns to the specie medium in all its own transactions; and, in supplying its own wants, occasions the wants of the country to be supplied at the same time.

What is the Indpendent Treasury? and why is it called independent? Certainly because it is to relieve the Federal Government from dependence on a fragile bank currency, and to relieve it from dependence on fragile banks to keep its money. It is now dependent on both; and experience proves that it is leaning on a broken reed. It is to make this great Government—the world's last hope for republican liberty—to make it independent of petty corporations, themselves the helpless dependents of others. Sir, what is the banking system of the United States but the tail, the fungus, the excrescence of the British paper system, to be cut off and sacrificed every time that the mother system in England requires it to be immolated for her preservation? What is it but this? Look at it in all its parts—in the aggregate as well as the segregate—and see what it is—how weak in itself and how dependent upon others. The banks of the South and West, built upon the sandy foundation of borrowed paper, are dependent upon those of the Northeast; those of the Northeast are dependent upon the paper fabric of England: and this frail work of lawn and gossamer is itself dependent upon the generosity of Holland and France. The whole banking system of the United States has its centre in London! its masters are there! All the business of our country is linked to a chain whose fast end is in London. And shall the Government of the United States remain dependent upon a system whose masters are in London? Shall it remain linked to a chain whose fast end is there? The enemies of the Independent Treasury say it shall; its friends say it shall not; and this is the question now to be tried. If the bill passes, this Government becomes independent of the paper system whose masters are in London: if it fails, we remain subject to them; and, just so often as their wants require it, or their policy dictates it, this Government is to be deprived of its revenues, reduced to the use of broken bank paper; and its citizens denied shillings for the post office, or the market, while ship loads of gold and silver are despatched to our masters in England.

Mr. President, I have been accustomed for a long time—for years past—to hear our paper system orators attack and deride hard money, and stigmatize as barbarians the nations which use it. To listen to them, and a hard money currency is the very badge and evidence of barbarism. Asiatics, Africans, and savage Indians, are their exemplifications of such nations; and to the level of these would they reduce all the people who prefer gold to paper. This is a fine compliment to the hard money men who framed our Constitution, and believed they had conferred the greatest blessing upon us in giving us a hard money Government. It is a fine compliment to our English ancestors, who had no paper currency until the forepart of the last century. It is a fine compliment to those Greeks and Romans to whom we are accustomed to look for all that is great and beautiful in the human race, and who never had a conception of paper money. It is a fine compliment to France, which now has a specie currency of five hundred and fifty millions of dollars, and no bank note less than five hundred francs. It is a fine compliment to all these people and nations. But, letting that pass, I should be glad to stop a moment with these paper orators in the little kingdom formerly republic, of Holland—that ancient Batavi, where Julius Cæsar found the bravest of the Gauls, and ask them what they think of the barbarism of the country which has produced such statesmen as the De Witts, the Barneveldts, and some of the princes of Orange; which has produced such generals as Tromp, de Ruyter, Prince Maurice, and Winter? Such admirals as Van Tromp, who sailed up the Thames with a broom at his masthead, significant of his having swept the channel and the ocean? Such physicians as Boerhaave—such theologians as Gomar and Arminius—such scholars and civilians as Erasmus, Grotius, Lewenhoeck, Heinsius, Gronovious, and Swammerdam, such painters as Rembrandt? I would like to know what these orators think of the barbarism of the country, which has produced such men as these; and which, besides, was the birthplace of the agriculture, the commerce, and the manufactures which now enrich and adorn England, France and so many other countries? What they think of the country which gave to Europe and the world, the telescope, the microscope, the pendulum, and the thermometer? that country which, before the American Revolution, was the asylum and the refuge of the persecuted in religion, in politics and in literature? that country in which Bayle composed his great work, and where Peter the Great worked at the ship-carpenter's trade? that country which was the home of printing, the resort of scholars, the seat of renowned universities, the mother and the patroness of the fine and the useful arts; and which, for a long time, was regarded as the Eye of Europe, as Athens had been called the Eye of Greece? According to the reasoning of these orators, and their test of barbarism, this Holland must have been a savage place; for she had no bank notes all this while, nothing but hard money and the commercial bill of exchange. According to them, the very badge and evidence of barbarism was upon her. Her rank, in the scale of civilization, was that of Africa, Asia, and our Indian tribes!

Sir, there is nothing more humiliating in the whole circle of political economy than the speech of a paper system orator in praise of paper money and bank credits, and in abuse of hard money and ready pay. All his notions are drawn from England—drawn from her since she became a paper money country. This modern England is the object of his study, the example of his imitation, the idolatrous subject of his worship. All his notions of finance and currency must be drawn from that source, where the banks have been in a state of suspension exactly the one-half of the last fifty years; while France and Holland, whose currencies have remained unshaken amidst wars, invasions, rebellions, and changes of dynasty, and which are the SAVIORS of England from her own false system, are overlooked and despised. Yet France and Holland present the two highest models for the study of currency which the history of the world affords. At this very moment we see the Bank of England and the Bank of the United States going to France and Holland to seek relief from impending destruction; yet we study and copy the examples of these mendicant seekers after relief, while those who save and relieve them are overlooked and despised! In consequence, we have the basest currency in the world—one which makes the South and the West the slave of the Northeast, while the Northeast itself is the slave of England, while England herself is a victim to her own vicious system, and only saved from periodical destruction by the generosity of Holland and France.

France has tried both paper and gold, and the study of six years of her history—the study of it from 1799 to 1806—from the exclusive depreciated paper currency of the Republic to the exclusive specie currency of the Empire—will teach all nations the easy way to reform a ruined currency, and to recover the solid one, which is the only sure basis of public and private—of national and individual, prosperity. When Bonaparte became First Consul, in 1799, the currency of France was far worse than that of Michigan or Mississippi at this moment. Neither the Government, nor the people, had specie; nothing but assignats and mandats, wholly inconvertible and ruinously depreciated; yet, in six years, that great man had chased away paper, and brought in above five hundred millions of gold and silver; enough to revive industry, to sustain prices, to reward labor, to defray the expenses of wars and of the Imperial Court; to make roads, canals and docks, and to build a navy; enough, in a word, for the habitual currency of the forty millions of souls who constituted the population of the Empire.

Holland is another subject for the study of the American statesman. A small territory of eleven thousand square miles, lying below the level of the sea—drawing fifty feet water as Hudibras rhymes it—and walled in to keep the sea out; a soil of clay, sand, and loam; a disadvantageous climate; without a mine, a fossil, a stone, a mineral, or a forest tree: this little country, so small in itself, and so little favored by nature, besides the pre-eminence which it attained in agriculture, manufactures, and commerce; in military and naval warfare; in learning and in science; in the useful and in the fine arts; besides all this, this little country constituted itself the SPECIE WAREHOUSE OF EUROPE AND AMERICA! lending gold to all nations; to emperors, kings, and princes; to cities, states, and corporations; to this city even, which, with its six millions of chartered bank capital, was unable to pay back either principal or interest; and must have been sold upon thirty days' notice at public auction, if the United States had not assumed the debt. This is Holland; a country which has no paper money banks, but which has merchants who are able to save the Bank of England, and the Bank of the United States, from breaking like glass; merchants who are able to lend gold by the million at four per centum per annum, while we give two per cent. a month for depreciated paper; who are able to purchase every dry goods store in such a State as Missouri, (St. Louis included,) pay down for them in gold, then set fire to them and burn them up, and never know that they had lost any thing except by the change of figures at the foot of the balance sheet. This is Holland, and her merchants, who never saw a bank note; and yet we have dry good merchants in Missouri, whose store a real strong man could run a stick through, and hang over his shoulder, and walk off with; and who undertake to persuade people that they can do no business at all—can credit nobody, and must sue every body—unless they have a branch of the United States Bank to accommodate them with paper credits.

Yes, sir; this is Holland, the specie magazine of Europe and America; the meadow and the garden of Europe; the happy home of a rich, moral, and tranquil population of 200 to the square mile; and which has made itself what it is, not by building paper credit banks, and borrowing money on the resources of posterity, but by INDUSTRY, ECONOMY, HARD MONEY, and SHORT CREDIT.

Holland is the country for our statesmen to study; but if she is too distant, let them cross over to the island of Cuba, and there see a population of less than one million and near one half of them slaves, carrying on an immense commerce, building a commercial city second only to New York in the New World, paying twenty-one millions of dollars annually in direct and indirect contributions to the Government; paying high for wages, produce, and property; and doing the whole upon gold alone and the commercial bill of exchange! I say, and repeat, upon gold alone, and this bill of exchange; for a bank note of any kind, and a piece of silver, except of twenty-five cents and under, for change, is not to be seen upon the island.

To our Southern States—to the whole cotton, rice, tobacco, and sugar growing region—now so grievously afflicted with the curses of the paper system; to all this region I would say, study the financial history of Holland, France, and Cuba. Follow their example! emulate their solid currency. Imitate them! and in a few years you will not only be lifted from the misery, degradation, demoralization and ruin of a depreciated currency, but you will have a superabundance of real money; gold enough for all your own uses, and to lend to all America besides. You will become the specie warehouse of the commercial world; to which all nations will resort to borrow gold, and which will return to you the instant they have borrowed it. Your hundred millions of exportable productions, and augmenting every year, will quickly produce this magic change, if, emerging from the Serbonian bog of paper money in which you are now sunk, you plant yourselves on the solid rock of gold and silver. To the other States I would say, do the like; and the like results, to a less extent, will be your reward and your blessing. At least imitate France, and eschew all paper below one hundred dollars. But this is their own affair. As things now stand, it belongs to them to afflict or to bless themselves. To the Federal Government it belongs, as the preservation of the sacred fire belonged to the Roman vestals—to this Government it belongs to preserve the sacred currency of the Constitution. To this Government it belongs to do this; and to a long series of measures pursued for this purpose, for the last ten years, the establishment of the Independent Treasury now comes in as the crowning act to seal and consummate the whole.

Mr. WRIGHT said he thought it his duty to notice this motion to amend the bill, that the Senate might understand its effect. For himself, he did not consider it of the least possible importance to retain the words which were proposed to be stricken out. They were intended as a rule, requiring the Treasury to receive such paper as was issued by and under the responsibility of this Government. The bill, as it was now, would come into operation on the first of July next; on the thirtieth of June next the last Treasury note, issued on the authority of Congress for the last two sessions, would become redeemable, so that Mr. W. was not aware that, when the bill would come into operation, one dollar of Government paper would be afloat. But, supposing Congress at any future time should pass laws making paper receivable, it must be then receivable, by such laws, or this clause would not make it so. There was no objection, therefore, to the striking out the words, and yet there could be no great practical mischief in retaining them. It was of little consequence either way.

Mr CALHOUN was understood to concur entirely in the views of Mr WRIGHT.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky. I would ask the Senator from from New York what is his understanding of the operation of the bill in a case of this kind: The Secretary of the Treasury of the United State issues a warrant in the course of his disbursements on the receiver-general at New York, and the holder of the warrant is perhaps in Philadelphia, or Boston, or Charleston, or New Orleans; would he not be authorized with his bill or warrant to make payment of his dues on importations at the custom-house where he happens to be, or must he go to New York to the receiver-general to dispose of his warrant?

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not suppose the amendment or the bill, as it is now, would affect that matter at all. They now take such warrants at the Treasury, or in any part of the country.

Mr. CLAY. Then I understand the construction of the bill by the chairman to be, that, the collector at Charleston, or elsewhere, to whom a warrant is tendered, drawn on New York, while he is not compelled to receive it, yet is not prohibited from receiving it by this bill in either form.

Mr WRIGHT. Precisely so.

Mr. BENTON said he believed he should have a unanimous vote in favor of his motion to strike out. He would consider this an indication of the sentiment of the Senate against the future issue of Federal paper money. That this might appear on the record, he called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. NORVELL said that, in giving his vote to strike out the provision of the bill, which admitted the reception and disbursement of bills or Treasury notes issued under the authority of the United States, he wished it to be distinctly understood that he did not vote in contemplation of the fact that this Government should, in no exigency, and upon no occasion when its necessities might require it, emit bills of credit to meet the emergency. Occasions would arise on which the use of Treasury notes, or some similar paper by the Government, would be indispensable. He had made this declaration because of the intimation that the decision of the Senate on this motion might be produced against any proposition to issue Government paper hereafter, if our necessities require it.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he, like the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. NORVELL,] would not permit, by his silence, the mover of the amendment to draw an inference from his vote not intended. He would vote for the amendment, because he considered it, under existing circumstances, perfectly immaterial; and thus thinking, he was ready to accommodate any member who preferred the bill without the words proposed to be struck out, and not because he thought that the Government ought never to resort to the use of its own credit in its fiscal operations. He thought no such thing, but, on the contrary, he believed it would be often convenient, and sometimes indispensable, to make the resort. He felt called on to make this declaration, to repel the intended inference, as far as his vote was concerned.

Mr. WALKER said: I vote for the motion, with a view to consummate the divorce of the Government from the whole paper system. During the late canvass in Mississippi, the clause now proposed to be expunged, was designated by our opponents as creating Federal paper money, and that if this clause did not at once organise a Government bank, it was inserted with a view to the future establishment of such an institution. I wish, therefore, by excluding this clause, to silence all such objections, and render the divorce as complete from a Federal, as from a State paper system.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky. I would give my vote on the yeas and nays to accommodate almost any body. But if the object now is to prevent the issue of all paper by Federal authority, and the establishment of a Government bank, there must be a great many more things done than this striking out; two things more at least; that is, sundry other amendments must be made, and the bill must declare that no future Congress shall authorize the issue or the receipt of paper money in the country. If the object is, as the Senator last up has stated it, there should be a prohibitory clause to that effect.

But the case I will now put is this. A man comes to Washington and gets a $500 Treasury warrant, which he wishes to transfer to A B or C, and he does so transfer it, say to the hands of a merchant at Charleston. And there what is its value? It is there worth just as much more in specie as the difference in exchange; and if that is one per cent. the warrant is worth one per cent. more than the specie. Can there be a doubt that the collector would receive it? Or, take the opposite side of the Union, and suppose a Treasury warrant drawn on New York is transferred to Boston. There it is at par. At one place a Treasury warrant on New York commands a premium, at another it is at par, and it is nowhere below par. Now if you want to prevent the issue and use of such paper, you must, at least, do the two things which I stated: first prohibit such issue and use, and then you must insert a clause declaring that no future Congress shall very from the requisition of the bill in this respect.

Mr. ALLEN. This bill itself will be an act of Congress when it is signed, and no more; and it can, therefore, have no more force than any future act of Congress. I have, therefore, risen solely to say that this Congress has not the power of binding any future Congress whatever.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator from Ohio has not heretofore remarked me as saying that this Congress has the power of binding a future Congress. Sir, I believe there is a Government bank lurking in this bill. Gentlemen say no: we do not mean to have a Government bank; we will have nothing but specie. So the Senator from Missouri moves to strike out a certain clause inserted by his friend from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] which admitted the receipt of paper of certain kinds. And I say, the gentlemen will not accomplish their purpose by this alone, if they would have nothing but specie. The paper will be out. Supposing payment is to be made for land; is it your purpose to prevent the drawing out of specie by means of Government paper? Sir, I stated an impossible case, (binding a future Congress,) to show that either that which is impossible must be done, or this may lead to a Government bank. Gentlemen may make their own bed as they please, but they will find thorns and thistles enough in it when they come to lie down. I understand the Senator from South Carolina, though he had yielded to the striking out, now objects both to the striking out and to the insertion of a clause prohibitory on any future Congress. [So the Reporter understood Mr. CALHOUN, but heard him indistinctly.] Sir, if this bill is simply a hard money bill, and there is to be no Government bank——but [striking the bill with emphasis] there's the bank.

Mr. CALHOUN. It is said that extremes sometimes meet, the truth of which we have an illustration in this case, in which the avowed opponent, and the avowed friend, of the credit system, object to the Government using its own credit; the one to the use of Treasury notes, and the other to the use of Treasury drafts. I, as the friend of the final and complete divorce of Government and banks, am opposed to the views of each extreme. It is my conviction, that if the Government should have the blindness to repudiate the use of its own credit, it would go far to defeat the policy of this bill, by restoring, in the end, the very union it is intended to dissever. The reason is obvious. Paper has, to a certain extent, a decided advantage over gold and silver. It is preferable, in large and distant transactions, and cannot, in a country like ours, be dispensed with in the fiscal action of the Government, without much unnecessary expense and inconvenience; the truth of which would soon be manifest, if the Government should assent to dispense with the use of Treasury drafts. But that is not the only form in which it may be convenient or necessary for it to use its own credit. It may be compelled to use it for circulation, in a more permanent form, as the only means of avoiding what I regard a great evil, a Federal debt. I am decidedly opposed to governmental loans. I believe them to be, in reality, little better than a fraud on the community, if made in bank notes, and highly injurious if made in large amounts in specie. I saw enough in the late war to put me on my guard against them. I saw the Government borrow the notes of insolvent banks, the credit of which depended almost exclusively on the fact, that they were received and disbursed by the Government as money. I saw the Government borrow these worthless rags, but for the credit it gave them at the rate of eighty for one hundred; that is, for every eighty dollars it borrowed of these notes, it gave one hundred dollars of its stock, bearing six per cent. interest. Still worse: I saw the Government, with the view of conciliating the banks, which were fleecing the community, permit them to discredit its own paper, by refusing to receive its Treasury notes at par, though bearing six per cent. interest, for their own worthless trash, without interest; and thus degrading and sinking its own credit below that of insolvent banks. All this I saw.

Now, sir, I hold that it is only by the judicious use of Government credit, that a repetition of a similar state of things can be avoided, in the event of another war. It may be laid down as a maxim, that without banks and bank notes, large Government loans are impracticable, and without some substitute, such loans, in the event of war, would be unavoidable. The only substitute will be found to be in the direct use, by the Government, of its own credit. Now, as I regard the borrowing from banks not only as one link in the connection between Government and banks, but as inevitably leading to the use of bank notes in the collection and disbursements of its revenue, I also regard the use by the Government of its own credit, in the form of Treasury notes, or some other and better form, as indispensable to the permanent success of the policy of this bill. If the Government had relied on its credit, instead of loans from banks, in the late war; if it had then refused to receive and pay away bank notes, as this bill proposes, or had but the manliness to refuse to receive the notes of banks that refused to receive its notes at par, I venture little in saying, that the expense of the war might have been reduced forty millions.

For these reasons, I cannot assent that the Government should repudiate the use of its own credit, nor do I believe that such is the sense of this body. Should there be any one of a contrary opinion, let him submit a direct proposition to prohibit the Government from the use of its credit. I would be glad to see the vote on such a proposition. Instead of being unanimous in its favor, as the mover of the amendment would have us believe, it is far more probable it would be nearly so the other way.

But, I am told, that the provision now proposed to be struck out, was in an amendment that I moved at the extra session, containing what is usually called the specie feature. That is true, but is easily explained. It was then known that there was a large temporary deficit in the revenue, which I preferred meeting by the use of our own credits to a loan from the banks. But now we are told that there will be no deficits, and, of course, that reason does not apply. I must, however, say, that according to my impression, there will be a deficit before the end of the year of some millions, without the most rigid economy; and one of the motives I have for acquiescing in the proposed amendment, is to enforce such economy, by increasing the difficulty of providing for the deficit should there be one. In that case, it is clear there will be a conflict between the advocates of loans and of Government credit, in which, if it should come, I need not say on which side I shall be found.

Mr. WALKER said it might be dishonest to refuse to redeem any outstanding Treasury notes; but the provisions of this bill, in this particular, did not go into effect until two years after all these notes fell due, and when, of course, they would all have been redeemed; but if, by any accident, any portion of them still remained outstanding, they could be liquidated in specie by the Government, although not receivable for Government dues. As to the proposition that we are or are not to declare that we will never, under any circumstances, issue Treasury notes, it was wholly unnecessary to make any such declaration. Perhaps, in the emergency of a war, Treasury notes might again be issued, but in time of peace, I would always prefer a loan, if practicable, in case of any deficiency in the Treasury, for a loan was more direct, and it would render us more economical than would a resort to the more easy but perilous expedient of issuing Federal paper money. But my objection is still deeper than this. I am against the whole paper system, and believe that an expansion of a paper currency, whatever form it may assume, except for distant exchanges, is greatly injurious to the prosperity of this country, and this, whether such a currency be nominally convertible, or inconvertible, depreciated, or at par. A depreciation augments the injury, but it is great even before the paper becomes irredeemable. The result is this, that during the expansion there is a great nominal rise in the price of property, real and personal, excepting exports and in the wages of labor, and nothing can be raised or produced in this country for sale abroad, except at an expense so enormous as almost to annihilate all profits. Let us but contrast the condition of the island of Cuba, upon our very borders, with that of our own country. In Cuba, the currency is entirely metallic; her population only about nine hundred thousand, one-third of whom, as has been truly stated, are slaves; and yet, with a prosperity almost unexampled, with agriculture and commerce flourishing, and an annual import and export of forty-three millions of dollars, whilst distress and embarrassment here are almost universal, even in those States possessing the richest soil and staples, with natural advantages much greater than Cuba, and with the great additional advantage of a free Government. Why, then, this difference? It is the contrast between the result of the metallic and paper currency. In Cuba, they have no periodical revulsions, and, from their currency, the expense of raising their products is so small, that the profit is great even at a limited price, and they can export, at a profit, throughout the world. From 1816, until 1836, whilst the duty on brown sugar was at three cents a pound, have not the Cuba planters introduced their products into New Orleans, into the heart of our sugar growing region of Louisiana, and undersold us in our own market; and that, too, after paying the duty on foreign sugar of three cents a pound, and at least one cent a pound additional for freight, insurance, and other charges; and this, too, when, during part of this period, brown sugar commanded at New Orleans but six cents a pound? If, then, from this price received, of six cents per pound, we deduct the four cents, before specified, for the duty and other charges of freight, &c. but two cents per pound will have been actually received here by the Cuba planter for his sugar; and if we allow one cent per pound for profit, the expense of raising the article, including the annual interest on the original investment, would have been but one cent per pound. This may or may not be the exact expense, but still all will perceive the wonderful difference in the cost of production in the two countries. But suppose you inflict upon Cuba the curse of the paper system, and fill the island with banks and an expanded currency, what will be the result? Why, you will double, or quadruple, as the case may be, the expense of raising her products; she cannot export them for sale at a profit, as heretofore, throughout the world; her imports would increase, her exports diminish, her paper system explode, as it ever has done wherever introduced, and ruin and embarrassment would be substituted for wealth and prosperity. And is not the contrast equally great as to the increased expense of raising cotton, superinduced here by our paper system, whilst that cotton sells for no more in Liverpool, than a similar article, raised at one-third the expense in other countries, where there is no paper money. This difference in the expense of raising the staples of the South, is the tax imposed upon the planter by the bank paper system, and it can and shall be demonstrated, at the proper time, that nearly an equal tax is imposed in the same manner, by the same system, upon the manufacturing and navigating interest. In truth, the rate of profit upon all the capital invested in all the branches of industry, is the surest barometer of the annual increase of national wealth, and that profit is vastly diminished by the bank paper system. Being, then, opposed, upon these principles, to any paper money system, State or Federal, I shall vote to strike out the clause which would seem to countenance the future issue of Government paper.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky. I will not embark on the subject of the tariff except so far as I must that I may not be misunderstood. But I would call the attention of the Senate to the different positions of the friends of the bill. Some of them are against all paper; they would as soon have the hydrophobia. Another (the Senator from South Carolina) would have paper; but, then, it must be his paper, that is, a Government paper. Still, he would use a certain measure of paper. That is the situation of the friends of this bill; and, sir, I will tell you what will come. Before the Congress terminates, these gentlemen will have the opportunity of showing their attachment or their aversion to the Federal paper system; for I have no doubt that the Secretary of the Treasury, long before this session is over, will have in a proposition for Trasury paper. He has already hinted it in a manner sufficiently intelligible, especially taking into view the manner used in expressing himself, by the head of the Treasury, whose perspicuity is known so well every where in the public and political world. Yes, before this session terminates in June or July, you will find the Secretary of the Treasury asking for paper to meet the expenses of the Government. That will bring the mark as to what course these friends of specie will take on the subject. And what course will they take when such a proposition comes for Treasury notes?

Mr. CALHOUN. If we must use credit, I would infinitely rather use our own than that of banks. But as to the currency, I concur almost in every sentiment which has been uttered by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER.] He could not do better than to contrast our own state with that of Cuba. Cuba is now in a flourishing condition, while the State of Mississippi is in a state of extreme distress. That Senator cannot push the specie currency further than I, if the country were out of debt. I wish simply, if there must be a temporary credit, that the Government should use its own credit.

Mr. CLAY. If the Senator from South Carolina is for using the credit of the Government, and is opposed to notes and to Treasury notes, in what form would he use the credit of the Government?

The question was then taken on Mr. BENTON'S amendment, and it was carried—ayes 33, noes 6, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Betts, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Merrick, Mouton, Norvell, Phelps, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connect cut, Strange, Tappan, Walker, White, and Wright—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Dixon, Henderson, Nicholas, Smith of Indiana, Williams, and Young—6

Mr. WALKER then moved to strike out that portion of the bill which provided for the use of the vaults of banks by officers of the Government. He was opposed to acknowledging that, in any contingency, was the use of these corporations necessary for the purposes of the Government.

The amendment was agreed to.

And the Senate adjourned.

SPEECH OF MR CLAY,
OF ALABAMA.

In Senate, Monday, February 3, 1840—On Mr. GRUNDY's report in relation to the assumption of the debts of the States by the Federal Government.

Mr. CLAY rose and said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: this debate appears to me to be singular and extraordinary, in several points of view. It seems to me ill-timed and unprecedented in the present stage of the business. It will be borne in mind that certain resolutions, involving various principles and propositions, were introduced at an early period of the session by an honorable member, [Mr. BENTON,] and, after lying on our table some time, were taken up, and somewhat discussed. We were favored by the honorable mover himself, with a full and able exposition of his views and purposes; and, almost without objection to the propriety or expediency of the course proposed, on motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY,] the whole subject was referred to a select committee, to consist of seven members. That committee took the resolutions under consideration, and, after ample time for that deliberation which their importance demanded, they had, through their chairman, [Mr. GRUNDY,] submitted an able report. But no sooner had the report been made—before there had been time to understand its contents—without suffering it to be printed—which Mr. C. believed had heretofore been the universal practice, before any attempt at discussion—objections had been raised, rather to the reasoning, than to the conclusions, of the committee; and an argument on all the important matters supposed to be involved, thus forced upon us. Mr. C. insisted that a discussion of such grave questions of constitutional law, and of policy and expediency, affecting the interest and welfare of the nation, at the present time, and under such circumstances, was altogether premature. He said it was unjust and illiberal toward the committee thus to enter upon the merits of their report before it was printed, and before it could possibly be read and understood by those who were called upon to award judgment upon the matters it contained. Mr. C. said it was even unfair toward the other members of this honorable body, to call for their votes upon the report without an opportunity for investigation. One objection, which had been urged with great apparent earnestness, was, to Mr. C's mind, most singular indeed; that was, in effect, that the subject-matter of the report was not properly before us—that it was, as the lawyers express it, entirely coram non judice. Now, (said Mr. C.) if we are to be bound by technical rules, it is altogether too late to take such an objection: a plea to the jurisdiction ought to be filed before pleading to the merits, and before an imparlance, if he correctly remembered the doctrine. The proper time to have made it was when the resolutions were offered; those opposed to them on the ground stated, should then have objected to receiving them, or, as soon as they were read, have moved, without further action, to lay them on the table definitively. So far from this having been done, the reference is made and acquiesced in on all sides. Moreover, (Mr. C. said,) the course pursued on this occasion was destitute of that courtesy which usually distinguished this body, both toward the chairman and the other members of the committee. After propositions had been regularly submitted, and clearly entertained by the Senate, and referred to a committee, did it not become their imperative duty to investigate and report upon them? Most unquestionably it did. Then, how unjustifiable, in any member of the Senate, to charge the committee with having travelled out of line of their duty, and assumed unwarrantable powers, when they have only done what we commanded them to do! Why, sir, gentlemen have charged the committee, in terms not very respectful, to say the least, with "impertinent intermeddling with the affairs of the States"—and it has been contemptuously demanded of my venerable friend from Tennessee, the honorable chairman, [Mr. GRUNDY,] "Who authorized you to inquire into the indebtedness of the State?" "Under what authority did you examine into the character and objects of State stocks?" The honorable chairman responded very happily, and with great promptitude. He spoke truly when he said, "You authorized me, the resolution of the Senate required me, to make the investigation alluded to." Sir, (said Mr. C.) what sort of justice or magnanimity would there be in those who possessed and exercised the power to command an agent to perform a given duty; and who, when the duty had been truly and faithfully performed, would turn upon him, and insultingly demand, "By what authority have you done this thing?" Why, sir, would it not be downright mockery? Is such treatment the just reward of obedience and fidelity?

But, sir, (said Mr. C) I have had some reflections upon the character of this debate, in another point of view. The gentlemen who have resisted printing this report assume to be conservators of the rights and dignity of the States, which, they allege, are infringed by its matter and argument. Why, sir, really if the friends of State rights—more especially as they are understood in the quarter of the Union whence I come—know the dramatis personæ, as I do, they must smile (I will not say incredulously) at this new recruit of friends. Who are these new State Rights champions, who now manifest so much sensibility lest the rights of the States be touched or impugned? Those who have manifested the most zeal and excitement on this occasion, are the two Senators from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN and Mr. CLAY,] the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SOUTHARD!!] Why, sir, when we hear those gentleman declaim so eloquently of State rights, and see them so extremely sensitive on the subject, is it not enough to excite "our special wonder?" When did they become converts to this doctrine? Always, heretofore, they have been regarded, as I thought, in favor of the very broadest constructions of the Federal Constitution—whereas the friends of State rights are well known to favor the most strict construction. It must be generally known, that all the gentlemen alluded to have heretofore advocated the power of the General Government to carry on a system of internal improvements within the States, to create a protective tariff, to establish a National Bank; and one of them, at least, [Mr. WEBSTER,] if I mistake not, holds it to be not only a legitimate power, but even the duty of this Government to create and furnish a paper currency. How much astonished, and, perhaps, gratified, then, must be the friends of State rights, to witness this new and powerful accession to their ranks—to see gentlemen, who have heretofore always indicated, by their acts and expressions of sentiment, such faith in the potent influence of the terms "general welfare," now suddenly espousing their cause with such warm enthusiasm. But, sir, said Mr. C. to treat this branch of the subject more seriously, I think the intense feeling manifested by our opponents, on this occasion, may be very rationally accounted for; the able report under consideration may be regarded as the sword of truth, which must cleave asunder and cut down error, whithersoever it is sent—"the wounded pigeons may be always known by their flutterings"—hence all this show of extraordinary excitement in the quarter referred to.

Sir, said Mr. C. I think it may be easily demonstrated that the whole argument on the other side, and all the objections urged against this report, are predicated on assumptions of fact, wholly unfounded. Why, sir, it is, in substance, assumed that none of the propositions discussed in the report are properly before the Senate; that the committee had no right to take cognizance of the matters embraced by it; and it has been asked, in a tone of triumph, that ought only to result from a conviction of the truth, "how came the subject here?" "Has any State proposed any thing like an assumption of her debts by the General Government?" Sir, said Mr. C. we shall presently see. I propose to set the facts, so far as I have been able to collect them, before the Senate, and before the country. And, in the first place, I beg leave to recall your attention to some of the resolutions brought in by the honorable Senator from Missouri, and upon which the report is grounded.

[Mr. C. here read the first two resolutions of Mr. BENTON, as follows:]

"Resolved, That there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States which can authorize the legislative power of the Union to assume the debts of the States which have been contracted for local objects and State purposes.

"2. That the assumption of such debts either openly, by a direct promise to pay them, or disguisedly by going security for their payment, or by creating surplus revenue or applying the national funds to pay them, would be a gross and flagrant violation of the Constitution, wholly unwarranted by the letter or spirit of that instrument, and utterly repugnant to all the objects and purposes for which the Federal Union was formed."

Sir, said Mr. C. I will not detain the Senate by reading the remaining resolutions; they but amplify and enforce the principles distinctly laid down in those already brought to your view. The first resolution marches directly up to the question of constitutional power in this Government to assume the debts of the States, which have been contracted for local objects and State purposes; and plainly and emphatically denies the existence of any such power. To meet the same question, if presented in the more insidious and dangerous form of indirect assumption, the second resolution denies the constitutional power of this Government to assume such debts of the States "either openly, by a direct promise to pay them, or disguisedly by going security for their payment, or by creating surplus revenue or applying the national funds to pay them;" and affirms that such a proceeding, in any of those forms, "would be a gross and flagrant violation of the Constitution." The remainder of the resolutions go on to specify the various injurious, corrupting, dangerous, and ruinous tendencies of the policy referred to; and intended to be met and counteracted by the action of the Senate. As before intimated, these resolutions were, at an early day of the session, introduced, printed, and laid upon our table. Ample time was given for examination and reflection. They were taken up and debated by the mover, and some others. Did any one then protest against the power or expediency of acting upon them? No, sir; on the contrary, the gentleman themselves acquiesced in this course, at least by their silence. Nor, during all this time, was it pretended that the subject was not properly before us, or that we were intermeddling in matters that did not pertain to our business. The resolutions were taken up, after a full explanation of their intended bearing, and of the objects and inducements with which they had been brought forward; and, upon the motion of the honorable Senator from Tennessee, they were referred to a select committee of more than the usual number of members, for more careful and deliberate examination. Now, under all these circumstances, is it not most extraordinary, that gentlemen should insist, so vehemently, that the subject is not legitimately before us, and that the committee have acted unwarrantably in making their report? Your first command your servants to perform a duty, and, when they have done so, censure them for their obedience. Sir, said Mr. C. this view of the subject is altogether an afterthought. The principles it sets forth and maintains, with so much power and ability, do not suit the taste, and do not correspond with the favorite policy of those who have assailed it with such unusual virulence, and poured forth such torrents of indignation against its author: otherwise we should have heard none of the complaints and objections now made. Indeed (said Mr. C.) one of the gentlemen [Mr. SOUTHARD] has virtually admitted this, by avowing his expectation, when the reference was made, that the Senator from Tennessee would decline making any report on this, as he had done on another subject, at a former session.

But, sir, said Mr. C. no matter when the objection to its consideration might have been made, I maintain it is within the power and duty of the Senate to discuss and deliberate upon any subject of legislation connected with the rights and interests of the nation, and more especially upon one which involves questions of such vital importance to the welfare of our constituents, and even the permanency and purity of our institutions. The time has been when certain gentlemen did not feel so much squeamishness and delicacy in reference to the power and duty of the Senate. The time was, when some of those who now express so much alarm, and profess so much abhorrence for transcending the supposed limits of our authority, could, and did, without any apparent qualms of conscience, vote a virtual impeachment against the late President of the United States, in this body, though expressly restricted by the Constitution to judicial power alone over such questions, and when it was well understood no such proceeding had been, or was intended to be, instituted against him by the House of Representatives, where the exclusive power of impeachment existed, under the Constitution. He said he would leave it for others to decide with what grace such professions of scrupulosity, in the exercise of power, now came from that quarter.

But, sir, said Mr. C. if it were even doubtful whether a question of the constitutional power of Congress, or of the expediency or inexpediency of legislation on a given subject, could be properly raised in the Senate, in the mode adopted by the Senator from Missouri, there is another ground on which the subject must be admitted fairly and fully before us. The distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, as I shall show more fully hereafter, is one form of assumption of State debts by the General Government; and, although it is not so open and undisguised in its character, it is not the less dangerous on that account. Not to go back to the numerous similar propositions, which have been presented here for a number of years past, the resolutions of the Legislatures of no less than four States have been presented here on the same subject, pro and con, during the present session of Congress. On the 31st of December last, and some eight or ten days before the appointment of the select committee on the resolutions of the Senator from Missouri, the resolutions of the Legislature of New Hampshire were presented by the honorable Senator before me, [Mr. PIERCE,] and similar resolutions of the Legislature of Missiouri were presented, on the same day, by the honorable Senator from that State, farthest from me, [Mr. LINN.] Subsequently, and as well as Mr. C. recollected, on the 13th of January, the late colleague of the honorable chairman presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Tennessee—one of which was upon the same subject of distribution. Still subsequently, but before the report of the Select Committee was made, resolutions of the Legislature of Vermont, on the same subject, were presented by one of the honorable Senators from that State, [Mr. PHELPS.] Now, sir, said Mr. C. with all these facts before us, is it not astonishing that honorable gentlemen will rise upon this floor, and say the subject has not been brought here.

It is true, sir, that the three States, first named, protest against the proposed distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, and instruct their Senaters, and request their Representatives, to vote against any such proposition; while the last named State is as decidedly in favor of that measure. But, sir, does that make any difference as to the question at issue, whether the subject has been brought before the Senate, by any State, or otherwise? Certainly not. It is not alone by affirmative propositions that a subject may be properly presented here. When the Legislature of a sovereign State of this Union has examined, and made up a deliberate opinion, upon any great question of constitutional power, or of national policy, and has expressly required it to be presented here, although it might assume a negative shape, it seemed to Mr. C. to demand some action on our part. According to his opinion, in such cases, whether a State advised or protested against a measure of so much magnitude, it would be more respectful toward her for us to take the subject into consideration, and respond to her views in respectful terms, whether we agreed or differed with her in sentiment or doctrine. He thought it indisputable that a State opposed to a measure—more especially one of such importance as this, which had probably been discussed in the Legislatures of all the States, and had been agitated amongst the people throughout the Union for the last eight years—was at least as much entitled to be heard, and have her views patiently and well considered, as one in favor of its adoption. He thought every gentleman who had had much experience in matters of the kind, would agree that there was always more danger of too much, or over hasty, legislation, than too little. Mr. C. said, for his own part, he had always regarded this as a maxim never to be lost sight of, from his first entrance into political life.

Independently of what he had already noticed, Mr. C. said he might maintain, with great propriety, that the question of the assumption of State debts by the Federal Government had been kept steadily before the Senate, and before the whole country, by a distinct and well known measure, for the last eight years. He alluded to the "bill to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands of the United States," commonly called the "Distribution bill," which had been reported from the Committee on Manufactures, as long ago as April, 1832, by the Senator from Kentucky farthest from him, [Mr. CLAY of Kentucky,] and which had been ever since introduced, annually, he believed, by the same Senator. Sir, said Mr. C. that bill has steadily brought up, and kept before us, and before the whole country, this same question of the assumption of State debts by this Government, at least to the extent of the amount of the proceeds of the public lands. Although it might not have gone the full length of the assumption of the entire amount of those debts, he said he would presently make it manifest, that it was precisely the same measure in principle, and might justly be regarded as its origin. Mr. C. said he would only occupy the time of the Senate by reading a single section of the bill, to which he alluded. It was in the following words:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That after deducting the said ten per centum, and what, by the compacts aforesaid, has heretofore been allowed to the States aforesaid, the residue of the nett proceeds of all the public lands of the United States, wherever situated, which shall be sold subsequent to the said thirty-first day of December next, shall be divided among the twenty-four States of the Union, according to their respective Federal representative population, as ascertained by the last census, to be applied by the Legislatures of the said States to such objects of education, internal improvement, colonization, or reimbursement of any existing debt contracted for internal improvements, as the said Legislatures may severally designate and authorize.

Sir, said Mr. C. passing by, with a mere glance, other objectionable "objects" of appropriation, designated by the bill, amongst which were "education," "internal improvement," (without even a restriction to those of a national character,) "colonization," (a subject which had never entered the imaginations of those who framed the Constitution,) this clause is added: "or reimbursement of any existing debt, contracted for internal improvements, as the said Legislatures may severally designate and authorize." Now, sir, is not this an express assumption of the "existing debts [of the States] contracted for internal improvements?" Yes, sir, it must be admitted on all hands that it is not only an undertaking, but assumption and payment, both together, as far as the funds arising from the sales of the public lands would go.

Mr. C. said he well remembered the first introduction of the bill he had just noticed. It was brought in originally, pending the animated contest for the Presidency in 1832, when its distinguished author was one of the candidates for that most responsible and exalted station. It immediately became a subject of exciting and general attention throughout the country. Estimates were soon made, and almost universally circulated through the public press, exhibiting the amount that each State would be entitled to receive, under its provisions, making the highest amount ever received from the public lands, in any one year, the basis of calculation. The sum thus held out to each State, as a boon from the General Government, if the measure succeeded, was highly fascinating. Mr. C. said, having been, at that time, a member of the other House, from one of the new States, and perceiving at once the blighting influence such a measure must have upon their growth and prosperity, his anxiety and apprehensions were intensely excited. It was well understood by all who knew the constitutional opinions of the distinguished man then in the Chief Magistracy of the nation, that he could never consistently approve, much less recommend, such a measure; and he could not entirely suppress the fear that a measure, apparently so captivating, would give to his competitor, and its author, considerably the advantage. In a word, (said Mr. C.) I had strong apprehensions that the hundreds of thousands of dollars, offered annually by this bill to some of the older and most populous States, might "seduce them from their propriety." But, thanks to the intelligence, virtue, and devotion to the Constitution, which have ever animated the American people, on the most trying occasions, the contest resulted in the triumphant re-election of the then incumbent. Mr. C. said he had at first supposed that the measure originated with the occasion, and that, having failed to accomplish any desired change in public sentiment, it would be abandoned. But, not so, (said Mr. C.) it was brought forward again, at an early day of the succeeding session; and so far as he had been able to trace its history, it had been introduced, session after session, ever since, perhaps with a single exception, substantially in the same form. He said he knew of no instance of any other measure having been pressed for such a number of years, with such unyielding pertinacity and such untiring perseverance. Why, sir, (said Mr. C.) even at the last session, when it had not been introduced as an independent measure, while the bill to graduate and reduce the price of that portion of the public lands which had been offered at public sale and remained unsold, was pending, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] moved to strike out all of that bill after the enacting clause, and to insert, in lieu of it, all the principal provisions of his distribution bill. Even since the commencement of the present session, it would be recollected, the same Senator had alluded to it, and had expressed his sympathies for the indebted States with much apparent feeling. And, sir, (said Mr. C.) shall we now be told, after these frequent and persevering efforts to carry a measure, one of whose principal features is not only to assume, but to pay, pre-existing debts of the States, contracted for State and local objects, that we are travelling out of our way when we take up and discuss the question of assumption? Does the right of discussion belong exclusively to the advocates of that peculiar measure? And whilst they are continually presenting it to the country in the most alluring form, and lauding it in terms of the highest commendation, must those who see its unconstitutionality and ruinous tendencies remain inactive and silent? Mr. C. said, representing as he did, in part, one of the new States, he should feel that he was recreant to duty, and merited the execrations of those who had so often honored him with their confidence, if he were to remain mute and passive under such circumstances.

Let not gentlemen attempt to escape the restraints of the Constitution, said Mr. C. on the ground that there is any difference in favor of the power of Congress over that portion of the public treasure derived from sales of the public lands, and that derived from customs, or any other source. He said any man who would examine the subject, without prejudice, either with reference to the compacts between this Government and the States which had ceded territory, or under the Constitution, must become satisfied that no such power existed. The language of the Virginia act of cession (which embraced much the largest portion of ceded territory) was explicit; "that all lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, and not reserved for, nor appropriated to, any of the before mentioned purposes, or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American army, shall be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the Confederation or Federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive," &c. The language of the act, by which Georgia ceded to the United State the territory comprised within the limits of Alabama and Mississippi, is no less explicit. It declares that the land so ceded (after paying Georgia, and satisfying certain grants of her own) shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of the United States, Georgia included, and shall be faithfully disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever." This act, it would be remembered, passed in 1802, long after the adoption of the Constitution of the United States; and the land ceded was received by this Government, according to its terms. Now, said Mr. C. it is impossible for ingenuity to torture the language here employed, into a meaning to answer the purposes of the Opposition: they can never make the words, "common fund," mean twenty-six several sums, for the separate and distinct purposes of the different States of the Union. Sir, said Mr. C. it is at variance with the whole history of the Constitution, which was intended to remedy the defects of the Government, under the articles of confederation, for general purposes—to "provide for the common defence, to promote the general welfare"—and to sustain and regulate a National Government, leaving the States to regulate their own affairs. We all know the chief solicitude of our Republican ancestors was to confine the General Government to such objects, and limit its operation to powers expressly granted. So determined were they in this purpose, that they never paused in their exertions till they obtained the adoption of the tenth article in the amendments, which declares, "That powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." Where, then, sir, is the power "delegated to the United States by the Constitution," to divide the proceeds of the public lands amonst the several States? Can any advocate of the measure point us to the clause? No, sir; we may defy the advocates of this power on this ground. If this view be correct, in regard to that portion of the public lands ceded to the General Government by the States, how much more conclusive is the argument against such an appropriation of the proceeds of the lands which have been purchased from France and Spain? Louisiana and Florida had been bought and paid for out of the National Treasury. It was now generally admitted, that money could not be appropriated from the National Treasury to defray the expenses of State and local improvements. Would it change the principle, for money to be first laid out in land, and then reconverted into cash? Did the money which had been paid out for those Territories, when brought back into the Treasury, by a sale of the lands to individuals, assume any new quality, that gave us any new power of appropriation? He said he could not conceive any such magic influence, to be wrought by the simple process of paying out money, and receiving it back.

But, sir, said Mr. C. I am occupying your time unnecessarily, in the discussion of this question, on the present occasion. I desire no better argument to go forth to the people of the Union, than that which is to be found in this report. It presents the subject with so much clearness and ability, from its origin, both in reference to the articles of confederation, and the Constitution, that I believe no man who will read and understand it, can come to any other conclusion, than that any such measure would be a breach of good faith toward the States which ceded territory, as well as a violation of the plain letter and spirit of the Constitution.

That such a measure would, Mr. President, not only now be inexpedient, but that it would have been so, in the highest degree, heretofore, if it had been adopted, is perfectly demonstrable. By recurring to the documents of this body, of the last session, it will be found, by a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, then made, responsive to a resolution of the Senate, that if the act entitled "An act to appropriate for a limited time the proceeds of the sales of the public lands of the United States," [Mr. CLAY'S Land Bill,] which passed both Houses of Congress, had received the approbation of the President, and had been acted upon up to the 30th September, 1838, the nett proceeds, which would have been divided among the States, would have amounted to $51,011,732. It further appears, from the same document, that had such distribution been made on the 1st of January, 1839, it would have left a deficiency in the receipts of the Treasury, to meet the current demands upon it, amounting to $49,246,389 64—say, in round numbers, $50,000,000! Yes, sir, such would have been the effects of the measure, so often and so pertinaciously pressed upon Congress, if it had become a law; and we should now have had a national debt of that amount, unavoidably created, or we should have been compelled to tax our constituents to have prevented it.

And, sir, can it be pretended, if it were merely a question of expediency, without any constitutional doubt or difficulty, that in the present situation of the country—that now, when it has been intimated by those opposed to the Administration, and feared by some of its friends, that we might again be compelled to resort to extraordinary means to meet the current demands upon the Treasury—I repeat sir, will it be insisted by any one that in the present state of things, we should distribute the proceeds of the public lands for the purposes contemplated; or, in other words, assume the payment of State "debts contracted for internal improvements," to the amount received from that source? Sir, (said Mr. C.) I have no hesitation in declaring it as my opinion, that such a proposition would, in effect, be assuming the expediency of an increase of the tariff to the amount of six or eight millions of dollars annually. The receipts from the public lands, now contributing to the support of the Government, may be considered equal to that average, which, being withdrawn from that object, would result in the necessity, absolute and inevitable, of a corresponding increase of taxation in some form. Can we believe that the country is prepared to acquiesce in a measure even of that limited extent?

But, sir, said Mr. C. independently of the inducements to examination and action on our part, which I have already noticed, we have seen the broad proposition for the assumption of the whole amount of State debts by the General Government plainly enough made in the circular of those well known and celebrated English bankers and stockjobbers, Messrs Baring, Brothers and Co. which has already been brought to the view of the Senate. As it was no doubt the principal cause which gave impulse to the advocates of this bold scheme, on this side of the Atlantic, the Senate will pardon me for again calling their attention to the insidious form in which the plan was originally sent forth. The paragraph to which I have special allusion, is in the following words:

"But if the whole scheme of internal improvements in the Union is to be carried into effect on the vast scale, and with the rapidity lately projected, and by the means of foreign capital, a more comprehensive guarantee than that of individual States will be required to raise so large an amount in so short a time. A national pledge would undoubtedly collect capital together from all parts of Europe; but the forced sales of loans made separately by all the individual States in reckless competition, through a number of channels, render the terms more and more onerous for all, lower the reputation of American credit, and (as reliance is almost exclusively placed on th London market) produce temporary mischief here, by absorbing the floating capital, diverting money from regular business, deranging banking operations, and producing an unnatural balance of trade against this country. It would seem, therefore, as if most of the States must either pause in the execution of their works of improvement, or some general system of combination must be adopted."

Here allusion is artfully made to the internal improvements of this country—a subject known to be of absorbing interest in almost every part of the Union—and we are told, in substance, that this "scheme" cannot "be carried into effect on the vast scale, and with the rapidity lately projected, and by the means of foreign capital," without "a more comprehensive guarantee than that of individual States." They then set forth more distinctly what they mean by a more comprehensive guarantee, by saying "a national pledge would undoubtedly collect capital together from all parts of Europe;" and they reiterate, in the closing sentence of the paragraph, that "the States must either pause (that is, stop) in the execution of their works of improvement, or some general system of combination (meaning a "national pledge") must be adopted." What arrogance and insolence! Is not this saying to the States engaged in internal improvements, too plainly to be misunderstood, "we (the Messrs. Barings) no longer have confidence in your individual good faith and solvency, and therefore we will let you have no more money, unless you give us the General Government, or a combination of the States, as securities?" Yes, sir; they say to the sovereign States of this Union, "We cannot trust you without a 'national pledge' that you will maintain your good faith." Yet, sir, this vile imputation, coming from foreign bankers and stockjobbers, against the honor and responsibility of the States, does not seem to excite the ire of those who have assumed, on this occasion, to be the peculiar guardians of their rights and dignity; but they pour forth their indignation upon us, who would repel such insolent interference in our affairs, and who would rebuke the attempt to dictate what should be the policy of the National Government. It is very well, in their opinion, for those who control the European stock market to say to the States, "You are not able, nor willing, to meet your liabilities;" and, if we say, "We will not degrade the States, nor violate the Constitution, by acceding to their unwarrantable demands," we are accused of warring against the credit of the States. Save us, kind Heaven! from such new-fangled State Rights doctrine!

Sir, said Mr. C. whether this plan of the London bankers, impeaching the good faith and solvency of the States, and demanding security for the redemption of their obligations, emanated from any consultation, or pre-arrangement, with those of our own country, who are interested in the rise of stocks, and the profits or speculation consequent upon such rise, I am unable to say. It is not to be presumed that there will ever be any precise development of all the circumstances which may transpire in reference to any such movement. Brokers and stockjobbers are too shrewd to make their secret plans of operation known to the public. You might as well expect a juggler to disclose the secret of the deception and imposture by which he earns his bread. However the fact alluded to may be, there is certainly a remarkable coincidence between the tone of the (so called) Whig press in this country, and that of the "money changers" in England.

No sooner had the circular of the Barings reached this country, than you find, said Mr. C. all the leading Whig presses responding to its proposition in tones of the most cordial approbation; and, so far as he had observed, there was not one dissenting voice amongst them. He presumed the gentlemen of the Opposition would acknowledge, with pride and pleasure, that the New York Courier and Enquirer was one of the principal organs of Whig sentiment. Whether they did or not, Mr. C. said it would be well recollected by the whole country, that if its editor (who had certainly become very notorious, if not distinguished) had not presided as accoucheur at the birth of the universal Whig party, he had, at least, officiated as grand high priest, in performing the baptismal ceremony of conferring upon that party, with general acquiescence, their present cognomen, when they were in the lamentable condition of having worn out all their former cognominal distinctions. He said that editor should be regarded not only as the organ of the political, but of the monetary branch of the Whig party. Every one would recollect his "fair business transaction" with the late president of the United States Bank, and would appreciate the high claim it gave him to the confidence of all who felt an interest in the pure character of that institution. The New York Herald, another Whig paper, in November last, thus introduces and comments upon the views of the Courier and Enquirer upon this important subject:

This plan is so far matured by the leaders of the Whig party as to be officially promulgated in the Courier and Enquirer of yesterday morning. The following extract conveys, in petto, the skeleton of the scheme:

"Let the Government of the United States—which means the people's immediate representatives in both Houses of Congress—create three hundred millions of stock, bearing an interest of four per cent. per annum, and let this be apportioned among the States, on the principle of Mr. Clay's Land bill—that is, pro rata, according to the number of their Senators and Representatives in Congress—and let the proceeds from the sales of public lands be set aside and sacredly pledged as a sinking fund for the redemption of this stock. Let the Secretary of the Treasury, or some other suitable person, be appointed to exchange so much of this stock as may be the portion of any State for the stock of such State now issued; and after a certain period—say six months—pay over the balance to the respective States. Most probably the holders of some State stocks would not be willing to make such exchanges; and, if so, the State would receive its entire portion, and from the interest annually received on the United States stock, and sales of it from time to time, as their necessities required, be in a situation to progress at once with all its public works, whether commenced or only in embryo United Stated stockwould then immediately fill the space at present occupied by about two hundred millions of State stock; the remaining one hundred millions would be deposited in the State treasuries, and would only be offered for sale as their public works or other necessities required, and which the capitalists of Europe and America would gladly purchase at a premium."

In illustration of this great scheme, the Courier goes at length into its popularity, economy, and means of escape from direct taxation which the several States must submit to if the present system continue. With every view taken on these points we cordially concur. It is the only and efficient system of relief for the financial troubles of the age. A new National Bank is as frail as a fair one of the third tier. We have been the coup de grace given to the rotten fair one in Philadelphia. Free banks are equally worthless and numerous. Safety Fund can hardly cover their nakedness. There is no place, no scheme, nothing short of a miracle from Heaven, can save the great credit system, except it be the plan now proposed.

Now, Mr. President, said Mr. C. it will be perceived from this article, that the editor of the Courier and Enquirer, estimates the present amount of State stocks at "about two hundred millions" of dollars—so far as I know, without any complaint of extravagance, or over-estimate, either by editors or politicians of his party, though it was considered very censurable in the select committee who submitted this report, to make precisely the same estimate; and, by way of satisfying the non-indebted, as well as the indebted States, he proposes that the Government of the United States shall create stock to the amount of "three hundred millions" of dollars! This stock is to be "apportioned among the States on the principle of Mr. CLAY's (Distribution) Land bill; that is, pro rata according to the number of their Senators and Representatives in Congress, and let the proceeds from the sales of the public lands be set aside, (that is, abstracted from the receipts into the Treasury,) and sacredly pledged as a sinking fund for the redemption of this stock." Mark the perfect coincidence, the identity of principle, between this plan and that so long heretofore urged upon Congress, for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands. The only essential difference is, that, under the late plan, the Government is to issue stock, or give its bonds, besides giving a mortage upon the public lands. The editor of the Herald furnishes proof of the authorship of this scheme, which is worthy of consideration. Speaking upon that subject in November last, he says:

"This plan is so far matured by the leaders of the Whig party, as to be officially promulgated in the Courier and Enquirer of yesterday morning."

He also adds:

"With every view taken on these points we cordially concur. It is the only and efficient system of relief for the financial troubles of the age."

The New York Commercial Advertiser, another leading Whig paper, on the 22d of November last, in publishing the same circular of Baring, Brothers, and Co. expresses its views in the following language:

"There is a suggestion in the preceding extract, upon which we have been pondering for weeks, and which deserves the profound consideration of the American people, of the State Governments and of the National. We refer to the proposition for a pledge of a national faith to sustain the credit of the States; or, in other words, an assumption of the State stocks now oppressing both the European and American markets, by the United States, and the issue of a national stock in lieu thereof. The suggestion, we doubt not, will startle many a reader; but we cannot help that. The subject is one of very great and very grave importance, and the position of many States of this Union is such that we cannot shut our eyes to their condition if we would. Nor indeed should we. The States of this Union are bound together by no common ties. They are all one family—it is a great and a rich family—and what, though several of its members have, imprudently, certainly, and perhaps rashly, involved themselves in pecuniary difficulties, from which, singlehanded, they cannot well recover—shall the other members of the family allow them to sink—to be crushed—and their credit destroyed—or rather, like a wealthy parent, able to protect the credit of his whole family, shall not the National Government interpose, and by some equitable arrangement with the embarrassed States, assume their liabilities, and thus afford timely relief to them, and at the same time, to the whole country?"

Sir, (said Mr. C.) I might go on with extracts from other Whig papers, exhibiting wonderful harmony of sentiment upon this subject, but it is unnecessary. I will only add, that the Evening Star, the New York American, the Journal of Commerce—indeed, so far as I have noticed, the whole Whig press of New York, approved the plan of assumption. Nor, sir, were these views confined to the Whig press in the great commercial emporium—they were echoed west of the Alleghany. To prove this, I will only call your attention to a brief extract from the Cincinnati Gazette, one of the ablest Whig papers in that region. Speaking of the embarrassments of the States and the adoption of this remedy, the editor remarks:

"But it will be objected the Federal Government has no constitutional rights to assume the debts of the State; and farther, that it cannot be done without creating another national debt. We grant that the letter of the Constitution confers no such power, unless it is to be found in the "general welfare" clause, and that clause was rendered inoperative by the successive vetoes and usurpations of President Jackson. But there is yet a method by which the constitutional difficulty can be obviated, and the credit of the States sustained, by means which are already justly and truly their own. Had not Mr. CLAY's bill for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands (passed by a triumphant majority of both Houses of Congress) been defeated—not by a veto, for that would not have arrested its passage, since a majority of both Houses were awaiting such a message to vote it down—but by an infamous act of the President, who thrust the bill into his pocket, and furtively carried it away from the Capitol—every State in the Union would have already been in the possession of ample means, not only of sustaining their credit as to existing obligations, but of completing their works.

"Now, then, let the great legislator of the West renew the land bill, with the necessary modifications, dividing the proceeds of the public lands among the several States, conditioned that those proceeds shall be applied to the payment of the debts of the debtor States respectively. Let the Federal Government issue a national stock, bearing, say, four per cent. interest, in exchange for the State stocks—the holders of which would gladly enough make the exchange—and let the proceeds of the public lands be attributed to the redemption of the said stock. The fund is ample for the ultimate redemption of every dollar—a large saving annually would be realized—every State in the Union would be enriched, and the honor of the country redeemed.

"As to the other objection, the creation of a new public debt, it has no terrors for us. But we reserve the discussion for another day."

Here we find the questions of constitutionality, and the creation of another public debt, alluded to—but neither the one nor the other is regarded as any serious obstacle. The editor surrenders the constitutionality of the power "unless it is to be found in the "general welfare clause"—but he imagines that difficulty can be easily obviated by the bill for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands. Upon that question, it is unnecessary to repeat what I have already said. And, as to the creation of a new national debt, it has no terrors for a Whig politician.

Nor, sir, said Mr. C. has the leading organ of the Opposition in this city been silent upon this subject. I allude to the National Intelligencer, in whose columns a communication was published, at least with the silent acquiescence of its editors, as long ago as the 28th of October last, proposing that the proceeds of the public lands should be set apart for the redemption of State debts. And again, within the last few days, they transferred a communication which had been published in the Pennsylvania Inquirer, to their own columns, in which, amongst other things, the writer says:

"I think, therefore, as a matter of sheer justice, that the United States should pass a law to relieve the States. The late distribution act was an apportioning of the moneys resulting from the sale of the public lands; and all that is required now is, that a portion equal to the State debts should be set apart as a sinking fund. The lands need not be sold on the instant. They will be reserved for a convenient season. By this arrangement, the old States will start fair, unencumbered, and free from an onerous burden of taxation; and the gentlemen who have this subject in their hands for adjustment, will find, if they do not accede to this proposition, that they will be swept from the stations they now occupy. I confess I should want no better lever to upset them in oppressed and encumbered Pennsylvania, than a vote against the payment of her debt out of the public lands, that in part belong to her, and which her costly improvements have increased in value equal to the amount of her debt."

In the close of his letter, the writer repeats emphatically:

"The people will pay their State debts out of the public lands. Let this Congress look to it, or they will not find their seats in the next Congress."

To these views the National Intelligencer gave its sanction, in the following introductory paragraph:

"In the argument of the subjoined article, which we met with in reading over our mail papers yesterday, it must be admitted by every body that there are strong points, if it be not conclusive, in favor of such a distribution of the public lands, or the proceeds of the sale of them, as shall ensure to each State its just proportion of the benefits accruing from a property which, since the redemption of the debt for the payment whereof it was pledged, must be considered as a trust held by the United States for the common benefit of all the States. We understand the writer, of course, to contemplate such a distribution as shall secure to each State its due proportion of the proceeds, without any consideration of its being in debt or out of debt, for its expenditures on roads and canals, public schools, or analogous objects. Each State will of course be at liberty to employ its particular share in whatever manner it pleases."

Now, sir, said Mr. C. after this hasty review of the emanations of the Opposition press, without one jar of discord; when we see it was distinctly announced by high authority, and without contradiction from any quarter, that "the plan" had been "so far matured" by the leaders of the Whig party, as to be officially promulgated in the Courier and Enquirer;" when it has been declared, in the article just quoted from the Intelligencer, to be a powerful electioneering theme—"a lever to upset" the Democratic party in one of the largest States of this Union, is it not astonishing that gentlemen will rise here, and contend with such apparent earnestness, that we, a branch of the National Legislature, which their friends allege is not only competent, but bound, to carry the proposed policy into effect, have nothing to do with it?

Sir, said Mr. C. let us no longer hear that this is not a proper subject for inquiry and consideration by Congress, when a powerful party are maturing and organizing their plans to involve us in a new national debt of three hundred millions of dollars! "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." When we see a conspiracy forming to plunge us into a debt of this amount, with all its attendant evils, are we to sit by with folded arms and sealed lips? On the contrary, it should arouse us to action and energy. It behooves us, under such circumstances, to be up and doing, and, in the language of my friend from Tennessee, not to be too much afraid of danger either to understand or meet it. When an insidious enemy is about to make war against me, I prefer to be first in taking the field, and not to sleep upon my post until, by a stolen march, I am surprised and captured. As faithful sentinels, it is our duty to sound the alarm at the first approach of the enemy. It is our business to meet, and defeat, if we can, this attempt to violate the Constitution, and to warn our constituents of a conspiracy to fix upon them another enormous national debt

But the gentlemen on the other side are extremely sensitive on the subject of State credit. The Senator from New Jersey seems to have a peculiar sensibility on this subject, lest the value of State stocks should be depreciated. He contends that this report is calculated not only to degrade the States, but to impair their credit. Now, said Mr. C. in my humble opinion, Mr. President, this apprehension is wholly founded in error. If I understand the doctrines of the report, you will not find any thing in it which may either conflict with the ability or good faith of the States. It does not increase the amount of their debts, nor does it attempt to raise a doubt of their solvency. So far from impeaching their ability or readiness to meet their engagements, I understand it to maintain the very converse of the proposition. It professes to discuss the question of constitutional power, and the question of expediency, involved in the proposition to assume the debts of the States. Suppose we determine it to be both unconstitutional and inexpedient—as I trust we shall—does that imply a want of confidence on our part that the States are both honest and able enough to meet their own liabilities? If I do not think proper to pay the debt of my friend, does that prove that I consider him either insolvent or dishonorable? Sir, I should be sorry to entertain such an opinion; and I trust none of the States which have issued stocks, are in a condition so very pitiable as the argument to which I am replying would presuppose.

Mr. C. said this subject might be viewed in another aspect, which might account for the extraordinary sensibility which had been manifested. These stocks were owned, he believed, principally by certain large corporations in this country, and by foreign capitalists. If he was not mistaken, an agent of the largest institution amongst us was now in Europe for the purpose of selling these bonds to save it from bankruptcy. If the General Government were to assume their payment, or if the idea could be created that such a measure was likely to succeed, those stocks would sell promptly, and probably rise in value some twenty or thirty per cent. and consequently advance the interest of the holders in that ratio. To adopt the report would be to defeat the hope of such a speculation, and would naturally excite some feeling—some nervous irritability—amongst those interested. But, sir, it cannot affect the interests of the States; they are not now the holders of these bonds, except to a very limited extent. They have sold the greater portion of the bonds issued by them; and I am glad to see that some of the States are about to withdraw from the market, and to cancel such as have not been sold. Nor have the holders of these stocks any right to complain of the States on account of our refusal to pay them; no such pledge or inducement was held out when they became purchasers. They took them on the faith and credit of the States alone, not upon those of the General Government. Then what right have they to ask our endorsement? What right have they to complain if we decline giving it? We do not impair the guarantee under which they purchased—it remains the same.

No, sir, said Mr. C. none of the States, which have issued stock, stand in need of the securityship of the General Government to meet their engagements; and, to urge the necessity or expediency of such a measure, is much better calculated to excite distrust and want of confidence in their honor and credit, than any discussion or vote in this body, on the resolutions submitted by the committee. I cannot believe that a single one of them is obnoxious to a doubt, or suspicion, that should depreciate the value of her bonds. The State which I have the honor to represent, in part, is one of those indebted—yet it never entered my head to suppose that her character, or interest, was jeopardied by any part of the present proceeding. Her resources are known to be ample—her character for good faith is untarnished—she has nothing to fear from fair discussion, here or elsewhere. So far from desiring the aid of this Government to pay her debts, she is one of the protesting States, against the distribution scheme of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY;] and I do not believe one of her Representatives will ever be found voting in favor of that measure. For his own part, Mr. C. said, he was opposed to the whole doctrine of distribution of any part of the revenue of this Government, amongst the States, in every form. In his opinion, no better plan could be devised to humble and degrade the States, and bring them to the foot-stool of Federal power, than to accustom them to come here for money to supply their wants.

Mr. C. said, entertaining such views as he had taken occasion to express, he had felt surprise that any opposition should have been made to this report; but that a motion to print it, merely for the use of the Senate, should have met any resistance, appeared still more extraordinary. It would be recollected that he had made a proposition to print the usual number, merely to supply Senators; yet it was thought to be of such dangerous tendency that gentlemen would not agree to print fifty copies, lest the credit of the States should be injured. He said he would now repeat his proposition: let the report be printed in the usual manner. If it be deemed objectionable, let gentlemen meet it with their arguments, and send forth the antidote with the bane. And should it even be thought proper to express the confidence of the Senate in the good faith and ability of the indebted States to meet all their engagements, let a resolution to that effect be introduced, and he would give his vote in its favor.

SPEECH OF MR. BUCHANAN,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

In Senate, Wednesday, January 22, 1840—On the Independent Treasury bill, in reply to MR. CLAY of Kentucky.

Mr. BUCHANAN rose and said: MR. PRESIDENT: It is not my purpose, on the present occasion, to go very much at length into a discussion of the provisions of this bill. I intend, in a great degree, indeed almost exclusively, to confine myself to a reply, or at least to an attempt to reply, to the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY.]

In all discussions, if we desire to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion, it is absolutely necessary that we should distinctly understand what is the question to be discussed. Then let me ask, what is the nature and character of the Independent Treasury bill now before the Senate?

Since the origin of the Government, our own responsible officers have always collected the public revenue, and have always disbursed the public revenue. Heretofore, during the intermediate space of time between its collection and its disbursement, it has been deposited with banking corporations. The object of this bill is to provide that our own responsible officers shall be substituted as depositaries, instead of these banking corporations; and that these officers shall hereafter not only collect and disburse the public money as they have always done; but that they shall also have the custody of it between its collection and disbursement.

Under the provisions of this bill, every officer throughout the United States who receives public money is constituted a depositary. But there are certain points where very large sums of public money are collected, or are disbursed, or both; and at these points, both the security of the revenue and the public convenience required that there should be depositaries distinct from, and independent of, the collecting officers. These points are Philadelphia, New Orleans, New York, Boston, Charleston, and St. Louis. Accordingly, the bill proposes to convert the Mint at Philadelphia and the Branch Mint at New Orleans into places of public deposite, and entrusts the custody of the public money to the treasurers of these institutions respectively; and it creates sub-treasuries, each to be under the control of a receiver-general, at New York, at Boston, at Charleston, and at St. Louis.

Thus far, sir, it will be perceived that this bill makes no change in the settled policy of the country, except merely to provide that the public money, in the intermediate time, between its receipt into the Treasury and its disbursement, shall be entrusted to our own responsible officers, instead of irresponsible corporations.

In addition to these provisions, the bill contains what has been commonly denominated the specie clause. This section provides that one-fourth of the dues of the Government shall be collected in gold and silver, after the 30th June, 1840, one-half after the 30th June, 1841, three-fourths after the 30th June, 1842; and after the 30th June, 1843, all the revenue of the Government shall be collected and all its disbursements shall be made in gold and silver coin.

Now, sir, when separated from the details necessary to carry these principles into execution, this is the bill, the whole bill, and nothing but the bill which has excited so much unnecessary alarm throughout the country.

In discussing this bill, the Senator from Kentucky has divided his remarks into two general heads. He has first considered the bill according to what its friends say it is; and in the second place, has discussed it according to what he himself believes it to be. In my reply I shall invert this order; because it is necessary first to prove that the Senator himself has entirely mistaken the nature and effects of the measure, and that its friends entertain a just conception of its character.

The Senator held up the bill triumphantly to public view, and declared that it contained within its provisions a great Government Treasury Bank. Now, if I cannot make it manifest as the light of day, that in this proposition he is entirely mistaken, I shall then agree to surrender the whole argument. The Senator has had an unsuccessful chase, through the provisions of this bill, after the lurking monster. Had he succeeded in dragging him into light, I should have been one of the first men in the country to assist in putting him to instant death. But,

> "He must have optics sharp, I ween,
> Who sees what is not to be seen."

This, I think, has been the case with the Senator from Kentucky.

Now, sir, what is a bank? According to the usual acceptation of the word, in our country, it performs three offices. It receives deposites, it loans money upon discounts, and it issues a paper currency. I acknowledge that, in order to constitute a bank, it is not necessary that it should perform all these three functions. There are banks of discount and deposite merely, and there are also banks of deposite and issue only; and this latter class of banks are the most secure of any in the world, when the deposites are confined to the precious metals, and the issues, in the form of certificates, do not exceed the sums actually deposited. Such was the Bank of Amsterdam, and such is now the Bank of Hamburg. It would be difficult to form an idea of a bank of issue alone, without deposites or discounts, although I know, from the utter inability of the Bank of England to regulate the paper currency of that kingdom, the question has been seriously considered whether one bank of issue ought not to be established, and whether all other banks ought not to be prohibited from emitting paper currency. It is certain that, at the present moment, a bank of issue, purely as a bank of issue, does not exist on the face of the earth. Now, sir, this bill does not authorize the public depositaries to receive money from individuals on deposite; and it not only does not authorize them to loan the public money entrusted to their care, but it makes such an act a felony, punishable by fine and imprisonment. This bill, then, clearly does not create a bank either of deposite or of discount, and the Senator has not contended for any such proposition. He has confined himself to prove that it will create a bank of issue; and I shall examine this proposition a little more in detail.

And, in the first place, if there be a bank lurking in the bill, then we have had a Treasury bank in full operation ever since the origin of the Government, without having the least idea of its existence until the Senator from Kentucky made the discovery. There has been no period of time, since General Washington was first inaugurated in 1789, until the present day, when the Treasurer of the United States did not draw his warrants, either on banks or receiving officers, in favor of disbursing officers or creditors of the Government. Without this power the Treasury department could not exist. Debts could not be paid to individuals, neither could the public revenue be applied to accomplish the objects contemplated by the Constitution. There is no other conceivable mode of conducting this branch of the public business. The bill makes no change whatever in this ancient and necessary practice, except to impose an important limitation upon it which has never heretofore existed; and yet, according to the Senator from Kentucky, it creates a bank of issue; and the drafts drawn by the Treasurer on the public depositaries in favor of public creditors and disbursing officers, are to be the paper currency which it will throw into circulation. This is the sum and substance of his whole argument on this point. He might with the same reason contend, that, if an individual in extensive business had deposites in several banks, and was in the habit of paying his debts and advancing money to his agents by drawing drafts upon these banks, that, therefore, he himself had established a bank of issue. The cases are precisely analogous.

In what part of this bill has the Senator discovered the charter of his bank? He has referred to one, and only one clause, for the purpose of proving its existence. This is to be found in the tenth section of the bill, and, as it is very brief, I shall read it to the Senate. It is as follows:

"And for the purpose of payments on the public account, it shall be lawful for the Treasurer of the United States to draw upon any of the said depositaries, as he may think most conducive to the public interest, or to the convenience of the public creditors, or both."

There, sir, is the charter; and what is it but a mere recognition of the power which I have just been describing, and which has existed, and must necessarily have existed, ever since the origin of the Government. It requires the Treasurer of the United States to consult both the public interest and the convenience of the public creditor, or both, in selecting the depositary on which to draw his warrant. This he has always done. In the first place he must select a depositary with whom there is an amount of money sufficient to meet the draft; and among such depositaries he must, unless the public interest forbids, draw upon that one where it will be most convenient for the public creditor to receive his money. Why, sir, this clause, so terrific to the imagination of the gent'eman, might be stricken from the bill altogether, without producing the slightest inconvenience. The practice which it prescribes, is that which must necessarily be pursued in paying the debts of the Government. And yet this simple and necessary power is the only part of the bill on which the Senator relies to establish his great Treasury Bank!

But I said that this bill contained an important limitation which had never heretofore existed. This was introduced at the special session of 1837, upon my own suggestion. It was then apprehended that the holders of these Treasury warrants might not present them for payment within a reasonable time; and that a large amount of them might remain outstanding, and be used as bills of exchange. As these outstanding drafts would necessarily represent an equal amount of gold and silver in the hands of the depositaries, it was apprehended that, unless they were speedily presented for payment, a mass of them might continue floating in the community, and thus produce an accumulation of specie in the hands of the depositaries which might prove injurious to the banks. To prevent this evil—to render the draft upon the banks for specie as light as possible—and to cause the gold and silver to flow out of the Treasury into general circulation, as rapidly as it had flowed into it, this amendment was adopted. It now constitutes the 23d section of the bill, and is as follows:

"SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue and publish regulations to enforce the speedy presentation of all Government drafts for payment at the place where payable, and to prescribe the time, according to the different distances of the depositaries from the seat of Government, within which all drafts upon them, respectively, shall be presented for payment; and, in default of such presentation, to direct any other mode and place of payment which he may deem proper. But in all those regulations and directions, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to guard, as far as may be, against those drafts being used, or thrown into circulation, as a paper currency or medium of exchange."

One might have supposed, from the extreme horror of the gentleman lest this bill might contain a Treasury Bank, that he would have been delighted with the provisions of this section. Not so. On the contrary, he has declared, in the most solemn manner, that it confers a tremendous power on the Secretary of the Treasury, to which no people, jealous of their liberties, ought to submit. The Senator is hard to please. He first denounces, in the strongest terms, the tenth section of the bill, because the Treasury drafts issued under its authority will, in his opinion, become the circulating medium of his Treasury Bank; and almost at the very next breath, he denounces, in terms equally strong, the very section which renders it impossible that they ever can become such a circulating medium.

And what is this tremendous power vested in the Secretary of the Treasury by the 23d section? Independently of postmasters, there are perhaps a hundred and fifty receivers of public money in the United States. These are scattered from Maine to Georgia, and from the Atlantic to the far West. Some of them are at the distance of fifty miles, and others are a thousand miles from Washington. From the nature and necessity of the case, the discretionary power is conferred upon the Secretary to regulate "the speedy presentation" of these drafts, according to the different distances of the depositaries from the seat of Government; but even this is to be done in such a manner as to prevent them from being thrown into circulation as a paper currency or medium of exchange. And yet this is the tremendous power so much to be dreaded! No other provision could have been made. It would have been a work of endless and unnecessary labor to have attempted to enumerate each of the depositaries in the bill, and to have prescribed the time within which drafts on each of them should be presented for payment. This is a mere matter of detail which must be yielded to the discretion of the Secretary.

And now what, in plain English, is this Government Bank? It is no other than the power which has always been exercised by the Treasurer of the United States, to pay the public creditors, and to advance money to the disbursing officers by means of drafts on the public depositaries; with a new restriction, however, imposed upon the holders of these drafts, requiring their speedy presentation, for the express purpose of preventing the possibility of their ever becoming a circulating medium. Any man who can distinguish between a hawk and a handsaw, can discriminate between this simple provision and a great Government Treasury Bank.

The Senator, feeling that he has no foundation on which to erect his Treasury Bank in the bill, as it is, has taxed his fancy—a never failing resource—to alarm our fears as to what it will become hereafter. He leaves the present far behind, and looks forward to the future. He predicts that in less than three years necessity will compel us to change the Independent Treasury into a bank of issue. Having given his fancy the reins, he tells us how this will be performed. The Secretary of the Treasury, instead of giving single drafts on the depositaries for the amount due to public creditors, and the sums to be advanced to disbursing officers, is to have drafts prepared upon bank paper, in the likeness of bank notes, of the denomination of twenty, of fifty, and of a hundred dollars. These drafts he is to pay out like bank paper. The restriction is to be repealed requiring their speedy presentation to the depositaries. They are to become the general circulating medium of the country. In less than ten years the receivers-general are to have between forty and fifty millions of gold and silver in their vaults, to be represented by the same amount of Treasury drafts in circulation, and in the possession of the banks. The Government then calculating that the demand upon these depositaries will not require them to keep this amount of specie on hand, will draw it out clandestinely for their own purposes, as was formerly done from the bank of Amsterdam; and that some future President will, by means of this stolen money, subvert the Government, and destroy the liberties of the people.

Now, sir, is not this the merest fancy picture that was ever sketched? It is all the offspring of the Senator's own prolific imagination. It is all prophecy, and no fact. Even by his own showing, there is no foundation for it in the bill. On the contrary, every precaution has been used to prevent the possibility of any such occurrences.

And what reason has he to predict that the friends of this measure will change all their principles and purposes in less than three years, and by new legislation convert the Independent Treasury into a Government Bank? Has not every Senator perceived the holy horror with which my friend from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] was inspired at the bare idea that the Government might ever issue "notes, bills, or paper," receivable in payment of the public dues? His lynx-eyed jealousy seized hold of these general expressions, in the 19th and 20th sections of the bill, and although there was nothing on the face of the earth on which these words could operate, unless possibly on some straggling Treasury note which might remain unredeemed long after it became payable, yet he had them stricken from the bill. "He snuffed the tainted breeze" from afar; and although there was no present danger, yet he saw a possibility that these words might have a meaning hereafter; and that in future years the Government might be willing to issue "notes, bills, or paper," and therefore we all united with him in voting for his amendment. This was, in the phrase of the lawyers, the exclusion of any conclusion which might by possibility be drawn from these general words in favor of Government paper.

But again: did not the Senator from Kentucky perceive with what alacrity the friends of the bill supported the amendment of his colleague, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] imposing it upon the Secretary of the Treasury as a solemn duty, to take care, in his regulations for the speedy presentation of Government drafts to the depositaries, that these drafts, as far as may be, shall never be used as a paper currency or medium of exchange?

Suppose it were possible that the Secretary of the Treasury, without authority, and in the very face of the provisions of this bill, and the known and avowed opinion of its friends, should, as the Senator supposes he might, circulate these Government drafts in the form of bank paper, and of the denomination of twenty, fifty, and a hundred dollars; what do you think would be the consequence? He would instantly be deprived of his office for this daring violation of law, and would be justly held up to public execration. In justice to that officer, I ought to say that I am not one of those who consider it possible that he could ever dream of pursuing such a course, without the express authority of Congress: and I may venture to predict, with unerring certainty, that such an authority will never be conferred upon him by the present party in power. But even if he should thus violate his duty; whilst the 23d section of this bill shall remain in force, these drafts never could become a general circulating medium: and, therefore, there could never be, as the Senator supposes, an accumulation of forty-five or fifty millions of dollars in the hands of the depositaries. But even if this miracle should be accomplished, and a future President should attempt to embezzle this money, for the purpose of subverting the Government, there would still be one most unpleasant obstacle in his way. He would then, under the provisions of this bill, be guilty of felony, and would be transferred from the White House to the penitentiary. The truth is that "these hydras, gorgons, and chimeras dire," exist only in the Senator's imagination.

The Senator, in a triumphant tone, exclaimed that, by the passage of the bill, the union of the purse with the sword will be consummated in the hands of the President. This, if true, would indeed be fearful. It would be the death knell of civil liberty in this country. Wheresoever the power over the purse and the sword is united in the hands of one man, there the Government is despotic. If any Executive Magistrate, be he King, or be he President, possess the sole power to declare war, to raise armies, to impose taxes, and to expend the public money at his pleasure, there must be an end of civil liberty in that country. This, and this alone, is what I understand to be a union of the sword and the purse. But under our Constitution and laws, the President neither has, nor ever can have, the power over either. Can he declare war? No, sir; the Constitution expressly confers this power upon Congress. Can he enlist soldiers? No, sir; he could not raise a single company to go to Florida, because Congress alone have the power to raise and support armies. Can he impose taxes upon the people, or borrow money? No, sir; Congress is exclusively vested with the power of laying taxes and borrowing money. But after this money shall have reached the Treasury, can he apply a dollar of it to any use, public or private? No, sir; no money can be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by Congress. Nay, more; if the President were so far to forget the duties of his high station, as to enter into a collusion with any of the depositaries, and draw one dollar of public money out of their possession, he would, like any other citizen, subject himself to fine and imprisonment. And this is the union of the purse and the sword, which the Senator has so feelingly described! This phrase, I thought, had had its day, and had passed into oblivion; but the Senator has again conjured up the spectre, for the purpose of alarming our fears.

The Senator tells us that he has been warring in vain for the last seven years, against the extension of Executive power and influence. Now, sir, if he had informed us that he had been warring against the Executive, but in favor of an increase of Executive power and influence, in my humble opinion he would have come much nearer the mark. It is, perhaps, the strangest spectacle which has ever been presented on the face of the earth, that in this war between the Executive and the Senator's political party, he has been endeavoring to deprive himself of power, whilst they have been struggling to prevent him from making this self sacrifice.

Let me remind the Senator of a few instances; and first, in regard to internal improvements, I happened to be a member of the other House during the administration of Mr. Adams. I do not intend now to cast any censure upon that administration. I speak merely of historical facts. In those days, by virtue of an act of Congress, the President exercised the discretionary power of making as many surveys for internal improvements as he thought proper, all of which, it was hoped by those interested, would, at some future day, be constructed by the General Government. Splendid projects of such improvements were presented to dazzle the fancy, and excite the cupidity, of almost every man in the country. Our engineers were constantly traversing the Union from east to west, and from north to south; and before they were arrested in their career, the estimated cost of completing the improvements which they had surveyed or projected, if my memory serves me, amounted to more than one hundred millions of dollars. Here was a vast field for Executive influence and power. The fat jobs which might have been bestowed on favorites; the actual expenditure of immense sums of money, and the alluring hope presented by the mere survey of any railroad, turnpike road, or canal, in which masses of people felt an interest; all, all contributed to swell the tide of Executive influence. Now, sir, was there ever a lure more tempting to Executive ambition than this power of pouring out the public treasure to benefit, and, in their estimation, to bless a large proportion of the people of this country? What was the conduct of the old Roman in regard to this question? For the good of his country, he sacrificed all this power and all this patronage. His veto of the Maysville road bill arrested the whole system; and, strange as it may seem, a portion of the gentleman's seven years' war against the Executive, consisted in denouncing this voluntary surrender of Executive power and influence, as ruinous to the best interest of the country.

Again: the very bill now before the Senate, against which the gentleman has been warring, is one of the strongest proofs which the present Chief Magistrate could give, that he is willing to abandon a large portion of Executive influence. In 1837, there were between eighty and ninety Government deposite banks, scattered over every State in the Union. What an immense political power might have been exercised by the President through the agency of these banks! We know, from letters read at the called session, that they were not very scrupulous, "where thrift would follow fawning." Affiliated as they were, if the President had been disposed to exert an improper influence over them, they might have been used with prodigious effect to accomplish his purposes. The selection of these depositaries—the amount of the public money which they should receive—how long they should retain it, and in what manner they should conduct their business—all, all was left to Executive discretion. What a boundless field for Executive influence is that which the present President now desires to abandon! And yet the Senator, both at the called session, and the session succeeding it, warred in favor of compelling him to retain in his hands this unbounded source of political patronage and power. He preferred then, and, such is his detestation for the present bill, would, I presume, even now prefer, the deposite bank system to the Independent Treasury.

Can any man, in sober earnest, compare the influence which the Executive will acquire, under this bill, by the appointment of four receivers-general of public money, with that over this affiliated league of State banks, which he now desires to abandon? Think ye, sir, that if any of the leading officers of Government, or any of the favored minions of Executive power, had desired a loan from one of these banks, that he would have asked in vain? Under the Independent Treasury bill, such favors can never be extended without subjecting both the officer granting them, and the recipient, to punishment in the penitentiary.

The Senator complains that the power of removal from office should exist in the President, and says that he is not at all satisfied with the argument in the first Congress on which it was rested. This power has been exercised, without interruption, ever since 1789. It is not, then, a recent usurpation. The first Congress of the United States which ever assembled, by their construction of the Constitution, solemnly declared that the power of removal was vested in the President; and many of the members of this Congress had themselves been members of the Federal Convention. Since the gentleman addressed the Senate, I have examined the debate, and particularly Mr. Madison's remarks upon this subject, and I think they ought to prove satisfactory to every mind. He sketches the argument in favor of the power with a master's hand.

How could the President execute the laws at all, if this power did not exist? Suppose he should discover that one of the receivers-general created by this very bill was applying the public money to his own use—if he were deprived of the power of removing him from office, he might be obliged to look patiently on and suffer him to embezzle millions. Suppose a foreign minister were violating his instructions, and betraying the best interests of his country abroad—what is to be done? Without the exercise of this power, the President would be compelled to wait until the mischief might be entirely consummated—until the country might be ruined—before he could recall this corrupt or wicked minister. I might present a hundred similar instances. This power is essential to the performance of the duty imposed upon the President of seeing that the laws are faithfully executed. Without it, he would be deprived of the necessary means of executing this high trust reposed in him by the Constitution. It is, therefore, wonderful how the existence of this power could ever have been seriously contested.

If this power of removal did not exist in the President, it would follow as a necessary consequence that the Senate must remain in permanent session for the purpose of sanctioning removals from office, as they might become necesary, throughout this vast and growing country. The public interest imperiously demands that some power should always exist competent instantly to remove all officers the moment they are discovered to be betraying their trust. But the Constitution never contemplated that the Senate should be in session permanently. Heaven forbid that this should ever be the case! After having been in the political atmosphere of Washington for six months, it is necessary that we should go home to mingle with our constituents and to breathe the pure air of the country. The American people never will consent, and never ought to consent, that our sessions shall become permanent.

Having now replied to all the arguments adduced by the Senator under his second general head, and having, I think, demonstrated that the bill contains no Government Treasury Bank, I shall proceed to reply to those which he urged under the first general head. It will be recollected that this was to consider the bill according to the construction placed upon it by its friends, which, I have endeavored to prove, is the true construction.

Before I address myself directly to the Senator's argument, allow me to indulge in some general observations.

What has been the financial history of this country for the last twenty-five years? I can speak with positive knowledge upon this subject during the period of eighteen years since I first came into public life. It has been a history of constant vibration—of extravagant expansions in the business of the country, succeeded by ruinous contractions. At successive intervals many of the best and most enterprising men of the country have been crushed. They have fallen victims at the shrine of the insatiate and insatiable spirit of extravagant banking and speculation. Starting at the extreme point of depression of one of these periods, we find that the country has been glutted with foreign merchandise, and it requires all our efforts to pay the debt thus contracted to foreign nations. At this crisis the banks can do nothing to relive the people. In order to preserve their own existence, they are compelled to contract their loans and their issues. In the hour of distress, when their assistance is most needed, they can do nothing for their votaries. Every article sinks in price, men are unable to pay their debts, and wide spread ruin pervades the land. During this first year of the cycle, we are able to import but comparatively little foreign merchandise, and this affords the country an opportunity of recruiting its exhausted energies. The next year the patient begins to recover. Domestic manufactures flourish in proportion as foreign goods become scarce. The industry and enterprise of our citizens have been exerted with energy, and our productions have liquidated the foreign debt. The third year, a fair business is done. The country presents a flourishing appearance. The banks, relieved from the drains of specie required for foreign export, begin once more to expand, and tempt the unwary to their ruin. Property of all descriptions commands a fair price. The fourth or the fifth year the era of extravagant banking and speculation returns, again to be succeeded by another ruinous revulsion.

This was the history of the country up till 1837. Since then we have travelled the road to ruin much more rapidly than in former years. Before that period it had required from three to six years to get up an expansion and its corresponding explosion. We have now witnessed the astounding fact that we can pass through all these changes, and even from one suspension of specie payments to another, in little more than two years.

It is curious to observe with how much accuracy you can read the ever changing condition of this country in the varied amount of our importations. The year 1836 was one of vast expansion, and produced the explosion and suspension of specie payments in 1837. The imports were greatly diminished in 1837, being less than they had been in 1836, by nearly fifty millions of dollars. In 1838, they sunk down to twenty-seven millions less than they had been in 1837, and nearly seventy-seven millions less than they were in 1836. In 1839, we had another expansion, and our imports were forty-four millions of dollars greater than they had been in 1838. This expansion preceded the explosion and suspension of specie payments in the month of October last. Thus we have become such skilful architects of ruin, that a single year was sufficient to prepare the late explosion.

There never has existed a nation on earth, except our own, that could endure such rapid and violent expansions and contractions. It is the buoyancy of youth—it is the energies of our population—it is the spirit which never quails before difficulties—which enables us to endure such shocks without utter ruin. Yes, sir, a difference in the amount of our imports, between the years 1836 and 1838, of seventy-seven millions of dollars, is sufficient to excite the astonishment of the world.

What causes chiefly operated to produce this speedy recurrence of the second explosion and the second suspension of specie payments? Three may be mentioned. In the first place, after the bank suspension of 1837, every person who was friendly to well regulated banks, if such a thing be possible under the present system, ardently desired that the different State Legislatures might impose upon them some wholesome restrictions. It was expected that they would be compelled to keep a certain amount of specie in their vaults in proportion to their circulation and deposites; that the foundation of a specie basis for our paper currency should be laid by prohibiting the circulation of bank notes at the first under the denomination of ten and afterwards under that of twenty dollars; that the amount of their dividends should be limited; and, above all, that upon the occurrence of another suspension their doors should be closed at once, and their affairs be placed in the hands of commissioners. The different Legislatures met. Much indignation was expressed at the conduct of the banks. They were severely threatened; but at last they proved too powerful for the people. Indeed, it would almost seem as if most of the State Legislatures had met for no other purpose than to legalize the previous suspension of specie payments. No efficient restrictions were imposed; and the banks were thus taught that they might thereafter go unpunished—unwhipped of justice. Past impunity prevented them from reducing their business and curtailing their profits in such a manner as to render them secure in the day of trial. They have fallen again; I fear again to enjoy the same impunity.

In the second place, the immense amount of money loaned to many of the States in England, a large portion of which was brought home in the form of foreign merchandise, afforded great facilities for overtrading, or rather overbuying.

And in the third place, the conduct of the Bank of the United States greatly tended to produce these excessive importations. That institution became the broker for the sale of all State bonds in Europe. It endeavored to monopolize the entire cotton trade of the country; and it drew bills of exchange on England, most freely, at moderate rates, against the proceeds of these bonds and of its cotton. Every temptation was thus presented to speculations in foreign merchandise.

These three causes combining, have occasioned a second suspension of specie payments within two years after the first, and produced that bloated credit system, from the wreck of which our country is now deeply suffering.

I most heartily concur with the Senator from Kentucky in one of his positions. We certainly produce too little and import too much. Our expanded credit system is the great cause of this calamity. Confine it within safe and reasonable bounds, and this disastrous effect will no longer be produced. It is not in the power of Congress to do much towards a consummation so desirable. Still we shall do all we can; and the present bill will exercise some influence in restraining the banks from making extravagant loans and emitting extravagant issues.

What effect has this bloated system of credit produced upon the morals of the country? In the large commercial cities, it has converted almost all men of business into gamblers. Where is there now to found the old fashioned importing merchant, whose word was as good as his bond, and who was content to grow rich, as our fathers did, by the successive and regular profits of many years of patient industry? Such men were the glory and pride of commerce, and elevated the character of their country both at home and abroad. I ask, where are they? Is not the race almost extinct? All now desire to grow rich rapidly. Each takes his chance in the lottery of speculation. Although there may be a hundred chances to one against him, each, eagerly intent upon the golden prize, overlooks the intervening rocks and quicksands between him and it, and when he fondly thinks he is about to clutch it, he sinks into bankruptcy and ruin. Such has been the fate of thousands of our most enterprising citizens.

If the speculator should prove successful and win the golden prize, no matter by what means he may have acquired his wealth, this clothes him with honor and glory. Money, money, money, confers the highest distinction in society. The Republican simplicity and virtue of a Macon would be subjects of ridicule in Wall street or Chestnut street. The highest talents, directed by the purest patriotism, moral worth, literary and professional fame, in short, every quality which ought to confer distinction in society, sink into insignificance when compared with wealth. Money is equivalent to a title of nobility in our larger commercial cities. This is the effect of our credit system.

We have widely departed from the economical habits, and simple virtues of our forefathers. These are the only sure foundations upon which our Republican institutions can rest. The desire to make an ostentatious display of rapidly acquired wealth, has produced a splendor and boundless expense unknown in former times. There is now more extravagance in our large commercial cities, than exists in any portion of the world, which I have ever seen, except among the wealthy nobility of England. Thank Heaven, this extravagance has but partially reached the mountains and valleys of the interior. The people there, so far as their potential voice can be heard, are determined to put an end to this bloated credit system, which threatens to involve not only their private fortunes, but their political liberties in ruin.

After the revulsion in 1837—after the banks had blown up, and left the Government without a dollar, the President found it necessary to convene Congress. It then became indispensable to take a new departure. The course which ought to be pursued was the question. The banks had betrayed our trust; they had converted our money into rags, by a species of alchymy the very reverse of that which was attempted in former times, of converting baser things into gold. The President then recommended an absolute divorce between Bank and State, and his political friends in Congress cordially responded to this recommendation. We then gave our banner to the breeze, with the motto of an Independent Treasury inscribed upon it. Have we not firmly and immoveably maintained our position? Had we been the cormorants after office which our enemies have described us to be, we should have yielded our convictions, when we found one State after another abandoning our standard. Neither the love of power nor of place made us falter. We did not yield to the panic of the moment. We have ever since kept this issue distinctly before the people, honestly believing that a separation of the Government from banks was necessary to promote the best and dearest interests of the country. In the opinion of our political opponents, we stood self immolated. But the people have at length gloriously come to the rescue. The Senator is entirely mistaken in supposing this bill to be unpopular. In every instance, during the elections of the last year, when the question of an Independent Treasury was distinctly made before the people, the result has been either the election of the Administration candidates, or a greatly increased number of votes in their favor. Is it not certain, that if the Congressional elections in those States which elected their members in 1838, had been postponed until 1839, we should now be in a triumphant majority in the other House? The Whig party know this; and I am greatly mistaken in the signs of the times, if they have not determined that this bill shall pass. They will no longer give us the battle cry of an Independent Treasury. The bill is destined to become a law during the present session. I prophesy this result, and prophesy it solely upon my opinion of the sagacity of the Whig party. It is possible I may be mistaken, but if I should, I shall have one consolation in my disappointment. If my political existence depended upon the result, I should rather have the success of the Independent Treasury identified with the re-election of Mr. Van Buren, than any other argument which can be used in his favor. It alone would be sufficient to defeat the hero of Tippecanoe.

Now, sir, great changes have taken place in public opinion since September, 1837. The prominent arguments then urged upon this floor against the Independent Treasury bill have nearly all vanished away. We now hear no more of a system of well regulated specie paying State banks to act as Governmet depositories. The half-way house has been abandoned. The accommodations there are no longer good. It is in a ruinous condition, and can no longer shelter those who formerly took refuge in it. The banks have blown up twice within little more than two years, and thus blown this argument of their friends sky high. No statesman, after our recent experience, would now think of placing the people's treasure with the banks on general deposite for safe keeping.

Far different is the Independent Treasury. It presents every guarantee which can be afforded for the safety and security of the public money. It will be in the custody of officers appointed by the Government, responsible to the Government, and punishable as felons for every violation of their trust. In the day of danger, when the country is involved in war, the money will always be ready; and at such a crisis, the banks would almost certainly suspend specie payments. Besides, they are mere State institutions, over which we have no control; and they may, when they please, convert our money into rags, and then place us at defiance. They are beyond the reach of punishment under our authority. The Federal Government cannot justly be considered independent, if we must resort to State banks, or to any other power except our own, for the purpose of keeping the money raised from the people by taxation, until it can be applied to execute the great powers conferred upon us by the Constitution.

Again: public opinion has annihilated another argument against the Independent Treasury. The Senator from South Carolina, in March, 1838, [Mr. PRESTON,] in his tenderness towards the State banks, and for the purpose of enabling them to resume specie payments, propos d that we shou'd, for a limited period, receive their irredeemable paper in the payment of dues to the Government. Much eloquence was also formerly wasted upon the extreme cruelty of having one currency for the Government and another for the people. Thank God! we hear no more of all this. No person now contends that, under any circumstances, the Government ought to receive depreciated bank paper. Such fantasies have proved too light for earth. They have risen to the moon, where it is said the crude notions of speculative politicians are still floating about, and have a local habitation and a name.

The Senator charges us with having employed the State banks as depositories, and having commended their conduct in the highest terms. This was a grievous sin, and grievously have we answered it. The difference between him and us is this: that after they had shown themselves to be utterly unworthy of our confidence, we abandoned them; but at that moment he clasped them to his bosom. Admitting that there has been inconsistency on both sides, the state of the fact is this: we adopted the State banks; they betrayed us, and we cast them off forever. The Opposition denounced this system in the beginning, and prophesied that it would prove a failure; but at the very moment when their prediction was verified, they embraced these castaways themselves with all the ardor of lovers. These banks, as depositories of the public money, are now repudiated by all parties. Their day has passed, and we shall hear little more of them in connection with this subject.

All men are wise after the fact; but, to look back, it has often occurred to me as wonderful how we could ever have confided in the State banks as safe general depositories of the public treasure. Our system of banking is the very worst, and the most irresponsible that has ever existed on the face of the earth. The charters of these banks nowhere impose any efficient restraints upon the first instinct of their nature, which is to make as much money for their stockholders as possible. They will, therefore, always expand their credits and their issues in the day of delusive prosperity, without regarding the approaching storm. The immense deposites of the Government increased this fatal tendency; whilst the public money was freely loaned, and its security placed at hazard, for the benefit of their stockholders, but for the ruin of the country. The wonder, perhaps, ought rather to be that they held out so long, than that they should have finally exploded.

In 1836, the immense amount of these deposites had stimulated them almost to madness. The expansion was then at its height beyond all former example. Speculation raged throughout the land. The suspicions of the country were aroused against the Government, and the banks were charged with granting peculiar favors to men high in office, and to influential partisans of the Administration. They were denominated "the pet banks." Such was the general sense of the insecurity of the public money, in their possession, and such the jealousy which existed among the people, in consequence of their connection with the Government, that I verily believe the present Chief Magistrate would never have been elected, had it not been for the passage of the deposite bill. The adoption of this measure was a choice of evils; but it was a much less evil than to have left nearly forty millions of the public money in possession of the banks. Under the Independent Treasury system, we shall never again be placed in such a fearful dilemma.

I was very much astonished that we had no remily from the Senator against the specie clause of the bill. Even this seems to have lost much of its terrors. It is no longer the terrific monster which was to devour all the banks and establish a pure metallic currency for all the transactions of all the people of the United States.

There could be no Independent Treasury without this clause. If you were to receive bank notes in payment of the public dues, and retain them in your possession, you would, in this manner, encourage the banks as much to make extravagant expansions, as though you placed the same amount with them on general deposite. Besides, you would thus confer a dangerous power upon the Secretary of the Treasury, enabling him to favor some banks and to ruin others; and even if this power should not be abused, suspicion would always surround its exercise. You must separate from the banks in every particular. Evils, both to them and to the country, will follow from the least connection with them. Besides, if you receive bank notes at all, to the extent of the amount which you hold on hand, you incur the very same risk of having them converted into irredeemable paper by an explosion of the banks, as if they held them on general deposite.

The Senator commenced his speech by presenting us the most gloomy picture of national distress. He predicted that this distress would continue to increase during the present year, and that it would affect all classes of the community. The suffering, he thinks, will be peculiarly severe during the approaching summer. I might say to him,

"Thy wish was father, Harry, to the thought."

I do not believe, however, he would desire that the people should suffer in order to accomplish any political purpose. But if, without contributing to this result himself, it should be the will of the powers above to involve us in pecuniary distress between this time and the Presidential election, he would doubtless bear the dispensation with Christian fortitude. It would furnish political capital for his friends, and might contribute greatly to verify his prediction, that General Harrison will take possession of the White House on the 4th of March, 1841.

In my opinion, the Senator has greatly exaggerated the extent of the existing distress. That all classes of the community have suffered in some degree is certain; but intense suffering has been chiefly confined to the large commercial cities, and those portions of the Union, such as the State of Mississippi, where the banks have so evidently ruined the people as to place all doubt of the cause at defiance. Where is there the country under the sun on which a bountiful Providence has poured out more blessings than on Mississippi? No population on the globe, in proportion to their number, produces a larger amount of wealth from the cultivation of the soil. And yet the bounty of Providence has been counteracted by her miserable banking system, and her people are now subjected to intense suffering. In this instance the effect flows so palpably from the cause, that every man sees and feels and knows it. What an astonishing fact was that stated by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER,] that in those counties of his State where banks do not exist, there is no suffering even at the present moment! If you wanted an illustration of the pernicious effects of the banking system, when it tempts farmers and planters to abandon their own proper business and embark on the ocean of wild speculation, you could not have one more striking than that presented by Mississippi at the present moment. I am not aware that there is much individual distress among the mass of the people in the interior of Pennsylvania. There it is chiefly confined to those who have been tempted, in the day of prosperity, to go beyond their means by the facility of obtaining bank accommodations.

But if I read the signs of the times aright, the crisis has passed, or rather is gradually passing away. We cannot return to a state of prosperity before the Presidential election; but the condition of individuals, generally, will not be one of intense suffering. The resources of this vast country are so great, and the productive classes are so industrious, that with two years of fair play, they can produce as much wealth as the speculators have been able to squander in one. There will be no great suffering during the next summer, unless it may be in our large commercial cities.

After presenting in glowing colors the distress of the country, the Senator asks what measure of relief have we proposed? I might ask him, in return, where he will find any clause in the Constitution conferring power upon Congress to regulate the banking and credit system of the respective States, and thus strike at the root of our calamities and embarrassments? The present Administration have not had the slightest agency in creating the existing distress, and can do but little to arrest it, or prevent its recurrence. This is a duty which devolves upon the States. Still we have proposed a measure which we believe will produce this effect to a limited extent. Our chief objects in adopting the Independent Treasury, are to disconnect the Government from all banks, to secure the people's money from the wreck of the banking system, and to have it always ready to promote the prosperity of the country in peace, and defend it in war. Incidentally, however, it will do some good in checking the extravagant spirit of speculation, which is the bane of the country.

In the first place, by requiring specie in all receipts and expenditures of the Government, you will create an additional demand for gold and silver to the amount of five millions of dollars per annum, according to the estimate of the President. A large portion of this sum will be drawn from the banks, and this will compel them to keep more specie in their vaults in proportion to their circulation and deposites, and to bank less. This, so far as it may go, will strike at the root of the existing evil. I fear, however, that it will prove to be but a very inadequate restraint upon excessive banking.

In the second place, this bill will, in some degree, diminish our imports, especially after June, 1842. I most heartily concur with the Senator in desiring this result. What is the condition of the importing business at the present moment? It is almost exclusively in the hands of British agents, who sell all the manufactures they can dispose of in other portions of the world, and then bring the residuum here to glut our markets. According to our existing laws, they receive a credit from the Government for the amount of its duties. They sell the goods for cash; and this credit becomes so much capital in their hands, to enable them to make fresh importations. The Independent Treasury bill requires that all duties shall be paid in gold and silver; and after June, 1842, the compromise law will take away the credits altogether. We shall then have a system of cash duties in operation, which will contribute much to reduce the amount of our importations, and to encourage domestic manufactures.

In the third place, this bill will make the banking interest the greatest economists in the country, so far as the Government is concerned. Their nerve of self-interest will be touched in favor of economy, and this will induce them to unite with the people in reducing the revenue and expenditures of the Government to the lowest standard consistently with the public good. They will hereafter abhor a surplus revenue, as much as they delighted in it formerly, when they used it for banking purposes. Any surplus which may exist in future, will be locked up in gold and silver in the vaults of our depositories; and, in proportion to its amount, will deprive the banks of so much of their specie. They will, therefore, become the partisans of reducing the revenue to the actual and necessary expenditures of the Government; so that the specie may flow out of the sub-treasuries with a rapidity corresponding with its influx. Nothing but a large surplus can seriously injure the banks. This was demonstrated to me by one of the most distinguished financiers which our country has ever produced, not himself, I believe, friendly to the Independent Treasury. These Treasury drafts, in the natural course of business, will find their way either into the banks at the very points where our depositaries are situated, or into the hands of individuals there having duties to pay to the Government. Take, for example, New York. A public creditor receives such a draft on the receiver-general in payment of his debt. Will he carry it to New York, receive payment, and transport the specie from that city? Such instances will be rare. He will generally deposite it to his credit in the bank with which he transacts his business, wherever that may be. This bank, if not in New York, will transmit it for collection to one of the banks there; and thus these banks will draw the specie from our depositary as rapidly as it is drawn from them for the payment of the public dues. Thus the equilibrium will be preserved, so long as the Government is without a large surplus. In other instances, these drafts will be sought after and procured by individuals having duties to pay, and they will be presented to the receivers-general, and accepted by them instead of gold and silver.

I now come to another and the most important portion of the gentleman's argument. If the President had taken the Senator from Kentucky under his umbrella, and wrapped his India-rubber cloak around him, and made him his Palinurus to steer the ship of State—

[Here Mr. CLAY said this was not a possible case.]

Mr. BUCHANAN replied, that all things are possible, and wonders will never cease. I admit that such an event is not very probable; but should it ever occur, true as the needle to the pole, the Senator would steer direct for a National Bank. This is the Senator's sovereign panacea for regulating the currency of the country and restraining the extravagance of the State banks. I admit that the true issue now before the country is between an Independent Treasury and a National Bank. "The Pet Bank" deposite system has been such an utter failure that another resort to it cannot be seriously contemplated by any considerable portion of the American people. I feel the utmost confidence in the success of the Independent Treasury, should the law be ably and efficiently executed; but should it fail, the next experiment will doubtless be another Bank of the United States.

Waiving, at present, the constitutional question on which I have often expressed my opinion before the Senate, I propose to take up the Senator's argument, and prove that such a bank would not regulate the currency if it could; and that even if it felt the will to do so, it would be entirely destitute of the power.

Would such a bank, then, if it could, control and regulate the loans and issues of the State banks? In the affairs of human life, if you expect one agent to restrain another, you ought to render their interests conflicting. This proposition is emphatically true, when such agents are banking corporations, intent upon declaring the largest possible dividends among their stockholders. Now a Bank of the United States, so far from feeling any interest adverse to the State banks, would have the very same inducements with them to make extravagant loans and issues. The duty of such a bank, as a regulator of the currency, would be directly at war with its interest as a banking institution. You cannot raise men above the selfish passions of their nature, by making them directors and stockholders in a Bank of the United States. When their interest as bankers conflicts with their duty as regulators of the currency, the history of mankind points you to the probable result. Like the State banks, they will always extend their loans and their issues, whenever they can do so without endangering their own security. This is the powerful instinct of self interest. It is absurd, then, to expect that the president and directors of a Bank of the United States will ever become safe and efficient regulators of the currency, in the very face of their own interest as stockholders. It would be easy for me to prove, from historical facts, that neither the former nor the present Bank of the United States ever did exercise a regular and efficient control over the issues of the State institutions. On the contrary, whenever their interest impelled them to extend their own issues, they have pursued this course; and thus, instead of checking, they have given loose reins to the State banks. Both the Bank of the United States and these banks have thus together rushed on, and with united forces have ministered to that spirit of overtrading and extravagant speculation which has so often desolated our country. Time will not permit me to do more than refer to the vast expansions of this Bank in 1817 and 1818, in 1823, in 1831, and in 1834. These produced ruinous contractions and universal distress. I think I may affirm, with perfect safety, that at each of these periods, instead of restraining the State banks, it took the lead. Has it ever preserved the State banking institutions in a sound condition? Let Mr. Gallatin answer this quession. He says that one hundred and sixty-five of our banks broke between 1811 and 1830; and during the greater part of this period, we all know that the present Bank of the United States was in active existence.

My great object, however, at this moment, is to prove, from the present condition of the Bank of the United States, how hopeless it is to expect that any similar institution can ever be relied upon as a regulator of the currency. That Bank still exists, if its present condition may be called existence; and this is the first occasion on which I have ever known the Senator to be guilty of ungratefully abandoning an old friend in the hour of calamity. Before I take my seat, I shall endeavor to identify the gentleman and his party with this institution. "They were lovely in life, and in death they shall not be divided."

It is said that the Bank of the United States is now but a mere State institution. But is its character changed by changing the source whence it derives its charter? Is it not still the same institution that it ever has been, with the same capital, the same directors, the same stockholders, and, until very recently, has it not been governed by the same controlling will? Has it not been exultingly proclaimed by its former president, that it now has a much better charter from Pennsylvania than that which it had received from Congress? This is strictly the truth; for such a charter as that under which it now exists was never before granted to any banking corporation, either in England or this country. The United States, it is true, ceased to be a stockholder; but it enjoyed the privilege of selling their seven millions of stock, for which it could have procured, and doubtless did procure, a large advance.

From the very nature of things, this vast monopoly, with a capital of $35,000,000, could not have become a State institution. A single State, with more than a sufficient number of State banks already in existence, could not have furnished employment for its immense capital. It would have starved within such narrow limits.

Did it, in point of fact, confine its operations to Pennsylvania? No, sir; it aspired to regulate the currency and exchanges of the whole Union. This was the high political duty to the performance of which it proclaimed itself destined. To tell me that this Bank all at once changed its character and became a mere State institution, simply because it had received a charter from the Legislature of Pennsylvania, is to deny the evidence of our own senses. Was not the currency issued under the new charter, as well as that under the old, declared, in 1836, to be the best currency which the world had ever seen? Did not the new notes command the same premium, all over the Union, with the old ones; and would they not still continue to command the same premium if it had not fallen—fallen from its high estate?

Why, sir, it became, in fact, more a Bank of the United States after it received its Pennsylvania charter than it had ever been before. It bought up State banks and converted them into branches, in Louisiana and in Georgia; and it shot out its branch agencies over the whole Union. In New York it has established a branch bank, under their free banking law.

Since its new charter, not content with the whole United States as the theatre of its operations, it has established an agency in England, and aspired "to beard the lion in his den," and to become the rival of the Bank of England in London itself. It scorned to confine itself to banking operations alone; but has invaded the province of the merchant, and has attempted to monopolize and regulate the whole cotton trade between Europe and this country. And yet this Bank is now said to be a mere Pennsylvania institution!

Now, sir, how has it succeeded in the task which it imposed upon itself—of regulating the bank issues, and the foreign and domestic exchanges of the Union? In little more than one year after its charter from Congress had expired, whilst in all respects it was under the same government, and continued to pursue the very same course of policy that it had done before, it became insolvent, and suspended specie payments with less than one million and a half of gold and silver in its vaults, or less than one dollar for twenty-three of its capital, to meet all its immense liabilities. Their amount at the time I do dot recollect at present, nor have I the means of ascertaining it in my possession.

Now, Sir, I would ask the Senator, is there the least reason to believe that if this bank had continued to be the depositary of the public revenue until May, 1837, that its fate would have been averted, or that we should not then have had a general suspension of specie payments? Why, sir, the public deposites would only have added fuel to the flame; and would have tempted the Bank to engage in still wilder speculations. The overbanking and overtrading of 1836, which were conducted under its auspices, would have become still greater—the expansion would have been still more extravagant—the bloated credit system, which enabled us in that year to import foreign merchandise to the value of nearly one hundred and ninety millions of dollars, might have raised our imports up to two hundred and fifty millions; and the catastrophe which followed would have been still more dreadful.

In order to repair its fallen fortunes, true to the law of its nature, this Bank has since proceeded from one extravagance to another, until it is now almost a heap of ruins. Instead of controlling and regulating the other banks of the country, it has notoriously been the chief, nay, almost the only cause, of the existing suspension of specie payments. The glory of which its friends now boast is, that it has been able to borrow £800,000 sterling, at an extravagant rate of interest, from private bankers in England, to save it from immediate bankruptcy and ruin. Alas! how are the mighty fallen!

And it is by the creation of another such institution that the Senator seeks to regulate the currency, and control the bank issues of the country! Why, this is faith against fact; speculation against experience. This would be to adopt, as our grand regulator, an institution precisely similar to that which has been the great author of our vast bank expansions, and our bloated credit system; and which has fallen under the weight of its own extravagance. With all the experience which the people of the United States have had upon this subject, it will be long, I trust, very long, before they return to a Bank of the United States.

But I proposed to prove that, even if a Bank of the United States had the disposition to restrain the loans and issues of the State banks, it would not possess the power. I suppose a case for the sake of the argument, which can scarcely ever exist, because, as a regulator of the currency, it would have a duty to perform directly at war with the interest of its stockholders.

The only mode by which it has been thought that this object could be accomplished, was for the Bank of the United States, confining its own business within safe and proper limits, to receive the notes of the State banks on deposite and in payment, and to call upon them at short periods to pay the balances in specie. But, in the nature of things, it would be impossible for such a bank to receive the notes, and restrain the overissues of more than a very few of the eight hundred banks, which are now scattered over this country. Each of these banks has its own limited sphere of circulation, and they are not compelled to receive the paper of each other. In point of fact, this is not generally done; nor could any Bank of the United States be required to receive all the notes which these eight hundred paper manufactories are constantly pouring out upon the public. From the law which regulates currency, that which is the worst, has always the most extensive circulation. Individuals will always hold fast by the gold and silver, and pass away the bank notes; and of these notes, they will pay out the doubtful, and preserve those which are above suspicion. No Bank of the United States, however great its capital, and extended its powers, could ever reach the evil. It could never transact business with one bank in ten, I might say in twenty, of the whole number.

But it is in vain to speculate upon this subject. Experience is the best teacher. One fact is worth one hundred arguments. Independently of the adverse experience of our own country, the experiment has been tried by the Bank of England under the most auspicious circumstances, and it has utterly failed.

The real capital of the Bank of England is about seventy millions of dollars, and it has ten branches at the most commercial and manufacturing points of the kingdom. In 1836, the rate of foreign exchange was largely against England. The specie of the Bank was, therefore, gradually drawn from its vaults for exportation. It became necessary, for its own salvation, that it should make a vigorous effort to diminish the amount of the circulating paper medium, and thereby restore the equilibrium of the foreign exchanges. The bank credits and currency of England had become so inflated, and, in consequence, the prices of all articles had advanced to such a standard, that, to use the language of one of their own statesmen, it had become the best country to sell in, and the worst country to buy in, throughout the world. It was profitable, therefore, to import every foreign production which could be admitted to entry, and on account of the high paper prices of their domestic productions, their exports were greatly diminishhd. The consequence was, a continued and ruinous drain of specie from the Bank of England to adjust the balance of the trade against that country. The bank well knew that, if it could limit the amount of the paper circulation, it would reduce the price of their home productions in the same proportion, and thus render it profitable for foreign merchants to export British manufactures instead of specie. For this purpose it contracted its loans and issues, in the vain hope that the joint stock and private banks would be compelled to follow its example. In our slang, it put the screws upon them. What was the result? I shall not enter upon a detail of particulars. It is sufficient to say, that, as it contracted, the other banks of the kingdom expanded their loans and their issues; and that, too, in a greater proportion than its loans and issues were diminished. Prices still continued to rise, and bullion still continued to be drawn out of the Bank for exportation. The utter impotency of this grand regulator of the currency to control the other banks and keep the paper currency of the kingdom within such limits as to arrest the exportation of gold and silver, has thus been so clearly demonstrated, that many of the ablest British statesmen despair of accomplishing the object in any other manner than by restricting the issues of paper money to a single bank, and regulating their amount by the agency of the Government. Here, then, is an important fact incontestably established. If this be true, and there can be no question of its truth, I would ask the Senator how a National Bank, even with a capital of fifty millions of dollars, could regulate and restrain, within proper limits, the loans and issues of eight hundred State banks, scattered over the whole extent of this vast country? The thing is impossible. It could not be accomplished by such a bank.

And what is the condition of the Bank of England at the present moment? According to the testimony of Mr. Horsley Palmer, its president, given before the secret committee of the House of Commons, previous to its recharter in 1833, the principle on which it had proceeded in regulating its issues, was to keep as much coin and bullion in its coffers as amounted to a third part of its liabilities, including sums deposited, as well as notes in circulation. Experience had established the fact, that this rule of one for three of circulation and deposites was the safe proportion. Its necessities have compelled it to depart widely from this rule of its own creation. Instead of being able to regulate the loans and issues of other banks, it has with difficulty been able to save itself. It has been going down and down, until, according to the last quarterly statement of its condition which I have seen, it had not one pound sterling in bullion for seven of its circulation and deposites. In this respect it is in a much worse condition than many of the banks in our own country. In order to save itself from utter ruin, British pride has humbled itself so much, that the Bank of England became a suppliant to that of France for a supply of bullion, which was graciously, though condescendingly, granted. This fact is the highest evidence it is possible to present of the advantages which a country, the basis of whose circulation is gold and silver, enjoys over another country, whose paper currency is greatly expanded. The Bank of England will probably never see the day, under its present charter, when its bullion will again be equal to one-third of its circulation and deposites. Indeed, one bad crop, in its present condition, would drain it of its gold and silver for the purpose of purchasing foreign grain, and compel it to suspend specie payments. Neither this bank, nor the Bank of the United States, can ever be relied upon as regulators of the loans and issues of the other banks of their respective countries.

The Senator from Kentucky would have "a well regulated Bank of the United States." He lays great emphasis upon the words "well regulated." Does he mean to insinuate that the present Bank of the United States, under its charter from Congress, was not the best regulated bank which the world ever saw? I had thought, that, in his opinion, this Bank was perfection itself. The truth, however, is, that any regulations which you can prescribe in the charter of such an institution, will be disregarded, whenever a powerful interest dictates their violation. Like the strong man in the Scriptures, it will snap the cords by which it is bound, as if they were thread. It will calculate upon violating its charter with perfect impunity, because it well knows how unwilling Congress would be to inflict so much evil upon the country as would necessarily result from its sudden destruction. Once put such an institution into successful operation, and you can no longer regulate its motion by the restrictions of its charter. The present Bank was ever a lawless institution, up until the day when it fraudulently seized upon the entire circulation of the old Bank, illegal branch drafts and all, and compelled Congress to pass a law making it a penitentiary offence in its officers to reissue these "resurrection notes." Under its State charter, it has been true to its original character. Although it now has a charter such as no other banking institution ever had, it has already been guilty of several palpable violations of this charter, independently of having twice suspended specie payments. I shall not trouble the Senate with the enumeration of these violations. It is now at the mercy of the Legislature. It has pronounced its own doom under its own charter; and it now only remains for the Legislature or the Governor to carry this sentence into execution, through the agency of the judicial tribunals. Whether they shall enforce this forfeiture or not, is for them in their wisdom to determine, not for me. I shall not, in this place, attempt to interfere with their high and responsible duties, although I should consider it the greatest of all bank reforms, if this Bank could be blotted out of existence.

The Senator ridiculed the idea that the establishment of a new Bank of the United States could prove dangerous to civil liberty. Such a Bank, with a capital of from fifty to a hundred millions of dollars, with branches in every State of the Union, directing, by its expansions and contractions, when prices should rise and when they should fall, would be a most tremendous instrument of irresponsible power. It would be a machine much more formidable than this Government, even if the Administration were as corrupt as the fancy of some gentlemen has painted it. There is a natural alliance between wealth and power. Mr. Randolph once said, "Male and female created he them." Combine the moneyed aristocracy of the country, through the agency of a National Bank, with the Administration, and their united power would create an influence which it would be almost impossible for the people to withstand. We should never again see these powers in hostile array against each other. In the days of Gen. Jackson we witnessed the exception, not the rule. Give any President such a Bank as I have described, and we shall hereafter have a most peaceful succession. With all the power of the Executive, combined with all the wealth of the country, he would be the most arrant blockhead in the world if he were not able to re-elect himself and to nominate his successor. All the forms of the Constitution might still remain. The people might still be deluded with the idea that they elected their President; but the animating spirit of our free institutions would be gone for ever. A secret, but all-pervading, moneyed influence, would sap the foundations of liberty and render it an empty name.

The immense power of such an institution was manifested in the tremendous efforts which it made against General Jackson. Had he not enjoyed more personal popularity in this country than any man who ever lived, these efforts would have proved irresistible. As it was, the conflict was of the most portentous character, and shook the Union to its centre. Indeed the Bank, at one time, would, in all human probability, have gained the victory, had the election of President chanced to occur at that period; and we should then have witnessed the appalling spectacle of the triumph of the Bank over the rights and liberties of the people. The Constitution of the country and the Democratic party would then have been prostrated together.

On Friday last, when I very unexpectedly addressed the Senate, I stated a principle of political economy which I shall now read from the book. It is this: "that if you double the amount of the necessary circulating medium in any country, you thereby double the nominal price of every article. If, when the circulating medium is fifty millions, an article should cost one dollar, it would cost two, if, without any increase of the uses of a circulating medium, the quantity should be increased to one hundred millions." The same effect would be produced, whether the circulating medium were specie, or convertible bank paper mingled with specie. It is the increased quantity of the medium, not its character, which produces this effect. Of course I leave out of view irredeemable bank paper.

I do not pretend that, on questions of political economy, you can attain mathematical certainty. All you can accomplish is to approach it as near as possible. The principle which I have stated is sufficiently near the truth to answer my present purpose. From this principle, I drew an inference that the extravagant amount of our circulating medium, consisting, in a great degree, of the notes thrown out upon the community by eight hundred banks, was injurious to our domistic manufactures. In other words, that extravagant banking and domestic manufactures are directly hostile to each other.

I did not understand that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] contested the general proposition that an increase in the currency of any country, without any increase of the uses of a circulating medium, would, in the same proportion, enhance the price of all the productions of that country whose value was not regulated by a foreign demand. He could not have contested this principle. If he had, all history and all experience would have been arayed against him.

The discovery of the mines of South America, and the consequent vast increase of the precious metals put into circulation in the form of money, have greatly enhanced the nominal price of all property throughout the world. Indeed it is now a matter of curious amusement, to contrast the low prices of all articles three centuries ago, with their present greatly advanced rates. The Bank of England recognises, and constantly acts upon this principle, though often without success. When prices become so high, in consequence of a redundancy of paper currency and bank credits, that it is more profitable to export the precious metals from the kingdom than its manufactures, this bank constantly diminishes its loans, raises the rate of interest, and reduces its circulation, with the avowed object of reducing prices to such a standard as will render it more profitable to export merchandise than bullion. It is in this manner that the Bank seeks to regulate the foreign exchanges.

But why need we resort to foreign nations for illustrations of the truth of this position, when it has been brought home to the actual knowledge of every man within this country. Have we not all learned, by bitter experience, that when our periodical expansions commence, the price of all property begins to rise? It goes on increasing with the increasing expansion, until the bubble bursts; and then bank accommodations and bank issues are contracted, the amount of the currency is reduced, and prices fall to their former level. This is the history of our own country, and we all know it. A certain amount of currency is necessary to represent the entire exchangeable property of a country; and if this amount should be greatly increased, without a corresponding increase in the exchangeable productions of the country, the only consequence would be a great enhancement in nominal prices. I say nominal; because this increased price will not enable the man who receives it to purchase more real property or more of the necessaries and luxuries of life than he could have done before.

Let me now recur to the proposition with which I commenced; and I repeat that I do not pretend to mathematical accuracy in the illustration which I shall present. The United States carry on a trade with Germany and France; the former a hard money country, and the latter approaching it so nearly as to have no bank notes in circulation under the denomiaation of five hundred francs, or nearly one hundred dollars. On the contrary, the United States is emphatically a paper money country, having eight hundred banks of issue; all of them emitting notes of a denomination as low as five dollars, and most of them one, two, and three dollar notes. For every dollar of gold and silver in the vaults of these banks, they issue three, four, five, and some of them as high as ten, and even fifteen, dollars of paper. This produces a vast but ever changing expansion of the currency; and a consequent increase of the prices of all articles, the value of which is not regulated by the foreign demand, above the prices of similar articles in Germany and France. At particular stages of our expansions, we might with justice apply the principle which I have stated to our trade with these countries, and assert that, from the great redundancy of our currency, articles are manufactured in France and Germany for one-half of their actual cost in this country. Let me present an example. In Germany, where the currency is purely metallic, and the cost of every thing is reduced to a hard money standard, a piece of broadcloth can be manufactured for fifty dollars; the manufacture of which, in our country, from the expansion of our paper currency, would cost one hundred dollars. What is the consequence? The foreign French or German manufacturer imports this cloth into our country, and sells it for a hundred dollars. Does not every person perceive that the redundancy of our currency is equal to a premium of one hundred per cent. in favor of the foreign manufacturer? No tariff of protection, unless it amounted to prohibition, could counteract this advantage in favor of foreign manufactures. I would to Heaven that I could arouse the attention of every manufacturer of the nation to this important subject.

The foreign manufacturer will not receive our bank notes in payment. He will take nothing home except gold and silver, or bills of exchange, which are equivalent. He does not expend this money here, where he would be compelled to support his family, and to purchase his labor and materials at the same rate of prices which he receives for his manufactures. On the contrary, he goes home, purchases his labor, his wool, and all other articles which enter into his manufacture, at half their cost in this country; and again returns to inundate us with foreign woollens, and to ruin our domestic manufactures. I might cite many other examples; but this, I trust, will be sufficient to draw public attention to the subject. This depreciation of our currency is, therefore, equivalent to a direct protection granted to the foreign over the domestic manufacturer. It is impossible that our manufacturers should be able to sustain such an unequal competition.

Sir, I solemnly believe that if we could but reduce this inflated paper bubble to any thing like reasonable dimensions, New England would become the most prosperous manufacturing country that the sun ever shone upon. Why cannot we manufacture goods, and especially cotton goods, which will go into successful competition with British manufactures in foreign markets? Have we not the necessary capital? Have we not the industry? Have we not the machinery? And above all, are not our skill, energy, and enterprise, proverbial throughout the world? Land is also cheaper here than in any other country on the face of the earth. We possess every advantage which Providence can bestow upon us for the manufacture of cotton; but they are all counteracted by the folly of man. The raw material costs us less than it does the English, because this is an article, the price of which depends upon foreign markets, and is not regulated by our own inflated currency. We, therefore, save the freight of the cotton across the Atlantic, and that of the manufactured article on its return here. What is the reason that, with all these advantages, and with the protective duties, which our laws afford to the domestic manufacturer of cotton, we cannot obtain exclusive possession of the home market, and successfully contend for the markets of the world? It is simply because we manufacture at the nominal prices of our own inflated currency, and are compelled to sell at the real prices of other nations. Reduce our nominal to the real standard of prices throughout the world, and you cover our country with blessings and benefits. I wish to Heaven I could speak in a voice loud enough to be heard throughout New England; because, if the attention of the manufacturers could once be directed to the subject, their own intelligence and native sagacity would teach them how injuriously they are affected by our bloated banking and credit system, and would enable them to apply the proper corrective.

What is the reason that our manufactures have been able to sustain any sort of competition, even in the home market, with those of British origin? It is because England herself is, to a great extent, a paper money country, though, in this respect, not to be compared with our own. From this very cause, prices in England are much higher than they are upon the continent. The expense of living is there double what it costs in France. Hence, all the English who desire to nurse their fortunes by living cheaply, emigrate from their own country to France, or some other portion of the continent. The comparative low prices of France and Germany have afforded such a stimulus to their manufactures, that they are now rapidly extending themselves, and would obtain possession, in no small degree, even of the English home market, if it were not for their protecting duties. Whilst British manufactures are now languishing, those of the continent are springing into a healthy and vigorous existence. It was but the other day that I saw an extract from an English paper, which stated that whilst the cutlery manufactured in Germany was equal in quality with the British, it was so reduced in price, that the latter would have to abandon the manufacture altogether.

The Senator from Massachusetts, after all our experience, doubts whether our currency has been inflated beyond the proper degree; and to prove that it has not been, he says that the rates of exchange upon England have often been below par. This fact does not tend to prove that our paper currency is not inflated at home. Our foreign exchanges are regulated by the specie standard of the world, not by the amount of our bank issues at home; and whether they are above or below par, depends upon whether we are the debtor or the creditor nation. We ought always to be, and would always be, the creditor nation, if it were not for our extravagant speculations in foreign merchandise, produced by the redundancy of our paper credits and circulation. Our immense exports of cotton ought always to produce a balance of trade in our favor; and yet this is rarely the case. There is generally a particular period, however, in the progress of each one of our expansions and contractions, when exchange is in our favor. This occurs after our cotton and other exports have paid the debt previously contracted to foreign nations; and before we have had the time and the ability to get fairly under way in a new career of extravagant importations. To say that this circumstance proves that our paper currency is not inflated, is an argument which I cannot understand. It proves nothing but that Providence has provided us a resource in our vast production of cotton, which enables us to repair the injuries which we suffer from our extravagant speculations. It does not touch my argument to show the pernicious influence which our expanded currency exerts on our domestic manufactures. If it were not for this cause, exchanges would not only be occasionally, but always, in our favor; and the Bank of England could not exercise that controlling influence over our banking institutions of which the Senator from Kentucky so loudly complains. This influence is derived solely from the fact that we are almost always the debtor nation, as we must continue to be, until our wild speculations shall be arrested.

In addition to the reason suggested why foreign exchange has sometimes been in our favor, notwithstanding our extravagant importations, I might add another which has operated with vast power during the last two or three years. This is the immense amount of money which several of the States have borrowed from England within that period. This money constituted a fund on which bills were drawn to a large amount, and consequently reduced the rate of exchange. The payment of the interest on this debt, particularly as we shall probably not soon increase the principal, will operate hereafter in a contrary direction, and will tend to raise, not reduce, the rate of our foreign exchanges.

But the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] leaves no stone unturned. He says that the friends of the Independent Treasury desire to establish an exclusive metallic currency, as the medium of all dealings throughout the Union; and, also, to reduce the wages of the poor man's labor so that the rich employer may be able to sell his manufactures at a lower price. Now, sir, I deny the correctness of both these propositions; and, in the first place, I, for one, am not in favor of establishing an exclusive metallic currency for the people of this country. I desire to see the banks greatly reduced in number; and would, if I could, confine their accommodations to such loans or discounts, for limited periods, to the commercial, manufacturing, and trading classes of the community, as the ordinary course of their business might render necessary. I never wish to see farmers and mechanics and professional men tempted, by the facility of obtaining bank loans for long periods, to abandon their own proper and useful and respectable spheres, and rush into wild and extravagant speculation. I would, if I could, radically reform the present banking system, so as to confine it within such limits as to prevent future suspensions of specie payments; and without exception, I would instantly deprive each and every bank of its charter, which should again suspend. Establish these or similar reforms, and give us a real specie basis for our paper circulation, by increasing the denomination of bank notes first to ten, and afterwards to twenty dollars, and I shall then be the friend, not the enemy of banks. I know that the existence of banks and the circulation of bank paper are so identified with the habits of our people, that they cannot be abolished, even if this were desirable. To reform, and not to destroy, is my motto. To confine them to their appropriate business, and prevent them from ministering to the spirit of wild and reckless speculation, by extravagant loans and issues, is all which ought to be desired. But this I shall say. If experience should prove it to be impossible to enjoy the facilities which well regulated banks would afford, without, at the same time, continuing to suffer the evils which the wild excesses of the present banks have hitherto entailed upon the country, then I should consider it the lesser evil to abolish them altogether. If the State Legislatures shall now do their duty, I do not believe that it will ever become necessary to decide on such an alternative.

We are also charged by the Senator from Kentucky with a desire to reduce the wages of the poor man's labor. We have been often termed agrarians on our side of the House. It is something new under the sun, to hear the Senator and his friends attribute to us a desire to elevate the wealthy manufacturer, at the expense of the laboring man and the mechanic. From my soul, I respect the laboring man. Labor is the foundation of the wealth of every country; and the free laborers of the North deserve respect, both for their probity and their intelligence. Heaven forbid that I should do them wrong! Of all the countries on the earth, we ought to have the most consideration for the laboring man. From the very nature of our institutions, the wheel of fortune is constantly revolving and producing such mutations in property, that the wealthy man of to-day may become the poor laborer of to-morrow. Truly wealth often takes to itself wings and flies away. A large fortune rarely lasts beyond the third generation, even if it endure so long. We must all know instances of individuals obliged to labor for their daily bread, whose grandfathers were men of fortune. The regular process of society would almost seem to consist of the efforts of one class to dissipate the fortunes which they have inherited, whilst another class, by their industry and economy, are regularly rising to wealth. We have all, therefore, a common interest, as it is our common duty, to protect the rights of the laboring man; and if I believed for a moment that this bill would prove injurious to him, it should meet my unqualified opposition.

Although this bill will not have as great an influence as I could desire, yet, as far as it goes, it will benefit the laboring man as much, and probably more, than any other class of society. What is it he ought most to desire? Constant employment, regular wages, and uniform reasonable prices for the necessaries and comforts of life which he requires. Now, sir, what has been his condition under our system of expansions and contractions? He has suffered more by them than any other class of society. The rate of his wages is fixed and known; and they are the last to rise with the increasing expansion, and the first to fall when the corresponding revulsion occurs. He still continues to receive his dollar per day, whilst the price of every article which he consumes is rapidly rising. He is at length made to feel that, although he nominally earns as much, or even more than he did formerly, yet, from the increased price of all the necessaries of life, he cannot support his family. Hence the strikes for higher wages, and the uneasy and excited feelings which have at different periods, existed among the laboring classes. But the expansion at length reaches the exploding point, and what does the laboring man now suffer? He is for a season thrown out of employment altogether. Our manufactures are suspended; our public works are stopped; our private enterprises of different kinds are abandoned; and, whilst others are able to weather the storm, he can scarcely procure the means of bare subsistence.

Again, sir: who, do you suppose, held the greater part of the worthless paper of the one hundred and sixty-five broken banks to which I have referred? Certainly it was not the keen and wary speculator, who snuffs danger from afar. If you were to make the search, you would find more broken bank notes in the cottages of the laboring poor than any where else. And these miserable shinplasters, where are they? After the revulsion of 1837, laborers were glad to obtain employment on any terms; and they often received it upon the express condition that they should accept this worthless trash in payment. Sir, an entire suppression of all bank notes of a lower denomination than the value of one week's wages of the laboring man is absolutely necessary for his protection. He ought always to receive his wages in gold and silver. Of all men on the earth, the laborer is most interested in having a sound and stable currency.

All other circumstances being equal, I agree with the Senator from Kentucky that that country is most prosperous where labor commands the highest wages. I do not, however, mean by the terms "highest wages," the greatest nominal amount. During the Revolutionary war, one day's work commanded a hundred dollars of continental paper; but this would scarcely have purchased a breakfast. The more proper expression would be, to say that that country is most prosperous where labor commands the greatest reward; where one day's labor will procure not the greatest nominal amount of a depreciated currency, but most of the necessaries and comforts of life. If, therefore, you should, in some degree, reduce the nominal price paid for labor, by reducing the amount of your bank issues within reasonable and safe limits, and establishing a metallic basis for your paper circulation, would this injure the laborer? Certainly not; because the price of all the necessaries and comforts of life are reduced in the same proportion, and he will be able to purchase more of them for one dollar in a sound state of the currency, than he could have done, in the days of extravagant expansion, for a dollar and a quarter. So far from injuring, it will greatly benefit the laboring man. It will insure to him constant employment and regular prices, paid in a sound currency, which, of all things, he ought most to desire; and it will save him from being involved in ruin by a recurrence of those periodical expansions and contractions of the currency, which have hitherto convulsed the country.

This sound state of the currency will have another most happy effect upon the laboring man. He will receive his wages in gold and silver; and this will induce him to lay up, for future use, such a portion of them as he can spare, after satisfying his immediate wants. This he will not do at present, because he knows not whether the trash which he is now compelled to receive as money, will continue to be of any value a week or a month hereafter. A knowledge of this fact tends to banish economy from his dwelling, and induces him to expend all his wages as rapidly as possible, lest they may become worthless on his hands.

Sir, the laboring classes understand this subject perfectly. It is the hard-handed and firm-fisted men of the country on whom we must rely in the day of danger, who are the most friendly to the passage of this bill. It is they who are the most ardently in favor of infusing into the currency of the country a very large amount of the precious metals.

The Senator has advanced another position in which I am sorry I cannot agree with him. It is this: that a permanent high rate of interest is indicative of the prosperity of any country. Now, sir, a permanent high rate of interest is conclusive evidence of a scarcity of capital, and is indicative of any thing but prosperity. I think, therefore, it will puzzle him, with all his ingenuity, to establish his proposition. To render a country truly prosperous, capital and labor must be so combined as each to receive a fair reward. In England, when the rate of interest was very high, the country was not at all in a flourishing condition; but as capital gradually accumulated, and the rate of interest consequently sunk, she became more and more prosperous, though she did not reach her highest elevation until money yielded considerably less than five per cent. But this subject is so little relevant to the question under discussion, that it is scarcely necessary to pursue it. If it were, it would be easy to show that a high rate of interest, generally, if not universally, enters into direct conflict with the wages of labor, which the Senator is so anxious to maintain. Suppose, for example, that it required a capital of $20,000 to put and to preserve an iron manufactory in successful operation. In one country the interest on this sum at ten per cent. would amount to $2,000, whilst in another it could be procured at four cent. or $800. The difference would be $1,200; and, unless this amount can be saved either by a reduction in the wages of labor, or in some other manner, the manufacturer who pays the higher rate of interest cannot endure the competition. A high rate of interest almost always presses upon the wages of labor.

If the gentleman's theory be correct, Wall street must be a perfect paradise of prosperity. There, the rate of interest for a long time has been permanently high, varying between two and four per cent. a month, or between twenty-four and forty-eight per cent. per annum. Post notes of the Bank of the United States have been discounted freely at two per cent. per month. With these facts before him, Mr. Jeffery would not now declare, as the Senator informs us he formerly did, "that this country was the heaven of the poor man and the hell of the rich." He might probably reverse the position, though it would be equally extravagant one way as the other. A country in which a rich man can realize from twenty-four to forty-eight per cent. for his money, would certainly be any thing but a place of torment for him. But what is the condition of a poor man in such a country? When capital commands such an extravagant interest to liquidate commercial debts, it will no longer be used in the employment of labor; and hence poor men must necessarily be thrown out of employment. Such a condition is any thing but a heaven for them.

The Senator exclaims with holy horror, "the Stuarts are still upon the throne, and Charles the Second has succeeded Charles the First." He has, I think, been very unfortunate in this historical allusion, if he intended to compare our Andrew with the first Charles. The enemies of Charles cut off his head, whilst our Andrew, politically speaking, cut the heads off all his enemies; and many of them were in such terror of him, that they dreaded he might turn the metaphor into a reality, and cut off their heads in earnest. Charles the Second did not succeed Charles the First. My Lord Protector intervened. Although he and the Senator from Kentucky are as different in other respects as two able and brave men can be, yet whilst he was speaking, it struck me that there was one striking point of resemblance between them. And what, sir, do you think that was? My Lord Protector always began and ended every thing as the Senator has begun and ended his speech—with prayer. Then in regard to the second Charles, I have a little to say. Of all men, the Senator ought to be the last to disparage our Martin. I have read of a great conquered General, who always pronounced his conqueror to be a very able and brave man, because, as the historian observes, it would have lessened the merits of the vanquished to have been overcome by a fool or a coward. The Senator, in speaking of Martin, ought rather to exclaim,

"Great let me call him, for he conquered me."

If, in addition, the little magician should be victorious over the hero of Tippecanoe, in the great battle to be fought the approaching autumn, and I have full faith that such will be the result, then he will go down to posterity with all "his blushing honors thick upon him."

Thanking the Senate for their patient attention, I shall now resume my seat.

SPEECH OF MR. WALKER, OF MISSISSIPPI,

In Senate, Tuesday, January 21, 1840—On the bill to provide for the collection, safe keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys.

Mr. WALKER said: I am not certain that my voice is yet so entirely restored, after recovery from severe illness, as to enable me fully to discuss the important questions involved in this bill. I will, however, endeavor to reply to some of the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY;] and in doing so, that Senator shall be treated by me with all the respect which is due to his age, experience, and long services. The Senator has referred, in his speech, to the political complexion of this body; he has complained that further delay had not been granted in proceeding to the consideration of this measure, and had more than intimated that if all the vacancies were filled, and the public will respected, that this bill could not pass the Senate. Here, then, a question of political statistics was presented, in examining which it became necessary to review the recent elections in this country, and to contrast the vote of the people of the several States with the condition of their representation on this floor. In making this contrast, however, no reflection will be cast by me upon the course of any Senator; for all will, no doubt, give their votes for or against this measure, from conscientious convictions of duty. In investigating the action of the people of the several States upon this question, I will examine the result of their most recent Congressional elections, as presenting the best general exponent of their views and wishes. Upon this basis, then, the following States, by their most recent elections, had declared in favor of this bill: namely, Maine, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Delaware, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, Arkansas, Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Michigan; in all, eighteen States, constituting not only a majority, but two-thirds of the States of this Union. If New Jersey be not counted upon either side, although the popular vote was clearly in our favor, still the result will be seventeen States for, and eight against the measure, being still a majority of two-thirds of the States. And if Michigan, since the last Congressional canvass, may have assumed the attitude of opposition in her last legislative and gubernatorial election, Georgia, also, one of the States not enumerated in our favor, has, by a similar election, pronounced most clearly for this measure. Indeed, the State of Georgia, even in her last Congressional election, may be truly claimed as having pronounced in favor of this bill; for, whilst the entire Union party in that State, and their candidates for Congress, had declared in favor of this bill, a majority of their opponents had also, it was understood, announced their determination to support it, and will faithfully redeem this pledge. Such, then, was the voice of the people of the several States; such was the declared will of two-thirds of these States; and such would be the vote of the Senate, if the will of the several States, in the absence of legislative instructions, should control the vote of every Senator upon this bill. In denouncing then, with so much violence, this bill and its advocates, the Senator from Kentucky should remember that he is, in fact, denouncing the people of two-thirds of the States of this Union. It is the people, emphatically, who have pronounced in favor of this measure, and that too after the most searching inquiry, the most deliberate investigation, and the fullest discussion here and throughout the country. This bill has been the question upon which the battle has been fought and won, and it is under the flag of an Independent Treasury, that we have been enabled to rescue this Administration from the overthrow with which it once seemed to be threatened, by the desertion of the timid, the treacherous, or venal. Sir, when at opening of the special session in September, 1837, I announced my determination to support this bill, both by my votes and speeches, and that, too, with the specie clause inserted, my expulsion from this body by legislative instructions was predicted as absolutely certain. For a time, Mississippi seemed to vibrate upon this question; but now, what is the result upon the fullest discussion? Why, a majority in favor of the measure greater than any obtained in any preceding canvass. The majority in favor of Mr. Van Buren in the electoral canvass, was less than three hundred, now the majority in favor of this measure, at the last election, is more than three thousand, and was believed to be augmenting every day by new accessions from the ranks of our political adversaries.

But this result the Senator attributes to party movements. He says the people were opposed to this measure, but that the party screws were applied, and that a few appalling shrieks have been extorted in favor of the bill from its agonizing victims. Sir, if it were (as it is not) in the power of any Administration, by mere party discipline, to rally a majority in support of a measure against the popular will, by what power is this mental torture applied to the opponents of the President? How could the party screws be applied to them; and yet have not very many of the strongest opponents of the President; have not many entire States, heretofore always arrayed against us, changed their entire front, and now yield to this great measure a cordial and sincere support? Whence this wonderful revolution in public sentiment, this abandonment of party prejudice, this great accession from the ranks of our adversaries? It is the result of the most fixed and deliberate conviction on the part of the people in favor of this great measure. I, too, Mr. President, have seen the screws applied; I, too, have seen the struggling victim writhing in agony; I, too, have heard his shrieks, piercing as those of the wild sea-mew; but these shrieks were extorted by no application of the party screws. No, sir, it was the banks that had applied the screws of incorporated and moneyed power. It was these that had tempted their victim, in an evil hour, from the path of industry into the mad career of wild and extravagant speculation; it was these that had placed the paper die within his grasp, that seduced him onward with dazzling visions of unbounded fortune, and then, when the hour of peril came, consigned him to hopeless bankruptcy.

The Senator had, in his speech, again indulged in the exercise of his prophetic powers. He has again predicted the overthrow of this Administration and the installation of General Harrison in March, 1841. The Senator had often, previously, predicted the overthrow of this Administration, as well as of that which preceded it; and, so lately as in 1838, he had foretold that the present Congress would open with a majority of two-thirds against the Administration. Thus far, not one of the predictions of that Senator has ever been realized, but a result directly opposite had always followed. So invariably had this been the case, that the prophecies of that Senator should be interpreted as dreams; that is, to set down a result directly the reverse of that foreseen in the vision; and thus, if that Senator foretold a defeat, we might always expect a victory.

The Senator from Kentucky had thought proper to compare General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren to the Stuarts, to the Charleses of England, two of the most licentious and despotic monarchs. But England was disgraced by a monarch yet more arbitrary and profligate than either the first or second Charles. It was a Henry. I shall institute no comparison between this monarch and the Senator from Kentucky. None such, in truth, can be made; and yet the resemblance is quite as striking as that of either of the Stuarts to the late and present Chief Magistrate. As little similarity, also, was there in the original to the picture drawn by the honorable Senator of the American President, driving through the rain with his umbrella and India rubber coat, reckless of the situation of his fellow-citizens. No doubt this portrait was lready ina the hands of the lithographer, for a caricature, as it seemed to have amused so much the gallery friends of the honorable Senator. This faculty of exciting a laugh in the gallery is one of the humblest powers of the human mind, and rarely combined with great intellectual vigor. Sir, when I want to laugh, I will buy my ticket for the theatre, and go and listen to farce or comedy; but if I possess d the comic powers of Mathews himself, they should not be exerted in this tribunal; and those who possessed this laughter-exciting faculty, even in the most eminent degree, should s ill reflect, that it was a faculty in which every harlequin was their equal, and every circus clown greatly their superior.

The Senator from Kentucky has drawn a gloomy picture of the present condition and future prospects of the country, and attributes it all to the measures of this Administration. No such thing, he says, occurred prior to the war upon the Bank of the United States. Has the Senator forgo ten his speech in 1824, when the then existing condition of this country was represented by him in quite as gloomy colors as those with which he darkened the present picture? So close, indeed, is the resemblance between these two addresses, that the Senator's speech of yesterday may well be considered but as the echo of the speech of 1824—it was the same portrait, scarcely retouched by the same remarkable artist—it was the same tragedy, rehearsed upon nearly the same boards, with scarcely a change of parts, by the same distinguished orator. That the Senate may know the facts, I will read an extract from the speech of that Senator of the 31st of March, 1824, in favor of a protective tariff.

[Here Mr. WAHLER read the following extract from Mr. CLAY's speech of 1824, as published in Niles's Register of that date, vol. 26, pages 378, 387, as follows:]

"In casting our eyes around us, the most prominent circumstance which fixes our attention, and challenges our deepest regret, is the general distress which pervades the whole country. It is forced upon us by numerous facts of the most incontestible character. It is indicated by the diminished exports of native produce; by the depressed and reduced state of our foreign navigation; by our diminished commerce; by successive unthreshed crops of grain, perishing in our barns and barn yards for the want of a market; by the alarming diminution of the circulating medium; by the numerous bankruptcies, not limited to the trading classes, but extending to all orders of society; by an universal complaint of the want of employment, and a consequent reduction of the wages of labor; by the ravenous pursuit after public situations, not for the sake of their honors and the performance of their public duties, but as a means of private subsistence; by the reluctant resort to the perilous use of paper money; by the intervention of legislation in the delicate relation between debtor and creditor; and, above all, by the low and depressed state of the value of almost every description of the whole mass of the property of the nation which has, on an average, sunk not less than about fifty per cent. within a few years.

* * * * *

"The truth is, that no class of society suffers more, in the present stagnation of business, than the laboring class. That is a necessary effect of the depression of agriculture, the principal business of the community. The wages of able bodied men vary from five to eight dollars per month; and such has been the want of employment, in some parts of the Union, that instances have not been unfrequent, of men working merely for the means of present subsistence. If the wages for labor here and in England are compared, they will be found not to be essentially different."

Now, this picture of distress and ruin was drawn by that Senator during the very climax of the power of the Bank of the United States; and yet all this seems to have been forgotten by him, and I now understand him as asserting that we were exempt from all such calamities during the existence, and under the regulation, of a Bank of the United States.

[Mr. CLAY here explained as not having asserted that no such distress as the present had existed, during the charter of the National Bank; but that never, during its existence, had this distress been attributed, as it now was, to the power over us of the banks and currency of England.]

Mr. W. said he had not so understood the Senator, but received with pleasure his explanation. One thing, however, was certainly proved by this speech, that, in 1824, during the existence and full operation of the Bank of the United States, there was greater and more universal distress—more stagnation of business—more laborers unemployed, and a greater reduction of wages, than at the present period. Wages, we were then told by the Senator, were at but "from five to eight dollars per month," being no greater than in England. And yet all this occurred when the Bank of the United States had reached the zenith of its power—when its late distinguished president (Mr. Biddle) presided over its operations—when it was in the eighth year of its chartered existence—when it enjoyed the Government patronage, and received on deposite all the public revenues, and when not a hand or voice was raised against it. Where, then, was its boasted regulating power? where its ability to have prevented, or even mitigated in any degree, the catastrophe which then overwhelmed us. And to what, among other causes, did the Senator then attribute the embarrassments of 1824? It was to the "perilous use of paper money;" and to the same cause may we just as truly trace the present disasters. Paper money was the fatal cause of all the disasters of 1824; it produced the explosion of 1814, of 1818–19, of 1837, and of 1839, and will continue to produce here, as it ever has done elsewhere, periodical revulsions, suspensions, and disasters, so long as the system is continued. Eradicate the paper system, and you will remove the great cause of all our evils; and any thing short of this will be but temporary expedients; resumption will be but the signal for another suspension, until these revulsions shall become annual, and the system die by its own hand, the death of the suicide; or expel all the precious metals, destroy the standard of value, convert bank paper into a legal tender, not merely to the Government, but to the people, and thus overthrow the Constitution, subvert the liberties of the country, and the rights of the people, and establish the reign of a bankocracy, more sordid, ruinous, and despotic, than that of any monarch, however absolute.

But the Senator now asserts, in his explanation, that although there may have been distress during career of the National Bank, yet never during its existence had we heard of our dependence upon English banks and currency, and the reaction produced here by their contractions and expansions. The Senator is mistaken. This same reaction of British power upon our prices and our prosperity, was heard of and described in this very year, 1824. Had I anticipated the assumption of this position, I could have encountered it by extracts from various speeches; but it will be sufficient to quote from a speech delivered in Congress in April, 1824, by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER]

Here Mr. W. read from Mr. WEBSTER's speech of 1824, as contained in Niles's Register, vol. 26, page 411, as follows:

"The paper system of England had certainly communicated an artificial value to property. It had encouraged speculation, and excited overtrading. When the shock, therefore, came, and this violent pressure for money acted at the same moment on the continent and in England, inflated and unnatural prices could be kept up no longer. A reduction took place, which has been estimated to have been at least equal to a fall of 30, if not 40, per cent. The depression was universal; and the change was felt in the United States severely, though not equally so in every part of them. There are those, I am aware, who maintain that the events to which I have alluded did not cause the great fall of prices; but that fall was natural and inevitable, from the previously existing state of things, the abundance of commodities, and the want of demand. But that would only prove that the effect was produced in another way, rather than by another cause. If these great and sudden calls for money did not reduce prices, but prices fell, as of themselves, to their natural state, still the result is the same; for we perceive that, after these new calls for money, prices could not be kept longer at their unnatural height.

"About the time of these foreign events, our own bank system underwent a change; and all these causes, in my view of the subject, concurred to produce the great shock which took place in our commercial cities, and through many parts of the country. The year 1819 was a year of numerous failures, and very considerable distress, and would have furnished far better grounds than exist at present for that gloomy representation of our condition which has been presented. Mr. Speaker has alluded to the strong inclination which exists, or has existed, in various parts of the country, to issue paper money, as a proof of great existing difficulties. I regard it rather as a very productive cause of those difficulties; and the committee will not fail to observe that there is, at this moment, much the loudest complaint of distress precisely where there has been the greatest attempt to relieve it by systems of paper credit. And, on the other hand, content, prosperity, and happiness are most observable in those parts of the country, where there has been the least endeavor to administer relief by law. In truth, nothing is so baneful, so utterly ruinous to all true industry, as interfering with the legal value of money, or attempting to raise artificial standards to supply its place. Such remedies suit well the spirit of extravagant speculation, but they sap the very foundation of all honest acquisition."

Many important admissions are here made by the Senator from Massachusetts. The disasters of 1824 are plainly attributed by him chiefly to our "systems of paper credit," and the reaction upon it of "the paper system of England." We are distinctly told that our paper system had produced here "artificial" prices and "extravagant speculation;" that the same system in England had there "communicated an artifical value to property," and when the shock took place in England, prices fell there, and the "change was felt in the United States severely." What change? Why, that change and fall of prices in England, which the Senator distinctly asserted was produced by "those great and sudden calls for money," arising out of the contractions of the English banks, which reacted upon our paper system, and finally produced here the same fall of prices and catastrophe with which England was first overwhelmed. Here, then, in this very speech of the Senator from Massachusetts, designed to be read by me for a different purpose, the position of the Senator from Kentucky is overthrown, and it is shown that, in 1824, during the climax of the power of the National Bank, the then existing catastrophe was distinctly attributed to the reaction upon our paper money and prices, produced by the curtailment of the British Bank, and the fall of prices first in that Empire. But as the Senator from Massachusetts is deservedly the highest authority with the Whig party of the Union, because possessing the greatest intellectual power, I have read this extract from his speech in 1824, to prove that, during the existence and pretended regulating power of a National Bank, he admitted that our paper money system was the "very productive cause of (all our) difficulties." Most truly did he then describe it as "utterly ruinous to all true industry," as "creating artificial standards" to supply the place of the "legal currency," as introducing "the spirit of extravagant speculation," and sapping the very "foundations of all honest acquisition." Such were the views of the Senator from Massachusetts in 1824; such were the causes to which he attributed the catastrophe of that period, and did not the same causes produce the same effects here in 1837?

At the special session, in September, 1837, in an humble effort made by me upon this floor, in favor of the Independent Treasury bill, with the specie clause, I asserted the following opinions upon this subject, which, in illustration of this topic, I will now read, as follows, from that speech, as then published:

"Yes, the creation of this great bank power, to become the ally of the British bank and bankers, is indeed a question not only affecting the forms of our Government here, but a question whether these States shall be recolonized—whether the English bank and its American allies, shall regulate all our commerce, and the price of all our products. It is now boldly asked, that England should have a vast circulation of gold and silver, but that we should have very little silver, and no gold, and substitute bank paper, controlled by the power which retains the metals. That money should be debased in value here, to enable England to control our business and circulation—that England may sell her imports here at our paper prices, whilst she gives for our exports the diminished price arising from a metallic or chiefly metallic currency. No nation could long stand the operation of such a system; but the exporting States, the price of whose staple depends chiefly upon the English market, and not the amount of American paper money, would soon be reduced to absolute bankruptcy. With the expansion of the paper money here, every article the planter desires to purchase would be enhanced in price, whilst his cotton, regulated by the English market and currency, would remain nearly stationary; till soon the expense of raising cotton would be so greatly increased, whilst the price of the article remained nearly the same, that little or no profit would be derived from the culture. It is not the nominal paper prices of property here that gives real prosperity to the planter, but the nett profit upon the staple he raises, in calculating which the expenses of raising the article, arising from the expansion of American paper money, is precisely so far a diminution of his profits. Upon the exporting States, then, is thrown nearly the whole burden of this system. They participate in all the evils of an explosion, and during the expanding process, whilst they give more for every article connected with conducting a plantation, their great staple experiences no correspondent rise, being governed by the less inflated European money market. To illustrate this position, suppose, from the absence of bank paper, the expense in Egypt, the East Indias, or Brazil, of raising cotton, including the interest on capital, was one cent per pound, whilst here, from the paper expansion, it was six cents per pound; how long could we withstand the competition, the cotton of all other countries bringing in Europe the same price as our own? Is it not evident that a few years more of expansion of the American paper system would reduce the exporting States to absolute bankruptcy, and the whole country to the most abject dependence on the money power of England, selling high her imports here by the false standard of our paper money, and purchasing low all our exports at the price regulated by her less inflated currency? In this way, England would vastly retard our actual increase of national wealth, by selling her imports to us at our paper prices, for a vast amount, and giving us a less price for our exports, estimated by her nearer approach to a metallic currency. Is it not seen, in this exchange of imports for exports, we get, for the same money, fewer imports, and England more exports, by the precise ratio in which imports are raised in price here by our paper money, and exports depressed by being measured by a currency more nearly metallic; and thus the whole nation sustains a great loss?

"It would be most curious and instructive to compare tables from 1790 to the present period, representing the prices current of cotton, of domestic produce consumed wholly in the United States, and the amount of paper circulation. These tables I have neither had the time or opportunity to prepare; but this much must be known to every Senator, that as the paper money, before an explosion, rose in amount, domestic produce rose also, whilst cotton at the same period repeatedly fell, being regulated by the European money market. One fact alone will be conclusive evidence of the principle, that whilst from 1815 to 1825 the prices of our cotton, including Sea Island, averaged eighteen cents per pound, from the latter period to 1835, inclusive, the average price was less than twelve cents per pound, whilst, from 1815 to 1835, our paper circulation has nearly doubled. The price of our cotton then, instead of augmenting with the increase of our paper money, has actually greatly fallen under the operation."

"The continuance of such a system renders all the toil, and labor, and products of industry, perfectly useless, for, when the balance returns in our favor from abroad, even in gold and silver, it is only to find its way into the vaults of the banks, that these our paper masters may make these metals the foundation of new emissions—new overissue and new explosions. If any can doubt this last result, let them reflect upon this, which is a fixed law of the monetary system, that when great expansions of bank issues, whether in the paper of National or State banks, takes place here, prices of all products or articles consumed here rise also; exports remaining unaffected in price by this event. And what follows? Why the value of money being less here, and prices higher than in foreign countries, where no expansion of the currency has taken place, the course of exchange rises against us in nearly the ratio in which specie, the universal standard, will buy more in the foreign country than in our own; specie comes not here, for it is sunk here to the level of our yet convertible bank paper. But prices of almost every article being much higher here than abroad, vast importations, beyond the power of the country long to consume, necessarily ensue; our bank paper is forced upon the banks for redemption in specie, to be shipped abroad, where it is more valuable than here; and explosion soon follows. So certain and unerring is this rule, that instead of there being written on the face of all our bank notes a promise to pay in specie on demand, the promise should be, if truth were consulted, not to pay on demand in specie in the contingency above described, and shown to be inevitable."

And have not these views, in 1837, been all confirmed by the new crisis of 1839? Have we not had another suspension in the short period of two years? has it not been the result of our paper system and the reaction arising from the curtailments of the banks at home and abroad? and is it not now a question, whether these States shall be re-colonized—whether we shall burn the Declaration of American Independence, and for all the purposes of trade and commerce, and in all that concerns our industry, be reannexed to Canada, as a component portion of the British realm? And it ever has been, and will be, that, with equal advantages, the paper money country, will be the wretched dependent upon the hard money nation. The paper system of England is better than ours; their bank issues no notes under about twenty-five dollars, whilst we descend every where to five dollars, and, in many States, to one and two dollar notes, rendering the currency almost exclusively of paper. Our moneyed system then must, under these circumstances, ever be more tremulous and feeble than that of England, and hence her power to decree a suspension of our banks, and an overthrow of our business, whenever she thinks proper to do so. Hence, also, the fact stated by the Senator from Kentucky, that the Bank of England borrowed ten millions of dollars from the bankers of Paris. This is true, and why is it that England borrows from France, and America from England? It is caused by the difference of currency. France permits the issue of no bank note under about ninety dollars, England none by her bank under about twenty-five dollars, while we descend to one and two dollar notes England then begs from hard money France, and we from England. Yes, we beg from the beggar, and the hard money country being unembarrassed, will always be able to loan to the paper money nation; and thus it is, that Holland, with her gold and silver currency, loans to all the world, and we borrow from all the world to relieve us as a temporary expedient from the wretched effects of the paper system. Yes, the Bank of England, with its enormous capital, and backed by the use of two hundred millions of British revenue, became a mendicant for a loan in the streets of Paris, to save it from inevitable bankruptcy, whilst our Bank of the United States became a beggar from the beggar in the streets of London, but too late to save her from insolvency; and such will ever be the miserable and abject depencence upon foreign influence, arising from the paper money system. It is, in fact, a system by which we of America must forever tread upon a mine of gunpowder, the match for the explosion of which is held in England, and can at any moment be applied at her pleasure.

But the Senator said, he considered it as admitted by the friends of the bill, that its effect would be to reduce the wages of labor. No such admission was made by me; but I said that the real value of the wages of labor would be enhanced by the introduction of a metalic currency. There are two kinds of prices, real and nominal; and there are two kinds of sales, sales for cash, and sales upon credit. Under the paper system there are no sales for cash, but all upon credit; either the credit given to the purchaser for his own note, or the notes of a bank. The sale for bank notes was still but a sale on credit. If, on making a purchase, I give in payment the note of a third person, it is a sale on credit; and it is the same thing when I give the notes of a bank. The transaction is delusive; it is nominally a sale for cash, but in reality upon credit. By these sales upon credit, the nominal prices of the wages of labor are augmented, but not the real value of those wages. The real value of his wages to the laborer, consists not in the nominal price paid him, but in the value of that price. Thus, if one man in a paper money country receives for his monthly labor thirty dollars, and it costs him in that country, from the enhanced prices of all the necessaries of life, thirty dollars a month to support himself and family, the real value of his wages is not so great as that of the laborer who may receive, in a hard money country, but fifteen dollars per month, and can with twelve dollars a month support himself and family; and I contend that the expulsion of bank paper will enhance the real value of the wages of labor. It is denied, so far as my knowledge extends, by no writer on currency, that upon the introduction of a paper currency, wages are the last thing to advance, and in the least proportion. By then the change from a metallic to a paper currency, the real value of the labor of wages, is depressed; and if this be so, how can it injure the laborer to return from a paper to a specie currency? The reason given by some for this relatively slower and smaller advance in the wages of labor upon the introduction of a paper currency is this: that the capitalists who employ laborers, being fewer in number, and more wealthy and powerful, can more readily combine to prevent a rise in the wages of labor. But, although this might have some slight temporary effect upon the first introduction of bank paper in a country, it appears to me wholly insufficient to account for the general and permanent prevalence of this great principle. The true reason for the rule appears to me to be this: that the existence of only a specie currency in any country increases most in that country the amount of and demand for labor, by creating markets for its product, both at home and abroad. The amount of labor must depend upon the markets for its products. These markets are first the foreign, and secondly the domestic market. Let us examine the effects of a paper currency, first as regards the foreign market. This currency enhances so much the cost of producing and manufacturing in the country where it exists, as to decrease the amount of its exports, and, also, to diminish the profits from the sale of these exports in a foreign market. With an expanded paper currency, will any one contend that we can export, at a profit, any article to any hard money country, whose soil and climate permit it to raise or manufacture the same article; and in relation to all articles which cannot be raised in a country with a specie currency, and which we do export there, our profit on those exports are greatly diminished, by the increase of expense of raising them in a paper money country; and thus, also, subjecting us to the hazard of being driven out of the market, or undersold by other hard money countries, raising and selling abroad the same species of exports produced at a greatly diminished expenditure. Thus the effect of the paper money system here, is clearly to diminish exports, and to decrease the profit of all we do export. Now what is the effect of the paper system upon the domestic market? It is to deprive the domestic producer and manufacturer even of the home market, to a great extent, and thus to diminish the amount of the products of labor. Thus, under our paper system, countries having a better currency, and manufacturing at a cheaper rate, are enabled, even in the face of high tariffs, to monopolise, or nearly so, even the domestic market, for most of the important articles of manufacture, which they could not do, if we had only a specie currency. Nay more, England first purchases here, for instance, the article of cotton, paying a high freight and insurance abroad, and a considerable duty upon the import of the raw material. She sends, then, the manufactured cotton goods into this country, paying a new freight and insurance, and a new and heavy duty upon the import here, and undersells the American cotton manufacturer, as to most articles, even in our own market. What is the cause? It is our miserable paper system, so much worse than that of England, which so enhances here the cost of manufacturing, as to sacrifice the American to the foreign manufacturer. And here, again, the American cotton grower is greatly injured, as well as the manufacturer. If, with our augmented production of cotton, we desire it to maintain a permanent profitable price, we must extend the consumption of the manufactured fabric. That consumption will be greatly increased, by diminishing the expense of manufacturing the raw material, and thus cheapening the price, and thereby extending the use, of the manufactured fabric. Give us here a specie currency, and having but little, if any, freight or insurance, and no duties to pay for the raw material, we can supply the world with manufactured fabrics at cheaper rates than England could possibly afford to do. And when we take into view, also, the cheaper rates at which we could then manufacture, equip and sail vessels, we could put down all competition, and export abroad or sell at home, not merely one million eight hundred thousand bales of American cotton, but nearly all of this cotton, which is now chiefly manufactured abroad, would be manufactured to an infinitely greater extent at home, to the extent, in a few years, of at least one million of bales per annum; making thus an annual difference in favor of our own country of at least fifty millions of dollars. Yes, there is not a plantation or city in the South, not a seaport or manufacturing village in any of the Eastern, Western, Northern, or Middle States, that would not feel a new impulse from the adoption of this great system. We have the greatest natural advantages of any country upon the face of the globe. We have the most fertile soil, the best climate, the most energetic and intelligent people, and the freest Government on earth, and ought to be the most prosperous of nations. Why is it otherwise? It is our paper system, that prostrates the labor and industry of the nation, that taxes labor and its products, that taxes our foreign exports nearly one hundred per cent. on the increased cost of production, that taxes in the same manner the great manufacturing and navigating interest, that destroys the profits of national industry, that decreases our exports, deprives us of the foreign market for most of these exports, and diminishes the profits upon all, and surrenders the domestic market for almost every product or manufacture of foreign countries having a better and sounder currency than our own. And all for what? To increase the nominal fictitious prices of sales upon paper credit, even whilst the system endures without a shock; but producing over importation here, from our inflated prices and diminished exports, creating just as certainly a demand for the precious metals from abroad, to liquidate that balance, thus created there, for which our bank bills are not receivable, and producing periodical suspensions and convulsions, and widespread ruin. And to what end? Why, that a few bank stockholders, less than one to one hundred and fifty of the people, may reap in idleness enormous profits, by substituting their fictitious paper credit in place of the constitutional currency of gold and silver; and let it be remembered, that when one of these convulsions comes, the demand from abroad for the precious metals strikes down at once at least two-thirds of the currency of the country—the bank expansion being at least as three to one of paper for every dollar of specie—and the contraction being of course required to be in the same ratio, to maintain the proportions of the system. And let me say to all who propose to remedy the evil by a high tariff, that they never can or will succeed, and if they did enact such a law, it could not and would not be endured; and if it were, the bank paper system would soon counteract to them all its supposed beneficial consequences. It would still further diminish our exports, still more seriously depress the profits upon their sale, and, by impoverishing the South, deprive the North of the only market to which, under the bank paper system, the North could look for the sale of their manufactures. If the North destroys the South, they will ruin their best, almost their only customers, and ultimately overthrow their own prosperity; but by abandoning the bank paper system, all the great interests of the whole country will be permanently and wonderfully promoted. This paper system is, in fact, a duty levied upon exports, for the benefit of no interest whatever; it is a duty in the increased expense of production, equal to the cotton planter, to a forcible seizure of at least thirty bales out of every one hundred of his crop, and is more pernicious even than the odious tariff of 1828, and with no corresponding advantages to any section of the Union, but deeply injurious to all. But the system of a sound and specie currency, embraces in its advantages, the whole Union and all its parts; it comprehends every section, and advances every interest. Adopt it, and you will soon overthrow all sectional jealousies, unite all interests by the inseparable links of reciprocal benefits, and render our glorious bond of union as enduring as the continent upon which it exists.

By the official returns upon the files of the Senate, it appears that, from the 1st October, 1789, to 30th September, 1839, the totality of our exports was $3 557,829,951, and the totality of our imports, during the same period, was $4,339,713 649, being an excess against us of imports over exports of $781,883,698; and this vast sum, approaching near one thousand million of dollars, is, in truth, but a part of the bounty paid to foreign industry by debasing our currency, and thus yielding up to it, to so vast an extent, both the foreign and domestic market. In addition to this vast sum, the diminished exports, the decreased profits upon their sale, and the decreased products of every kind, will make the national loss, from the bank paper system, at least two thousand millions of dollars. We have seen that the total excess of imports over exports, from 1st October, 1789, to 30th September, 1839, was $781,883,698, the whole of which, except $196,055,021, occurred from 1791 till 1811, and from 1816 till 1834, during the wretched career of the two Banks of the United States; and with the exception of $71,560,171, it may all be truly said to have occured during the dominion of a United States Bank, for the present United States Bank, under its new charter, has inflated prices, currency, and fictitious credit, fully as much as any of its predecessors. One thing, however, is certain, that it is all the result of our bank paper system. Another fact is also clearly proved, that the first Hamiltonian tariff, nor the tariff of 1816, nor that of 1824, nor yet even that of 1828, arrested this ruinous excess of imports over exports. No, sir; it is not a high tariff that we want, but the most limited revenue duties with a specie policy, that is to command for us our own, as well as foreign markets, that is to advance all interests, in every section of the Union, and make it the interest of all to encourage free trade. But for the bank paper system the products of our industry would be more than double what they now are, and our population wonderfully augmented; and we should, long ere this, have passed England in the race for wealth and power, and will soon overtake and pass her now, if we will but abandon the wretched policy of debasing our currency, by the bank paper system, and thus closing, to the products of our own industry, nearly every market at home and abroad. If gentlemen, from the data on the files of the Senate, will make out tables from every year since 1789, exhibiting for each year in separate columns, first, the excess of imports over exports; second, the years of the chartered existence of the two Banks of the United States; third, the total amount of paper currency; fourth, the years of bank suspensions; and, fifth, the rate of duties under the then existing tariffs, the result will prove, that neither a Bank of the United States, nor a protective tariff, ever have saved, or can save, the country from these ruinous annual excesses of imports over exports, and nothing but a specie policy will reverse the spectacle, and exhibit our exports invariably exceeding our imports, and with at least 30 per cent. of an additional profit from decreased expenditures in producing and manufacturing. And I say now to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] that these tables shall be presented for the consideration of his constituents, as well as mine, from which, as a merchant would from his books and ledgers, they may calculate the amount of national profit and loss; and if, to a small extent, the excess of unfavorable balance is for a moment checked by ruinous tariffs, it is only the more surely to inflate the paper system in fully an equal degree, and render the explosion certain. Indeed this alliance between the banking and tariff systems has been conceded in many leading Whig papers of the Northern and Middle States, and its re-enactment demanded, as indispensably necessary to sustain the bank paper system. This alliance between these artificial systems of bank and tariff monopolies is natural, but it is as fatal to national industry and national profits as was the first great coalition between Sin and Death to the happiness of mankind.

The true wealth of a nation manifests itself in the augmented demands for labor, in the increased products of industry, in the profits upon those products, and the ability to sell them at home and abroad. The nett annual profit upon the national industry, is the truest measure of the national gains, and these profits are almost utterly annihilated by the bank paper system. Let us then abandon that system, and advance our country to that high destiny which would then await her. Let us abandon that abject dependence upon the moneyed power of England. Let us take from her grasp that moneyed talent, more potent than all her arms or navies, with which she can now, at any moment, explode our paper system, and overthrow, at one blow, all our great and cherished interests. Is this a time for this miserable dependence upon British power? Is this a time, when that haughty Empire is threatening to dismember one of the sovereign States of this Confederacy, when she is seizing and occupying a portion of that soil, within our undoubted limits, acquired by the toils of the Revolution, and not an acre of which ever can be surrendered, so long as there is one true American heart beating within an American bosom? Is this a time, too, when that power is gradually seizing upon the rich territory west of the Rocky mountains, and when she seems, with the view to force the sale of her poisonous drugs, to be threatening, by iniquitous blockades, to expel our flag and commerce from the Chinese coast—is this the period to forge the paper chains which are to bind all our industry and all our commerce to the footstool of British power? No: let us exert all our native energies and overthrow that system which is delaying our onward march as a nation to greatness, wealth, and power, and let us antedate that period when our exports and products, requiring no tariff, but carried throughout the world, shall vastly exceed those of England; let us antedate that period, when, as compared with us, England shall be but a feeble second-rate power, and let us draw nearer and nearer to that happy hour, that even our eyes may behold the glorious spectacle when not an acre of American soil shall be polluted by British dominion, or degraded by imperial or despotic power.

If, at one moment of creative will, it had pleased the Almighty power to establish, in either ocean upon this globe, two mighty continents, each with equal natural advantages, each with twenty millions of an equally intelligent and industrious people, and each with a hundred millions of a metallic currency—then, so long as each adhered to that currency, their march to wealth and power would be equal, and the exports to either would be rare indeed. But if, whilst one of these nations adhered to its metallic currency, the other embraced the banking and paper system, what would be the result? Why, the paper money country, from inflated prices within its limits, would soon be overwhelmed with imports from the country which retained the metals; its industry would soon be prostrated, and its system overthrown, and periodically overthrown, so long as the two countries retained their relative positions as a hard money and a paper money country; and greater still would be the calamity, if half a dozen continents should exist upon the same globe, to not one of which could the paper money nation export one article that could be raised within the country which adhered to the metallic policy. Is it not then seen in this comparison, that a banking and paper currency adds nothing to the wealth and products of a nation? What is this bank paper? It is not labor, nor its products, nor wealth, nor capital, nor any thing of intrinsic value. It is not money, for it is merely a promise to pay money; and is nothing in fact, but circulating debts; and their issue and augmentation augments nothing but the debts of a country. Every bank note is only a debt due to the holder of the note, and in every loan of its paper made by a bank, it augments nothing but the debts of a country, first by creating a debt to it by the borrower to the amount of the loan; and, secondly, a debt by it to all the holders of its notes. The banks then are the great cause of all that vast load of debt which has almost weighed down the energies of this great nation.

But the able Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS.] whilst he distinctly conceded the benefits resulting from a specie currency to the exporting and cotton growing States, the prices of whose staples are regulated by a foreign market, contends that this augmented profit to Southern planters, is so much taken from the free laborers of the North, in the diminution of their wages. I have already shown that the wages of labor are of more value under a specie currency, than in the absence of it; and that there would be a greater demand for labor, because of enlarged markets for its products, at home and abroad, and increased profits. And, sir, this matter is well understood by the working classes, who are almost universally the advocates of a specie currency. The working-men of the city of New York, next, perhaps, to the patriot Jackson and the Senator from Missouri, may be justly considered the original Loco Focos and hard money men of the Union. They have long and faithfully contended for this doctrine against the Wall street brokers and speculators, and after many defeats, victory now perches upon the banner of the working-men and Loco Focos of the great city of New York. The banks advantageous to the working-men! Why they are their greatest oppressors. They raise and depress at pleasure the price not only of wages, but of every article the working-man is compelled to purchase for the subsistence of himself and family; and if they augment for a time the nominal price of wages, it is only to enhance, in a still greater proportion, the price of living and subsistence; and then to bring on, every two or three years, successive panics and convulsions, in which all industry is subverted, and the laboring men are left almost entirely unemployed, whilst the banks are engaged in the work of resumption. The working men have nothing to do with the management or profit of banks. They are neither directors, stockholders, or borrowers, but they participate largely in the losses arising from these institutions. They are compelled to receive in payment the money of the banks, and sustain great losses, arising from their suspension or insolvency, and the depreciation of their paper. Let the working-man be secured in the wages of his labor—let him be paid in gold and silver, let him have the steady, certain, and increased demand for labor here, arising from increased products, to supply both the foreign and domestic market, and he will be more prosperous and independent than when driven into or out of employment at the mercy of the banks, and the value of his wages regulated at their pleasure.

The whole community is deeply injured in another mode by the bank paper system. It is by its monopoly of wealth and power and privileges in the hands of the few, and the consequent impoverishment of the many. The rights of property must not be impaired or weakened; but to equalize its distribution consistently with a due regard to these rights has ever been considered most important. To attain these objects, we have abolished here all hereditary titles, and all the laws of primogeniture and entailment. But the banking system was concentrating fortunes without labor in the hands of the few, at the expense of the many, with more fearfully increasing rapidity than ever was or could be accomplished by any system of hereditary or exclusive privileges. To illustrate this position, let us reflect upon the following facts. The amount due to all the banks of the Union, by their last and fullest official returns, including some omissions since ascertained, amounted to five hundred and thirty-nine millions of dollars, upon all which, at the average rate of seven per cent. the banks were receiving an annual interest of thirty-eight millions of dollars; being an annual interest exceeding the total amount of all their specie, according to their own official returns. These are the recorded facts as spread upon the files of the Senate, that the banks realize an annual income equal to one hundred per cent. upon their specie capital. It is true, that upon the nominal amount of stock, the dividend is greatly less, but then the stock that is not paid for in specie, is paid for in bank notes, so that the banks, as a system, derive the whole benefit of the operation. We have seen, too, that, as a general rule, the directory of the banks monopolize nearly one-third of the discounts In December, 1837, and in March, 1838, an examination of the sixteen banks of New Orleans was made by a joint committee of both branches of the Legislature of Louisiana, and the result, as reported by them, upon an examination of all the cashiers of these banks, was, that the total amount of all the discounts of the banks was $52,407,170; and that the total liability of the directory (172 in number) amounted to $17,875,592, or more than one-third of the whole amount. The proportion in Mississippi was much worse, and nearly as bad in Mobile, Alabama, so far as an investigation had been made. No complete return in all the States has been made on this subject, but from the returns already received, no one can doubt, that the bank liabilities of all the directors of all the banks of the Union has amounted to at least one hundred and fifty millions of dollars, concentrated in about six thousand individuals. The total amount of all the wealth of the people of the whole Union, was estimated in 1830 at twelve thousand millions of dollars, and may now be safely stated at not more than sixteen thousand millions of dollars. Now the amount of American bank stock is about four hundred millions of dollars; and if we estimate the other property, real and personal, of the bank stockholders, at three times the amount of their stock, the total amount of all the property of all the bank stockholders in the Union will be two thousand millions of dollars. Thus less than one hundred thousand bank stockholders, being less than one to one hundred and fifty of our whole population, already own one-eighth of the whole property of the Union, and this, too, collected by this system in little more than one generation. At this rate of increase, being, as we have seen, at the annual rate of one hundred per cent. upon their specie capital, will not the bank stockholders, in another generation, own three-fourths of the property of the whole country; and as we enrich the few, the many are impoverished. Yes, it is the laboring millions from whose unceasing toil this vast amount is accumulated in the hands of the few, not by labor or industry, but by being permitted to issue and circulate their debts in the shape of bank notes, as the only money to be used by a great and free people. They grow rich upon the interest of their debts, exacted from the whole community, upon which debts and promises of payment, struck off at the rate of a million in a day from a bank engraving, they pay no interest whatever. And what must be the inevitable effect, if this system of monopoly and associated wealth is perpetuated? Why, sir, it is not only the laboring men that will be converted into the serfs of the banking system; but all of us, and our children's children, will be but the wretched dependents upon the same resistless power.

And what would soon be the spectacle exhibited in this once great Republic? Why, whilst the impoverished millions should be scattered over a desolate waste, whose soil had been exhausted, and whose fountains had been drawn off into the great bank reservoirs, here and there, amid the surrounding sands, the palaces of the banks and their stockholders would rise up, like the ancient glittering cities of the desert, where the incorporated few should revel in more than Eastern pomp, and wealth, and power, and sloth, and luxury; whilst more than one American paper Lucullus should feed his guests from golden dishes, containing the tongues and brains of the costliest birds, whilst all were served from tables of pearl, and reposed upon couches of down and ivory. Yes, by no other possible means can princely fortunes be accumulated so rapidly as by this system of associated and incorporated wealth, making, and loaning, and recalling at pleasure, all the money of a country; and splendid wealth, exhibited in the hands of the few, ever has been, and must be, accompanied by squalid poverty on the part of the many. And is this the system which, as if in mockery of equal rights and privileges, Senators upon this floor would recommend to the honest and industrious working men of America? Sir, they will reject it every where with scorn and indignation.

Recent events have withdrawn the veil which had so long concealed the fatal consequences of the banking system, and the struggle between freedom and monopoly has indeed commenced; and let me assure my countrymen that now or never is the time to strike the great decisive blow in favor of equal rights and privileges. The people are rising to the rescue; the battle field is now before them; they have already gained a partial victory, and now or never is the day for final triumph; now or never is the day to decide whether they will be freemen indeed, or whether they will bind upon their own necks, and the necks of their children's children, the chains of a paper nobility, monopolizing nearly all the wealth and power of the country, manufacturing all its money, controlling all its Governments, State and National, and regulating all its pursuits and industry. Sir, if satisfied now with temporary expedients, we reorganize the system, with or without a mighty National Bank, under new regulations and restrictions, these will all prove, as they have ever done, but whisps of straw, made only to be broken; and this, the last and final struggle of freemen for their liberties, will have been made in vain; and here, as in down-trodden Poland, the bank paper Czars may announce to their subjects, "Order now reigns in Warsaw."

The Senator from Kentucky said that the bank paper system, whether for good or evil, is fastened upon us, and cannot now be eradicated, and that any one of the States, by issuing bank paper, can inundate with it any neighboring State, and thus compel there also the introduction of the system. Is not each State a sovereign upon this subject? and cannot any one State expel the paper of any other State from circulation within its limits? and has not this been done by several States? Is it not now done, to some extent, in Pennsylvania and in other States, and in this District, as to all notes under five dollars. Yes, each State has the power, if they will only refuse the advice of the bank paper advocates, and the most ample power, to expel all bank paper, either of her own or of surrounding States, from her limits; and that State which shall first adopt and persevere a short time in this system, will become so much more prosperous than any other State, that all will soon follow her glorious example; but if there be in fact any difficulty here, there is one mode by legal popular action, and another by constitutional amendment, if necessary, by which the object can be accomplished. Let us look at those States which have not adopted the paper system; Missouri, for instance, with but one bank, and that of but a very limited circulation; and she is now the most prosperous and unembarrassed State in the Union. And in looking at all the States, they will be found prosperous, or otherwise, with scarcely an exception, just in proportion as they have adopted or rejected the bank paper system. And this is not only true as to States, but even as to the relative condition of counties in the same State. Look at Mississippi: consult the dockets of the clerks of the several courts, and all other means of information; and, with scarcely an exception, you will find those counties in which banks are located, overwhelmed with embarrassments, and those counties, constituting two-thirds of the whole number, where there have been no banks, generally prosperous and unembarrassed. Yes, sir, throughout this Union, and throughout the globe, wherever you find the banking system to prevail, you will be sure to find periodical suspensions and revulsions, and wide-spread ruin. Explosion is inseparable from the system; and when you speak to me of well regulated banks of circulation, you speak to me of what never has been, or will be. You might as well speak to me of well regulated devils, whom even Almighty power found it impossible to regulate in any other manner than by casting in chains into billows of everlasting fire. And, sir, our bank paper system, if not abandoned, may yet be regulated in the all-consuming blaze of popular indignation. In using this strong language, I mean no attack upon individuals, for my assault is upon systems. I know that many honest, but, I think, deluded men, deluded as to the effects of the system, have been, and some still are connected with it. Among these is the late distinguished president of the Bank of the United States, whose great talents, varied acquirements, and integrity, have never been assailed by me, here or elsewhere; but the more virtuous and intelligent you prove to me to have been all former managers of the system, the stronger is the argument against the system itself. It is as though you would select the best engineers to conduct a steamboat safely with paper boilers, but they would explode; and the paper system is just as incompatible with the unerring laws of trade and commerce, and its inflation and explosion just as certain.

We have heard much, Mr. President, of a convertible currency. It is injurious, as I have shown, by inflated prices and diminished industry, even when convertible; but, to my mind, there is no greater delusion than this miscalled convertible currency. When or where convertible, and for what period of time, and for what amount, and in what age or country? Was it in England, when their great National Bank currency was inconvertible for a quarter of a century, namely, from 1797 till about 1822? Is it the currency of the same bank now, which, but yesterday, was saved from bankruptcy by begging from Paris a loan of ten millions to save her from immediate suspension? Is it the old notes of the old Bank, or the new notes of the new Bank, of the United States, continued under a stronger charter? Are these convertible? We know that they are not, nor do we know when they ever will be. Is it the notes of the State banks, with or without a Bank of the United States, that were inconvertible throughout New England in 1808, inconvertible almost universally from 1814 till 1816; inconvertible, with but few exceptions, from 1818 till 1825; inconvertible in 1837, and in 1839; and still, in 1840, utterly irredeemable throughout nearly the whole country? Sir, since 1792, when the first Bank of the United States went into operation, we have had, besides scattering bank failures every year, sixteen years of almost entire inconvertibility, and when resumption will again take place, no human foresight can determine, nor how long it will endure; but that suspension will again speedily follow, is absolutely certain; and thus the people are to be forever lashed around this miserable circle of disasters by their bank paper masters. And if the system has been bad for the past, what hope can be indulged for the future, now that the system has been weakened by so many fits of epilepsy—now that public confidence in these institutions, if not entirely extinguished, is as tremulous as the shadowy flame in its last dim and expiring flickering—now that the mysteries of the system are unveiled, and its long catalogue of crimes and frauds are fully disclosed, and its demoralizing and anti-Republican tendencies developed, and its pernicious effects upon the national industry well understood. And, sir, not only does all experience condemn the system, but reason tells us that this paper never is, or can all be, convertible; that the specie is not in the country to redeem it; that its basis is a delusive confidence, and even if the banks should at all times be ready to empty all their vaults to redeem their paper, that two-thirds of it always is, and ever must be entirely inconvertible. When, sir, the banks and their advocates promise us a currency, at all times convertible, every day and hour and moment, into gold and silver, are they not aware that they promise that which they know they cannot perform, if the holders of their notes demand, as they have a right to do, their redemption in specie? Is not, therefore, the promise false, fraudulent, and deceptive, and should not all honest men awake from the delusion under which so many of them have so long labored, and join in the glorious work of abandoning an odious, immoral, and anti-Republican system? Sir, whatever delusion may have heretofore prevailed on this subject, we now know, with absolute certainty, that so far from these notes being always convertible, they are inconvertible from the inflated prices and over importations, and consequent demand for specie, which ever must and will ensue, upon the reorganization of the banking system. Let us then emancipate American industry from that torturing suspense, that constant change and revolution to which it must ever be subjected from the expansions, contractions, and convulsions of the paper system, and it will rise triumphant over all obstacles at home and abroad. Fatal is the mistake that this banking system is friendly to commerce. No, sir, it taxes and retards it by constant convulsions, bankruptcies, and usurious interest. American commerce, foreign and domestic, must depend upon the great products of all our industry, of all our agriculture, and all our manufactures, and our commerce will be most truly flourishing, when we raise and manufacture the greatest quantity of products for sale or exchange at home and abroad. Under the present system, the merchants are the slaves of the banks, and the banks the miserable dependants of a foreign moneyed dominion, more powerful than our own, because wielding a larger specie capital. The age of monopolies and restrictions is passing away, and we are beginning to learn that free trade—trade unfettered by artificial systems, by banks or tariffs, is the true American system. It is this that will render a tariff unnecessary, and in fact injurious to every section of the Union; it is that that will foster American industry and commerce in every State of the Union; it is this that will secure to us, not only all that we desire of our own markets, but it will be the golden key that will unlock, to our exports of every kind, the ports of the world. The navigating interest, especially, that glorious nursery of our navy, will feel a new and wonderful impulse, and our vessels, careering onward upon every sea, will carry into every port the glorious standard of our then truly independent, free, and happy country; and all the paper contractions and expansions, ruin and convulsions, which have overwhelmed our industry, upon an average, one year out of three, for nearly the last half century, will cease to harass us, and be remembered only as the visions of a frightful dream, never again to disturb our slumbers.

During the recent canvass in my own State, I called the attention of my constituents to the condition of the agriculture of Cuba, with in three days sail of our coast, as contrasted with that of Louisiana and Mississippi. And what is the result? Why, that Cuba, though laboring under the disadvantage of a wretched Government, still, with her exclusive specie currency, conquering the tariffs of Europe and America, filling the world with her exports, sold at a profit, and enjoying, through her great and prosperous cities, an annual commerce of forty three millions of dollars from a population of less than a million, and but little more half a million of whites. Sir, as a Mississippian, I will not draw the gloomy picture of our own embarrassments. But, sir, I will ask the cause of the difference. We have in Mississippi an infinitely better Government than Cuba, a much more enlightened and energetic people, a more fertile soil, and a richer staple. Why then are we thus embarrassed, whilst Cuba is so prosperous? No other cause can be assigned, than the bank paper system of the one, and the solid specie currency of the other. The able Senator from Massachusetts cited the example of Spain, as a depressed and impoverished, though a hard money country. Spain has been torn for years by foreign wars or intestine convulsions, driving the farmer from his plough, and the manufacturer from his workshop, and sacrificing, in a third of a century, the lives of at least two millions of her people. But if we will read the page of history, Spain furnishes the most illustrious warning against the delusive doctrine, that even a convertible or actual specie currency, if superabundant, is at war with the industry of any nation; and that it is superabundant, whether struck off upon a bank plate, or even obtained in specie, if not the result of the natural laws of trade, and of the products of industry. What are the facts as to Spain? She was once a most prosperous and powerful nation. This was during that portion of the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, when she was not overwhelmed by a superabundant currency, and after she recovered from the shock. Sir, that most able historian, Prescott of Boston, (a distinguished Whig) in his History of Ferdinand and Isabella, says, speaking of the period when Spain had seized upon the silver mines of Mexico, poured them homewards almost without labor, and not in exchange for any product; and then, deeming a permanent increase of currency, by artificial means, most desirable, locked them up for a time within her limits, by laws against the exportation of specie. And what was the consequence? Why Mr. Prescott tells us that "the streams of wealth which flowed in from the silver quarries of Zacatecas and Potosi, were jealously locked up within the limits of the Peninsula." "The golden tide, which, permitted a free vent, would have fertilized the region through which it poured, now buried the land under a deluge which blighted every green and living thing. Agriculture, commerce, manufactures, every branch of national industry and improvement, languished and fell to decay; and the nation, like the Phrygian monarch, who turned all that he touched into gold, cursed by the very consummation of its wishes, was poor in the midst of its treasures." What a commentary upon the effects of a superabundant currency, even when not only equivalent to specie, but specie itself, when not introduced by the products of industry, and locked up by enactments against exportation, precisely similar, in all respects, to our paper currency, which cannot be exported abroad! The historian tells us, that in Spain prices became so high as to demand their reduction by legislative enactments, which all proved nugatory; and yet, in the face of these fictitious prices in Spain, then, as now in this Union, agriculture, commerce, and manufactures were greatly depressed. And when did the change take place? Why, when Spain changed her system, encouraged the exportation of the precious metals, and thus brought down her superabundant currency, brought down her artificial and inflated prices, and thus enabled Spanish industry to supply the markets of the peninsula and of the world. And what was the result of this change of policy? Why, the same distinguished historian, referring to it, says: "The precious metals, instead of flowing in so abundantly as to palsy the arm of industry, served only to stimulate it. The foreign intercourse of the country was every day more widely extended;" "the flourishing condition of the nation was seen in the wealth and population of its cities," &c. To this page of his history this accomplished historian appends the following note, from the great and philisophic Hume, in his Essays on Currency, part 2, essay 3: "The interval between the acquisition of money and the rise of prices, is the only time when increasing gold and silver is favorable to industry." Instead, then, of its being always desirable to increase the currency of a country, it is desirable in but one single contingency, and that is when, from the augmented products of industry, and increased prosperity of a nation, prices have commenced rising before any augmentation of the currency; and then, and then only, is it desirable to increase the currency, so as to maintain the relative proportion between prices and currency; and we are also told that this increase of currency will then just as certainly be introduced by the import of the specie, in exchange for the products of industry. But to augment prices by the mere artificial addition of a bank paper currency, is to produce an inflated system, which cannot last, and will overwhelm the industry of any nation. Sir, with these inflated prices, the nation resorting to the miserable system, will diminish her exports, and increase her imports, and destroy the markets, foreign and domestic, for her products, by disabling her from raising any thing at a profit for any market. All reason, then, and all experience, are against the system, even whilst the paper is convertible; and it ought to be safely and gradually, but ultimately entirely abandoned. Sir, in opposing banks of circulation, I do not object to banks of exchange, of discount, and deposite, issuing no paper currency. The bill of exchange long preceded all banks of circulation, and will as certainly survive their downfall. This useful instrument of commerce should be encouraged, and exists in the greatest perfection, and at the cheapest rate, precisely in those States in which there is only a specie currency, and is most embarrassed by a paper system; and if the system be bad for small notes, it is bad for all; but the evil diminishes in the ratio of the denomination of notes and limitation of the currency. For myself, I am opposed to investing in banks the power of manufacturing a paper currency. This power of creating a currency for a nation, is one of the highest and most important attributes of sovereign power, and more deeply affects all the diversified interests of society, than the exercise of any other power whatever. It is more important than coining money, for that must be preceded by the purchase of the bullion; but here is a power to manufacture paper money at pleasure, to constitute the currency of a State or nation—a power entrusted to the irresponsible directory of a bank, acting in secret, and whose chief interest it is to abuse their power. In proportion as a bank increases its currency, are its dividends and profits augmented, and hence the stimulus to over issues is irresistible; and especially is this the case where, as we have seen by the evidence before quoted, the very directors which manufacture the paper, loan out, as a general rule, more than one-fourth of it to themselves. This power, then, of issuing their paper as money, is truly fearful; and when united with the power of loaning at pleasure, in secret conclave, and to whom and for what purpose the bank directory may think proper, and of recalling it at pleasure, and of contracting and expanding as suits their caprice, is a power which few European despots would dare to exercise, and is utterly incompatible with the fundamental principles of a free Government. I am utterly opposed, therefore, to such a system; and having fairly and fully disclosed the principles upon which my opposition is based, I return to the Senate my sincere thanks for their patient and indulgent attention.

SPEECH OF MR. COLQUITT,

OF GEORGIA.

In the House of Representatives, January 17, 1840—Against the reception of Abolition petitions.

Mr. SPEAKER: The little experience I have had in your national councils has excited my fears that a spirit stalks in our midst, calculated to destroy the purest Government that has ever shed the sweets of social life upon the world. Every discussion tends to excite local prejudice; every debate to stir up political strife; every question to call forth the energies of party discipline; and every motion serves but to kindle the fires of individual animosity. Amid these conflicting, warring elements, the voice of reason is too often hushed, and the peace, the glory, and prosperity of the country, neglected or forgotten.

To me, therefore, it has been gratifying to witness the spirit that has been manifested by those who have hitherto taken part in this debate; a debate so well calculated to stir up the bitterest feelings of excitement. I, too, will gladly follow the generous example, by sacrificing upon the altar of my country my strong sectional attachments, and lend my aid to soothe the tempest that threatens destruction to the fairest edifice that human hands ever raised. I listened with delight to the eloquent strains of patriotism that fell from the lips of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MONROE.] He spoke the feelings of a heart burning with love for the institutions of his country, and I can trust his sincerity. But, sir, while I approbate and cheer his well told regard for rights secured by the Constitution, I must beg leave to dissent from the mode he has recommended, as the one most likely to quiet this agitating question. We are invoked not to blend the question of Abolition with the right of petition! We are told it is best to receive the petitions and report upon them, and in this way sever the questions! We are told by another gentleman of New York, [Mr. GRANGER,] that by refusing to receive the petitions, we shall drive into the ranks of the Abolitionists many a gallant spirit! Sir, it is a mistake; honestly as the sentiment may have been uttered, it is a mistake. The blending Abolition with the right of petition is a subterfuge to which the Representative has fled, in order to compromise with Abolition constituents. He and they have made the feigned issue. The Representative, too well informed, or too much devoted to the Constitution of his country, is unwilling to vindicate the prayer of the petitioners; and yet, to win their friendship, and obtain their suffrage, he promises to advocate their pretensions, which he bases on the right of petition. Here he takes his stand, proudly claiming a high constitutional prerogative; passes an eulogy upon the motives and characters of the Abolitionists, while he confesses that the granting their prayers would be the overthrow of the Republic. He is opposed to trampling down the Constitution, and of bringing ruin on the country, while they are bent on carrying out their purpose, reckless to the consequence. The petitioners, yet too weak in most of the districts to elect a Representative who is willing to vindicate their project, must content themselves to yield their support to him who, in some slight degree, shall favor their cause. While they are too weak to elect, they are strong enough to be courted. The gallant spirits which it is said would be driven into the ranks of the Abolitionists, by refusing to receive the petitions, are those whose patriotism and integrity are too weak to resist the temptation to office. In those districts where the Abolition influence is strong enough, they send Abolitionists here, who stand prepared to plead for the prayer of the petitioners, and will vote to carry out their wishes. In those districts where they are not quite strong enough for this, they support such delegates as answer their present purposes; who deny being Abolitionists themselves, and yet, to retain the friendship of this class of their constituents, pronounce on this floor high commendations upon them. You, sir, [to Mr. MONROE,] with your worthy colleagues, coming from the proud city of New York, can speak a language much more bold than the gentleman who succeeded you in the debate. You can denounce the threatened ills to your country, and with a noble, generous spirit, throw yourself in the breach, and proudly say in the midst of the Representatives of the nation, that if the threatened work of slaughter shall proceed, if civil war shall be the result of the maddened efforts of fanaticism, that your sword will be drawn and your blood be spilt on the soil of Virginia, the place of your birth, battling for her rights. But can the gentleman who succeeded you [Mr. GRANGER] use language as bold! Think you he would dare, upon this floor, speak a language of rebuke to those misguided constituents who gave him their support, and tell them if they persevere in their madness, that his love of country will make him their unflinching foe? No, sir; true, he is no Abolitionist, but he passes an unwarrantable panegyric upon this favored class, says they are intelligent, they are patriotic, they are brave, and chivalrous; they are such men, if his eulogy be just, as friendship would covet, and the country need in the hour of her peril. Why this difference between you and your colleague? It is the proof of the remarks I have been making. Your constituency will sustain you in your proudest strains of patriotism; they send you, as you have declared, with the olive branch, and bid you tender it to the South; and if I may digress a moment, permit me to say, that such a tender, from such hands, sent by such a people as you represent, will meet the cheers of the South. It is what I could have expected from the generous citizens of the city from which you have come. Her merchants have mingled with our people; have shared our friendship; and have witnessed, in the stillness of our Sabbath morns, at the ringing of our church-bells, hundreds of well-clad little negroes, cheerfully assembling at Sabbath schools to catch lessons of piety from the fairest and best of our land. No shivering starveling to arrest your thoughts of devotion, by begging a pittance to satisfy his hunger. They know that there is more comfort, happiness, and religion, among the colored people of the South than the North. They know that the servile hireling of the North is a subject of deeper pity than slaves at the South. But other gentlemen cannot, dare not, speak a language so bold and patriotic as you have for yourself and associates. They represent a constituency who are ignorant of our people; who are deeply imbued with imaginative pietism, and they must needs court their favor to obtain their suffrage. The eulogy bestowed upon this portion of your citizens is unjust. They are pronounced intelligent, chivalrous, and patriotic. Sir, if they are enlightened, if they understand the Constitution of their country, if they know that the pillars which support their Government, are the confidence and affections of the people—then their efforts contradict the idea that they are patriots, and prove them reckless to the perpetuity of the Union. He is no patriot, no matter where he lives, no matter whether he claim to be Whig or Democrat, who disturbs the peace and tranquillity of the Government, wars against the rights secured by its Constitution, and labors with zeal for its total subversion. And he is scarcely less contemptible for his folly, if he is a patriot, than criminal for his conduct, if he be intelligent. Both he cannot be; it is a contradiction in terms. But we are charged with wishing to deny the right of petition! and that it is monstrous that an American Congress shall now publish to the world her denial of this constitutional right. Sir, it is a false issue; no such denial is made; no such law is offered; no such rule or resolution is proposed. The Constitution inhibits Congress from passing any law to prevent the citizens from peaceably assembling to petition Government. In other words, no riot act shall be passed, as in England, to be read by some officer of Government, compelling citizens to disperse, who may have assembled in peace, smarting under their wrongs, to petition for their redress. This is the spirit of the Constituion, the object plainly expressed by the article as amended. And yet we are told that, by refusing to receive the petitions, we violate this wholesome article of the Constitution. Is there any injunction that their petitions, when made, shall be received? If so, the same construction compels you to act; and if you act, compels you to grant the prayer of the petitioners. The reason urged for the constitutional obligation to receive is claimed as a consequence upon the constitutional right of petition. That the right of petition is vain, unless we receive! By the same process of reasoning, are we not compelled to act upon them when received, and to grant their prayers when we act? If it be useless to petition, unless the petitions are received, will it not be equally useless unless the prayers be granted? The Constitution is equally as imperative upon us to grant the things for which they ask, as it is in compelling us to receive. Would not the advocates for the constitutional right of petition feel fully at liberty to decline being the bearers of petitions, over which they felt satisfied that this House had no jurisdiction? Would they not feel it a duty to refuse being made the instruments of producing delay and vexation in our legislative council, by presenting petitions which they would not support, and which they well knew would not and ought not to be granted? So might and so ought each Representative on this floor to act, who regards the institutions of his country. Before I would be made the unhallowed instrument of introducing the brand of discord and the fierce fires of dissension into this Hall, threatening dissolution and ruin, this right arm should fall rotten from its socket. If each member, in his individual right, could refuse to receive these petitions, either denying jurisdiction, or from a more laudable impulse—the peace and safety of his country—how does it happened that we are charged with infringing a sacred right, if we do the same act, for the same reasons, in our congregated character. Does it add to the dignity of an American Congress to say, that it must receive for consideration every subject presented, no matter how fruitful of discord, anarchy, and insult? Do gentlemen flatter themselves that they are to be esteemed the high spirited champions of national honor, by forcing upon it scenes of outrage and confusion. No, sir, it is the folly of childhood; yea, more, it is the madness of lunacy, to sport with the peace, honor, and perpetuity of the nation, under the specious pretext of establishing the right of petition.

The people nowhere complain that they are interrupted in the free exercise of this constitutional right! They complain that the South does not emancipate her slaves. The Representative insists upon the sacred right of petition. They petition that Congress may force slaveholders to set their negroes free. The Representative only insists on the right of petition. Sir, it is an insult to the understanding of the House, that gentlemen should urge us to receive and act upon a subject, which they admit an unfit subject of legislation. They make this false issue to secure their elections, and warn us that if they be driven from this step stone to elevation, many gallant spirits will be driven into the ranks of the Abolitionists; that is, in plain language, these gallant spirits will sooner join the maddened yells of fanaticism, and raise a sublimated war cry against the perpetuity and peace of their country, than hazard the loss of their appointments. On their account, you must receive these petitions, and they will most cheerfully unite in a report setting forth their folly, and denying their requirements. I will not indulge my thoughts of detestation and abhorrence for this mockery of patriotism, and hypocrisy of morals. I am fully reminded of a few lines of doggeral verse, quoted, I think, by Bulwer, in some degree descriptive of our present position:

> Hark! in the lobby, hear a lion roar:
> Say, Mr. Speaker, shall we shut the door?
> Or, Mr. Speaker, shall we let him in,
> To see how quick we'll turn him out again?

The Representative from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIDDLE] asked my honorable colleague [Mr. COOPER] to furnish him with argument to combat the Abolitionists: that when he was laboring in the political harvest-field, endeavoring to mow down the noxious growth, that is, blasting the nation's prosperity, he was met by this declaration: if it be wrong—if it be unconstitutional—why does not Congress tell us so—why not declare by the voice of her resolutions the impropriety of our proceedings? which, he said, he could not answer; and begged now to be furnished with one. Sir, I listened with too much interest to the mellifluous accents of his winning oratory, to believe he was serious. He is too well informed to need the promptings of my colleague; he can, if he dare, base himself upon the pillars of constitutional rights, and with a voice, a manner, and utterance, that would still the turbulence of passion, tell his constituents that their inquiry is answered! He can, if he will, take in his hands the journals of Congress of 1790, when Georgia had a worthier and abler advocate of her rights, in the halls of Congress, her illustrious Baldwin, and point them to a report that tells them of their folly. He can, if he will, tell them, what his worthy partisan from New York [Mr. GRANGER] has uttered, that for twenty-five years past, have our illustrious predecessors received and acted on such petitions, and politely denied them. He can, if he will, tell them that an able and conciliatory report was made as late as 1836, with the vain hope of quieting their exertions. He can, if he dare, go farther, and speak in arguments not to resisted, the wisdom of experience upon this subject. He can tell them that many deluded enthusiasts have ruined themselves and the objects of their philanthropy, by uprooting the order of society. He can tell them that Lycurgus gave laws, that Epaminondas and Scipio conquered, that Demosthenes and Cicero poured forth their strains of animated eloquence, in a land where slavery was recognised. He can tell them of the desolations of Poland, where Kosciusko and Sobieski battled for the cause of liberty, and yet slavery existed. He can tell them of the wars of our Revolution; of the patriots who penned our Independence; of the soldiers who stood side by side in the ranks of war; of the final victory achieved; of the framing and ratification of our Constitution; and that the institution of slavery existed, was acknowledged, and guarded.

But, sir, he prefers to come here with his argument, throwing a veil over the iniquity of the Abolitionists, and apologies for their mischief. Twenty-five years ago, what Governor of a State would have let down the dignity of his station, and have trampled upon the compact of union, offering the veriest quibble as a reason, relying alone for his support on the prejudices of the people? It is evidence that the spirit of fanaticism is stronger, or man's moral virtue weaker, than it used to be. The same arguments, as to forbearance and moderation, have induced Southern men, on many occasions, in the spirit of kindness and friendship, to receive these petitions. And what, let me inquire, has been the result? To-day it is quoted on us as an acknowledgment of the right to legislate upon this subject. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIDDLE] now proclaims that the South has has admitted its constitutionality, and here bases an argument. Sir, the South has been deluded by the insidious pretensions of their Northern friends; that rejection would increase the bitterness and acrimony of the Abolitionists; they have dared to made a peace-offering, by kindly compromising the claims of the Constitution, which is now seized on as an acknowledgment of right. I am unable to answer for former Representatives from Georgia; the little party, of which I am a member, has been doomed to defeat, battling in the Thermopylæ of politics, against Federal encroachment, but has arisen again; and I can now answer for my State, and answer for my honorable colleagues, and say, in the face of the nation's Representatives, that we deny the right! [So do we, so do we! from many voices.] And while I speak, all around me, the representatives from Alabama, South and North Carolina, and Mississippi, bid me, for them, deny the right. We are told the Abolition battle must be fought at the North; that we must deal kindly here, to afford a campus for their chivalry at home? Sir, these gallant men who now battle at the North for the protection of our rights, will soon sink by age, under the weight of their armor, or fall in the battle field by the superior strength of the foe. Their places will be filled by men, whose growth and strength were derived from the bosoms of fanaticism; whose dreams in childhood were broken by the frightful legends of a mother's superstition. There needs no spirit of prophecy to warn and direct us; no matter where the battle be fought, here or at the North, we must meet the foe upon the outposts of the Constitution. No admitting the incendiary torch within the holy citadel of our liberties. Every friend to his country, from the North and from the South, must stand firm upon the ramparts of the Constitution, admit no insidious foe, but resolve to brave the growing rage of that imaginative philanthropy, that is reckless of the peace, liberty, or union of the Republic. Every conciliatory measure has been adopted; prayers and entreaties have been offered, to prevent excitement and passion; discussion has been avoided; the voice of party friends has been regarded; still the tempest thickens and rages, and is beating with a success too fatal against the rock of our freedom. It is not a time to encourage the prospects of men infuriated with a blind enthusiasm; no time to hold out the meteor of hope, whose baleful light will lead to the overthrow of our country. Nothing is claimed here but the right of petition, which has never been denied. With this pretext, gentlemen labor with a zeal worthy of a better cause, to open a fissure in the Constitution, through which an incendiary follower may thrust the firebrand, calculated to burn asunder the connecting cords of the Confederacy. They are in fact pioneers, clearing up the way that others may pass in triumph to build the tombstone of the Republic. They are fixing a a powder train, that others may blow up the temple of liberty. I can pity and forgive the blind zealot and misguided religionist, who are ignorant of the structure of the Government; but the statesman, who knows that our free institutions are based upon the confidence and affections of the people, who dare not violate rights secured by the Constitution, deserves undying contempt, for he has not so much as the veil of opinion to cover the baldness of that desolation which threatens the land. We are told not to be rash; make ourselves easy; receive the petitions; treat them with respect; and by it our friends from the North will again be elected, and "all's well." The very entreaties that are uttered, and the strong appeals of party associates, which are made, are convincing proofs that they are courting the friendship of the Abolitionists for their votes. I am neither Whig or Democrat, and can be excused, therefore, from compromising our rights to secure votes for their friends. I will speak with boldness my thoughts, and deal out blows against the foes of constitutional right, no matter to which party they may belong. I propose to show that while these advocates for the reception of Abolition petitions are speaking in accents of tenderness and love, the Abolitionists themselves speak a language totally different. I will not detain the House, by reading from this anti slavery pamphlet, the scurrilous abuse they heap upon the South; I will not inflame the angry passions of gentlemen from slaveholding States, by reading the opinions here expressed of our morals, our religion, and our intellects. They are of a sort, with the repeated denunciations you have seen in their philanthropic prints, with which your desks have been weekly inundated since our meeting. But I will read a few extracts to show that our reliance for safety is on ourselves. I read from the annual report of the Anti-Slavery Society of Maine, thus:

"The free States possess a clear majority in Congress. Their several objects will therefore be accomplished, whenever the public sentiment in the free States shall demand it, and that sentiment properly represented in Congress. We are under solemn obligations, therefore, not only to diffuse through the community correct sentiments on the subject of slavery, but also to make all proper efforts to place in our National Legislature men who will use the power committed to their hands in accordance with our views."

Does this extract, I ask, show that the petitioners barely wish their representatives here to contend for the right of petition? But does it not demonstrate that they carry their principles to the polls, and force aspirants to Congress to favor or support their views? Sir, we are not to be deceived by yielding our rights, in order to accommodate gentlemen, in courting such votes to secure their election. Again I read:

"The District, then, is the spot where the first onset upon slavery is to be made—the battle ground where this great contest between liberty and slavery is to be decided. Not to employ our political, as well as all other resources, in the conflict, would be not merely wrong, but the very height of folly."

Where is the man, I inquire, so lost to sense or feeling, whose heart throbs with one solitary patriotic emotion, and who knows the South will maintain her rights, or be buried under their ruins, that does not shudder for the approaching downfall of the country? Who does not see that the insidious attempts to encroach one inch upon our rights, are the promptings of that influence which has for its object the tearing away the guards of our property placed by the Constitution? They only wait for strength to place men in power, who will not stop at the evasive argument now used about the right of petition, but who will labor to carry out their purpose. And while we are arguing and granting the right of reception, they are preparing heavier blows, inflaming the passions of the ignorant, the idle, and the young, to be poured forth like the lava of a volcano, to blacken and blight the peace and Government of the country. It is not a time for the Representatives of the South to be quiet. It is not a time for the lover of his country from the North to palter for office, and vainly imagine "all's well!" when the elements of dissolution are gathering like a frost about the heart pulse of the Republic. It is high time, if we expect to save the Union, to rebuke the madness of such deluded fanatics, as expect to establish religion by their crimes, and to enforce philanthropy by the sword. Sir, my heart thrilled at the spirited remarks made by the honorable mover of this amendment, [Gen. THOMPSON;] he spoke the language of the patriot and the voice of the South: and if every Whig and every Democrat felt the same sentiments, and would tear loose from the bonds of any party, no matter what their ties, that would dare cherish this spirit of discord, our institutions, civil and religious, would be safe. These modern reformers must be taught, that the South, with all her strong attachments to the Union, would sooner see the country riven asunder by an earthquake, and her fertile plains floating on the bosom of a tempest-tossed ocean, than be forced to surrender a solitary right secured by the Constitution.

I have heard criminations and recriminations made in party bantlings upon this floor; but I am satisfied there are Abolitionists of both parties; and that party which courts them most, is by the American people most to be blamed. In proof of which I will read again:

"So far as the two great parties of the day are concerned, we hold to no principles as Abolitionists, that both do not publicly profess. The object we desire to accomplish, does not interfere with any, at which either professedly aims. Let it then be distinctly settled, that no man, under any possible combination of circumstances, can receive the votes of Abolitionists, who will not go the extent of his constitutional powers for the abolition of slavery; and both parties will soon, either from policy or necessity, present candidates for public office for whom we may vote, in consistency with our party predilections, and in subserviency also to paramount duty to the slave."

Do we not find here sufficient cause to induce candidates for Congress, representing such a people, to favor or adopt their views in a close party contest? But, sir, these fanatics will not long be content with Representatives here, who are the mere advocates of petition; and their party policy here must induce gentlemen not to press this subject, for fear of injuring a partisan candidate at home. I will again proceed with their declarations, and I ask Southern men to give ear, and those from the North, who declare they are not Abolitionists, to listen, and then tell me if the contest is not most safely met at the threshhold of our rights. This is the language, they say:

"That we shall not again present the monstrous anomaly of petitioning Congress to use its acknowledged powers for the termination of slavery, while by your votes we help to send men there who we know beforehand will refuse our petitions."

There is no complaint in the language of the right of petition; they admit they do petition, and only complain that their petitions are not granted. I make no charges against either of the great parties, as to which is most committed in order to secure the friendship of the Abolitionists; and I would read a sentence more, but it might savor of party preference. [Read, read! from many voices.] With the avowal I have made, I will read:

"The day, we trust, has passed, that the slaveholder or the Northern apologist and defender of slavery can be elevated to the high place of power by the friends of the slave in Maine. Or, to illustrate our remarks by a particular case: Mr. Van Buren, we think, must abandon his 'Southern principles,' and Henry Clay, the eloquent advocate of South American and Grecian liberty, must emancipate his slaves, before either can receive the suffrages of intelligent Abolitionists in the pole star State—"

[Here he was interrupted by Mr. GRAVES, who inquired "whether Mr. COLQUITT had not read in the Emancipator that they would not support Harrison?"]

I may have done so; but I have not made a charge against General Harrison, and the vindication of him or Van Buren, I shall leave to those who wear their livery. Without regard to party predilections myself, my purpose was to prove that this body of men is sufficiently strong to be courted; that they have resolved to carry their principles to the polls, and that seeking their influence palsies our resistance here. And I confess that I have sought in vain for a reason, unless this influence be one, why Henry Clay, the favorite of his party, justly distinguished at the bar, in the Senate, and in the Cabinet, who has served long, and still is in the service of his country, should have been pushed aside at the Harrisburg Convention, and an obsolete politician put in his stead. No matter whether the politician here acts from his convictions of duty or is moved by prejudice or passion, we are satisfied that our rights, yea, the Government itself is endangered, by sacrifices for party success. The statesman now that would dare stand forth to strengthen the bonds of union, and to exalt and perpetuate the institutions of his country, find himself fettered by the policy of his party, and is driven to abandon his purpose, or be branded as a deserter. Disappointed ambition, in its aspirations for power, grasps every instrumentality within its reach; fans the flames of faction and discord, and smiles at success, in the midst of the ruins of that Constitution which guaranties protection to the person and property of the citizen. Here lies the foundation of that paper built edifice of piety and philanthropy, which is destined at some future period to be the hall of legislation for a large proportion of the Republic. Here is the nidus in which is nestled, and bred and born, the corrupt vermin that feed and fatten upon the vitals of the Republic. Designing politicians strengthen their alliances, by bringing to their support the misguided zeal of religion, and the maddened feelings of philanthropy. The Christian minister and his flock are made the unconscious adjuncts of artful and designing partisans. Religion, forgetful of her high and heavenly calling, is made the polluted handmaid of intrigue and corruption. The disciple Christ, who hitherto fostered a meek and quiet spirit, who walked humbly in the fear of God, whose worship breathed the elevation of the skies, and spoke a sublimity that made us forget the imperfections of earth, now mingles his cries with the howlings of the mob, and converts the temple of the living God to a busy mart for political merchandise. The spirit engendered by this mixed and factious piety, is unfriendly to genuine religion, as well as to the State. It moves and prompts the same passions, which, in other times, have corroded, adulterated, and broken down the church. Frail men make themselves the standards of zeal, piety, and benevolence; pass judgment between themselves and their opponents; roll the thunders of intolerance over the heads of those who repudiate their opinions; and in the maddened wailings of annual petitions, virtually ask Congress to give them power to arrest the liberty of private judgment, and substitute in its stead their own faultless conceptions of duty. To these misguided people permit me to say that Christianity never has, nor never will, need the support of craft or despotism, the power of kings, or the arm of the law, to carry out its benignant precepts. And every votary of the cross, who seeks to enforce his notions of piety by the power of legislation, shrouds in darkness the bright banner of the gospel, and subjects in its stead the bloody standard of demonology. History and experience should admonish every friend of the church, if she is to exert a more general and beneficial influence upon the earth, she must breathe with her own lungs, speak with her own voice, and show the energy of a pulse and a heart exclusively her own. Every intermingling of her purity with secular interest, sullies her beauty and fetters her powers. The merchant of Mecca, who professed to penetrate the seventh heaven, and brought down a spark which set the ambition of Arabian bosoms in a blaze, might deem the sword the only instrument to be trusted for reforming the world. But the prophet of God deals with the souls, not with the bodies, of men; and wars with weapons not carnal, in contending with spiritual wickedness in high places. Madness and phrenzy might mingle in Moslem warfare, making the question of salvation or damnation lie on the ground between marshalled armies, to be fought for and carried by the stronger arm. But with us, Heaven is not won by those who breathe out slaughter against their brethren, though in the midst of carnage they should claim to be doing God's service. Upon the subject of slavery, Christians of every denomination, and of every grade of character and talent, differ in their opinions. Yet they read the same Bible, worship the same God, bow around the same altars, hymn hosannahs in the same temples, and, finally anticipate an entrance into the same Heaven. With these conflicting opinions, who shall determine the orthodox creed? Shall the deluded enthusiast, whose sum total of religion centres in one single act of imaginary devotion? Shall a few parchment disciples upon this floor, whose political power is enhanced by the creed they profess, shut themselves up in their little munition of spiritual pride—a city walled up to Heaven—and with formality unchristianize those with whom they differ? Do they outshine their opponents in solid virtues, or in amiable and heavenly dispositions? Are they more free from the common vices of life—more pure in spirit—more devoted in friendship—or more liberal in their charities, than those they denounce? No, sir: the South, the slaveholding, generous South, is the nursery for the poor of all the States; and her friendship and liberality are by-words in those very mouths that would fain teach her lessons of philanthropy. I will not descant upon this much abused term, philanthropy; I have spoken of religion; philanthropy is but its beam, radiating from its centre, God; it is but a fold of that mighty mantle of love, with which Christianity would cover the nakedness of the world. But, sir, perhaps these conceited defenders of the only true faith, have an apology for looking out from home for objects of pity and commiseration! Perhaps they have no poor in their midst—no widow's tears to wipe—no orphan's cries to quell—no child of sorrows to cheer—no wretchedness to alleviate—no afflictions to heal—no nakedness to clothe; but all, all, through this mighty channel of philanthropy—from this boiling fountain of benevolence—all have been made smiling, healthful, and happy. Having done so much at home, it is not so much wonder that the circle of their benevolence should widen. Millions of money may now be expended with profit, in compensating benevolent editors to trumpet forth virtuous heroism, to canvass the claims of candidates for office, and pour their merciful curses and phrenzied benedictions upon each and all who dare refuse to worship the image they have piously set up in the plains of Dura.

I am departing from my purpose; I have not designed to deal in panegyric or satire. I have no right to make myself the keeper of other men's conscience, for if they think it religiously a duty to hobble the chickencock, to keep him from gallanting the hens on Sunday, and to yoke the geese to keep them from going in washing in violation of the Sabbath; and I should differ with them, and think it no sin for the gallant cock to flap his wings and crow upon his dunghill, and the playful goose to wash and swim in the fishpond, neither ought to complain; for we are entitled, in this country, to our religion and our opinions. The most artful chain of despotism that was ever forged, was supported by false notions of duty, and enforced by those who were to profit by the cheat. There are multitudes of honest men who are not qualified to judge properly of their civil and political rights, and are too often content to surrender their reasoning powers to interested aspirants, superstitious fanatics, and pedantic knaves. I wage no war against those who may believe slavery a sin; but I pity their vanity and their folly, if they flatter themselves they alone are divinely illuminated that others are in darkness, and must have their instruction. We read of one who was very thankful to his Maker that he was not as other men, but especially the poor publican; and yet his opinion of himself was not confirmed by Him who knew all things. Yet I have no complaints to utter against the high opinion men entertain of themselves; but as a friend of the church, and as a friend to the peace and happiness of the country, I raise my hand and voice against enforcing any religious dogmas at the point of the bayonet, or by force of legislation. The evidence we have of the untiring efforts of the anti-slavery agents, their reckless determination to distract and ruin the country or carry out their purpose; the assiduity with which they are courted by political leaders, and the number of able eulogists they have in the halls of Congress, all speak, with unerring tongue, the nation's destiny. The fiery vapors of war and dissolution are fast gathering on the disc of our political horizon; no cheering rainbow foretells the abatement of the coming storm; but every moment the prospect darkens, and every patriot and every Christian trembles for the fate of the country and the temple of God. The public mind is in fearful commotion, and, like the sea, tossed by a tornado, wave mounts on wave, heightening and widening at every breath of the tempest. It is the high prerogative of a few master-spirits here, if they dared to will it, to bid these proud waves be still. To them I appeal; and in the name of the country, the whole country, invoke them to withhold their firebrands of discord and ruin. I appeal to the venerable Representative from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] upon whose shoulders fell the mantle of a Revolutionary father, who won and wore, in younger life, the civic wreath, the highest honor a nation's confidence could bestow; I appeal to him to withhold the blow that is aimed at the life-pulse of the Republic, and not permit himself to be used as the unintentional instrument of his country's ruin. We know his sentiments; we have read his letters, and heard his speeches; but still, through his advocacy, this dissension is kept alive; a few more years of labor in this cause, and the last leaf of the the laurel the will wither from his brow; and should Heaven spare him many years, he may yet outlive the glory of his country. Your Abolition petitions will prove, in the end, to be the winding-sheet of the Constitution. No men, no body of men, could persuade me to bring into your midst an unfit subject for legislation, calculated to destroy the harmony of your councils, to excite sectional feelings, and threaten dissolution. Georgia, in whose borders I have been reared, my own home and the home of my friends, for whose honor and interest I would make an offering of my life, even Georgia could not force me, humble as I am, to trample upon my country's Constitution, and sow the seeds of discord and ruin through the land. My honorable colleague [Mr. COOPER] the other day, when supposed to be departing from the subject of debate, was illustrating the same feelings I have expressed. He adverted to the controversy of our State with the State of Maine, in which we should exemplify our strict adherence to the Constitution; and that, although our Legislature spoke by her resolutions, the humble supplicatory language of dependence, she had no representative here that would echo her voice; but that we should rely with proud confidence on a people that has never faltered, who know their rights, and will dare maintain them. I am alarmed for the Constitution and for the fate of the Republic, but feel no alarm for the honor of my State. The infatuated priest may change his mitre for a helmet, and lay aside his Bible for the torch of the incendiary, place himself at the head of an army of crusaders, as bloody as those of Languedoc, armed with all the authority Congress can give; and when he shall have completed the work of reformation, upon which his piety is set, nothing will be seen, to look out from the landscape—he has traversed but smoking ruins and a blood-sodden wilderness.

With this prospect before us, can any man say that this Government will stand unshaken? that the alarm cry is counterfeit? that this faction is powerless, courted and caressed as it is by aspirants for power? These deluded people, allured by imaginary good, look to no danger—they beat up, for recruits, the pulpit and the dramshop, the elite parlor and the dirty brothel—enlist their quota for the mighty work of reform. If the Constitution is to be saved—if the Union is to be preserved, there must be no giving back upon the part of their friends. The silken cord of affection, that binds the Confederacy, is fretted and weakened by insult. We are upon the eve of a struggle, that will bury the Government, and the church of the living God, under a mountain of cinders. Let no Southern man be deceived by the cry of forbearance. Let no political alliance induce you to compromise your rights. Reject the petitions, and count him only true to the South, and to the Constitution, who sustains us by his vote. Let none play false to his duty, false to the interest and honor of his State, rather than be obstacles to his associates in party. Ask me not what harm to receive and lay them on the table! It is an implied acknowledgment of the right of jurisdiction; it is the evidence that the fire is not yet extinguished; its smouldering fumes are an annoyance; and none can tell how soon the breath of the faction may fan it to a flame. It is like subterranean fire; the more to be dreaded, as it may burst forth by surprise. If the isssue must be formed, let it be formed now; if the crisis must come, let us have it now. Let the South stand up as one man, denounced, as we are, for the want of patriotism and religion. The soft silken banner of the Gospel, and the broad stripes and bright stars of the country, both float triumphant in a southern sky. We represent a generous and gallant people, who have never yet trampled upon the rights of others, and will repel with indignation, and at every hazard, any unjust interference with their own.

REMARKS OF MR. REYNOLDS, OF ILLINOIS,

In the House of Representatives, February 8, 1840.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana presented a memorial of a convention of delegates from the States of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, held at Terre Haute, in the State of Indiana, for the purpose of recommending such measures as may be best calculated to insure the final completion of the Cumberland road, with the least possible delay; and moved that the said memorial be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CASEY moved that the committee be instructed to report a bill appropriating $150,000 for each of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to be expended on the National road in said States, in the year 1840, under the direction of the War Department; said appropriation to be subject to all the instructions and conditions of former appropriations on said road.

Mr. REYNOLDS rose and said: The State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, feel a deep interest in this measure; and were I to remain silent on this occasion, it might be supposed that I was indifferent to the question now before the House. On the contrary, I feel the most anxious desire not only to do my duty in this matter, but also to be instrumental, in some small degree, in the passage of this measure. It is one of the most interesting measures that appertains to the people of Illinois, and it is one in which they have the most entire confidence of its success.

This is the reason, Mr. SPEAKER, that I now appear before you and this House.

It is extremely unfortunate for me that, every time I rise to address the House, and that is but seldom, politics should be mixed up with the subject on which I feel bound to express my views. This was the case, the SPEAKER will recollect, when I had the honor to address the House on the viva voce system of election. I regret exceedingly that politics are now unnecessarily dragged into the discussion of this question, which is so interesting to the Western country.

I am not opposed to political discussions at their proper times and places. I am not at all unfriendly to stump speeches, made boldly and openly in the Western fashion; but I do not approve of the Eastern mode of bringing out candidates for office and then the candidates to remain, throughout the canvass as silent as wax figures. This seems to me to be a kind of mock modesty, that it is not necessary or proper to observe. Thus you see I am not for stifling discussion.

On a subject which is of such vast importance to the West, I would appeal to gentlemen to discard politics from it altogether, and discuss the measure on its merits alone. No political capital ought to be sought for by either party in the discussion; and I would suggest to my Western friends whether a measure they have so much at heart, should be injuriously effected by dragging it into the political arena. In fact, it would be good policy on my part to avoid a political discussion, for I am well aware that my remarks would appear light in comparison with the sound and eloquent speech you have just heard from the gentleman [Mr. BIDDLE] of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BIDDLE explained. He would assure the gentleman from Illinois that he would not have said a word on the subject, if it had not been for the remarks made by the gentleman from Indiana, who obtained the floor from the purpose of making a personal explanation, and then went to a defence of the Administration.

Mr. R. continued: I had not intended to say one word in complaint of the remarks made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, for whom I entertain the highest respect. Although I have not had a personal shake hand acquaintance with that gentleman; yet I know well his character, and highly appreciate it.

What I intended to say was to show to the friends of this measure, the importance of keeping the question free from the political conflicts of the day; yet when I am on this subject, I feel free to remark, that I am not adverse to the call of proper and legitimate information from the President, or any of the appropriate departments. It is our duty to make the call, when it is to advance the objects of legislation, and in such cases, it will afford me pleasure to vote for such resolution.

I am not disposed to stifle or strangle investigation, when it is proper and necessary to make it for the public interest. And, I presume, the departments would be as ready to give, as we would be ask, all proper information.

But suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the appropriate departments of Government did not make the estimate for an appropriation to carry on the Cumberland road; are we, in that event, to fold our arms and sit still? Are we not bound still to do our duty, and press this measure on the consideration of Congress on its own merits.

Each department and each individual must be judged by their official conduct. The President and the Departments, as well as ourselves, will be judged by their acts; and although the Treasury Department may not have made the estimates for the Cumberland road, yet that is no excuse for us to cease our exertions in this good cause.

I ask, for the Cumberland road, an impartial investigation, and a discussion on its merits; and permit me to say that I am friendly to the doctrine that the National Government ought not to embark in a general system of internal improvements. I am clearly satisfied, in the main, that is the correct doctrine. But the improvement now under consideration manifestly forms an exception: all general rules have their exceptions, and the Cumberland road is one in this case.

The National road is the work of the most wise and talented men that our country has ever produced. In 1806, under the administration of Thomas Jefferson, the act of Congress, giving life and existence to this great and useful work, was passed.

The individuals who established this great improvement in the country exercised those enlightened and enlarged views of public policy that will do honor to them to the latest posterity. This public highway across the mountains, and through the valley of the Mississippi, will never cease to exist. It will last forever, I hope, as it is now, a monument to the honor and glory of the country.

I presume, at its creation, the rancor of party politics did not figure large or strong; but the public utility of the measure guided the councils of those sages that produced this great work; and in the same spirit of meekness and forbearance to each other must we expect to continue it.

That this measure is Democratic, the most scrupulous Democrat can not doubt. Jefferson and the Democratic party were its parents. It is a pure legitimate child, both conceived and brought forth in Democracy. There is no excuse that it is a mongrel or mule breed, and I hope no one will oppose it on this ground.

This work, having this constitutional parentage, was fostered and continued on from year to year, for more than thirty years, down to the present time. It had been the favorite of the Government through the administrations of the successive Presidents, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Adams, Jackson, and Van Buren, and it had in the successive events of peace and war, through this long course of time, the necessary appropriations to continue its construction.

Its friends, being wise and good men, and having united for such a great length of time in the favorable consideration of this road, must give to it that importance of character which will have great influence with the people. The reasons must be strong and cogent that will justify the abandonment of this improvement at this time.

The public utility of this work, during the experience of more than thirty years, has confirmed the anticipations of its most sanguine friends. No one doubts it, and no one, who has seen this road, pretends to object to its utility. It connects and cements together remote parts of the Union, and brings together the East and the West. It affords to all travellers, of every grade and description, an easy and commodious passage over the vast and stupendous Alleghany mountains.

It is useless to describe these mountains—you all know them. Before the construction of this road, it would appear to be almost impossible for any animal except the birds of the air to cross them.

These high mountains, precipices, and deep ravines, have yielded to the art and power of man, and at this time, there is a good road constructed over them, so that a team can convey across them seventy or eighty hundred in a wagon. This improvement is suited to the convenience and capacity of all to use it. There is no monopoly in it. is not confined to a company; but free and open to all mankind, on payment of a very small toll to keep it in repair.

Mr. Speaker, it would seem to me to be unbecoming this great nation, after commencing a work with serious deliberation, and in obedience to "the sober and second thought of the people;" and after carrying it on for more than thirty years, to abandon it. If the improvement were useless, give it up; but the contrary is proved to be the general sense of the community. In what situation will an abandonment place us? Can it be justified by saving a few dollars? Will not this course not only injure the substantial interest of the country, but also tarnish that character for wisdom and consistency, which this nation ought, and I hope will, sustain.

It seems to me the character and standing of the nation are pledged to carry out this important work. There can be no half way with a great and powerful people. When they decide on a measure and the same is good, they ought to carry it out.

Suppose the Government were to abandon the Florida war, would not our character suffer by it? I see no great difference in the cases. The country, in both instances, must be injured by an abandonment.

It cannot be urged that the Government have not the means to carry it on. The people of this Government have more wealth among them, at this time, than they had at any former period. The resources and true wealth are abundant in the country. The circulation of bank notes may not be as plenty as at some former periods; but they are not the true wealth of the people. This consideration can form no excuse, in my opinion, for the abandonment of this work, which is of such great public utility.

During the war with one of the most powerful nations on earth, we heard of no such excuse as the want of money to carry on this same work. The money and other means of the nation were exerted to the utmost in the vigorous prosecution of this war, yet the work on this road was not permitted to stop; and, therefore, let it not be said, at this day of prosperity of our country, that we have not the means to finish this road, as we contemplated.

The faith and character of the nation were pledged to construct this road through the new States, as it was located. The impression was established among the people, that it would be constructed where it was located, which caused many to settle near it, and thereby the sale of the public lands was accelerated, and the price enhanced.

I ask any candid man, under this view of the case, if the completion of the Cumberland road would not form an exception to the general rule, that the Government ought not to embark in a general system of internal improvements.

Mr. Speaker, I will, with all due deference to the House, present another view of this subject for their consideration. The new States through which this road passes, have not the power to tax the public lands within their limits. They are prevented by contract, which we recognise to be valid and binding.

If you will give us the public lands within our borders, we will never again solicit an appropriation to continue the Cumberland road.

[Mr. HUBBARD of Alabama said he, for one, would give his right of the public lands to us in Illinois, if we will make the road.]

Mr. REYNOLDS continued. I feel thankful to the gentleman for his good will to us in Illinois; but he is laboring in his own State (Alabama) under the same vassalage as we do in Illinois, and therefore we have a fellow feeling for each other; but I can hear no such expression from gentlemen representing any of the old States.

Before we can recognise the doctrine of the States constructing their own improvements in the fullest extent, we must be placed on an equal standing with the other States. The new States through which this road passes, are debarred the right to tax a great portion of the soil within their limits, and thereby are deprived of the resources which appertain to the old States. If we were placed in the same condition with the old States, and had an equal standing with them, we would join them heart and hand in excluding all these things from the action of Congress. We would be foremost with the first to confine the action of the General Government to subjects purely national, and expressly recognised by the Constitution. It is the pure and legitimate doctrine to exclude from the halls of Congress all matters that can be transacted by the State authorities, and circumscribe the patronage of the President within the legitimate pale of the Constitution. I am free to grant and subscribe to all this doctrine; yet the National road, for various reasons which I have, and will present to this House, forms a marked and decided exception to this rule.

I am, Mr. Speaker, extremely well pleased to know, that the doctrine of confining the Congress of the United States to national action, is so well recognised and established at this time. In the new States, we are heartily tired of our vassalage to the General Government in respect to the public domain. We are crippled in our operations, and deprived of the high and equal stand in the Union with the other States. This situation is becoming intolerable, and the Government itself is tired of legislating for us in relation to the public lands.

It is no part of the legitimate or constitutional competency of Congress to retain within its sphere of action the subject of the public lands. It affords to the Government of the United States an undue influence over the new States, and over a subject which the State Governments can control better for the good of the people than the General Government can do. It will be hailed as a fortunate epoch in the history of the new States for the above confining doctrine to be applied to this subject, and thereby the new States emancipated from their public land bondage to the General Government.

In addition to the arguments I have already presented to the consideration of this House, I will be permitted to say, that the friends of this measure place it on the solid basis of a compact between the General Government and the new States through which the road passes. The contracts provide for a certain per cent. on the sales of the public lands to be applied by the General Government to the construction of this road; and that the sum arising from the sales has not yet been expended on the work. I have not the calculation before me, but confiding in the information given me by gentlemen in whom I have the utmost confidence, I presume the same is true.

This compact being made between the two Governments with that spirit of equity and justice that always has characterized the transactions between the State Governments and that of the United States, it remains to be consummated on the part of the General Government in the same spirit. The Government of the United States, by the implied terms of this agreement, became the trustee of the States, and in good faith ought, and I hope will, execute the contract according to the common sense meaning of the same.

The facts and circumstances, as they existed at the time the contract was made, must be taken into consideration in its execution. The money that was expended on the construction of this road before the contract was made, cannot be taken into consideration under the contract. The amount alone that was expended on the work since the contract was made, is the sum that comes under the provisions of the contract. In the application of this just and equitable rule to the amount of money expended on the work, it will be seen that a great sum was appropriated on it before these contracts were made; and, therefore, cannot be taken into the estimate. This view of the subject is so manifestly just and right, that to mention it is sufficient to convince all of its truth; and, therefore, I will urge it no farther on the House.

Mr. Speaker, I consider it my duty, in presenting this subject to the House, to say, there have been appropriated and expended by the General Government, this last year, upwards of thirty millions of dollars, and not one dollar was appropriated in or for the State of Illinois, or in the Western country. I am not complaining of this sum being too large for the legitimate purposes of Government. I have on many occasions defended these appropriations. I have no doubt the expenditures of the Government must be larger as the country and the necessities of the country increase. The war in Florida added greatly to the list of expenses. I am satisfied that Congress, when they were making these appropriations, acted with pure and patriotic motives, and for the best interest of the country, as they believed.

Under these considerations, the appropriations were made. But it seems extraordinary that the State of Illinois, or as far as I am informed, none of the Western States, received one cent of these appropriations.

I am not so inconsiderate as to expect an expenditure of money in the State of Illinois, on objects of no importance to the people, or the nation; and that merely for the sake of the disbursement of the money in the State. It would be idle and foolish in the extreme to expect it. But I would ask this House if the National road be not a legitimate object? It is of such character and importance, that the General Government ought to be bound to notice it. If there be a national improvement in this Union, it stands foremost in their front ranks. The Cumberland road is, therefore, a fit subject on which to equalize the expenditures and disbursements of the public money.

These are facts on which I ask the sober and serious consideration of the House. Upwards of thirty millions of dollars are expended in the United States, and of all that great sum of money, not one cent was disbursed in our State on the Cumberland road, or on any other improvement. We want in Illinois what the lawyers call a retorno habendo of some of this public money.

I am sorry I used this expression, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIDDLE,] dislikes so much to hear, what he calls, "scraps of dog latin." I agree with him in this. I dislike it also, and will not use it again.

It will be considered that the State of Illinois, with the other Western States, pay considerable of this money into the public Treasury by means of the purchase of the public lands. Every dollar that can be raised in our State is paid into the land offices, and they are expended in other sections of the Union. None is returned on the national road, or otherwise. The Government drains the country of money, and will not disburse any in it again, if this improvement be not continued.

In taking this general and hasty view of this subject, it seems to me to be just and proper, that the national road should be continued. There can exist no doubt in the mind of any one that is not national, and of great importance to the whole Union, and particular to the Western States. And there is as little doubt in my mind, that the good faith and character of the nation are pledged to continue this great and important work. Compacts entered into by the General Government with the new States, require its completion, and the public utility of the improvement itself, more than any other consideration, demands its continuation and final completion.

I may add, further, that the new States are prevented from raising a revenue, in the ordinary mode of taxation, and thereby they are deprived of the means and resources necessary to complete this road.

My friend on the right [Mr. PICKENS] was very anxious to have this subject laid on the table. He is, generally, a very liberal and accommodating gentleman; yet his course, in this instance, seemed to form an exception to his general character. He thinks the measure is brought forward a great deal too soon. The objections of gentlemen reminds me of those of a certain man in the West, who was very lazy, and therefore disliked to plant his corn. When urged by his neighbors to do so necessary and important a work, he would first cry, "it's too soon, it's too soon," and afterwards, when the season was so far advanced that he could not say this with any face, he would cry, "it's too late, it's too late;" so his corn was never planted.

This will be the case with many of these too soon gentlemen; they will not at any time, early or late, vote for this measure.

I would appeal to every member of experience in this House to sustain me in saying that there is such a scramble for the priority of business, that little is done towards the close of a session. It requires more phisical strength of body and lungs than any other qualification, for the successful prosecution of business in the House at the end of the session. Would that be the time to risk such an important appropriation? I would be fearful about the end of the session the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] would think it too late.

Some object to the instructions to the committee, that the inquiry ought to be "into the expediency." This mode of proceeding had in it no efficiency or force, and would amount to nothing at all. There is nothing in this course disrespectful to the committee. If it goes at all to the committee, it would have with it the voice of the House, which will give to it respectability.

After a bill is reported to the House, time will be given for examination and discussion. It cannot be hurried through the House into a law, without the due and necessary time for deliberation, and reflection. In every point of view in which I am capable of examining this measure, I am satisfied it ought to receive the favorable action of this Government, as it has done for the last thirty years. I hope and trust it will.

REMARKS OF MR. BROWN,
OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN SENATE, THURSDAY, JAN. 30, 1840.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the select committee, to which had been referred the resolution of Mr. BENTON, adverse to the resumption of the debts of the States, submitted a report in conformity thereto.

A motion was made to print this report, which was opposed, and the doctrines of the report denounced, by Messrs. CRITTENDEN, SMITH of Indiana, and SOUTHARD, and briefly advocated by Messrs. GRUNDY, BENTON, and BROWN.

Mr. BROWN rose to say a very few words, in reply to some of the observations which had fallen from gentlemen who had addressed the Senate, in opposition to the report and resolutions then under consideration. In what he was about to say, it was not his purpose to enter into a defence of the committee, against the severe animadversions which had been cast on them, for the manner in which they had deemed it proper to discharge the duties assigned them. He would leave that task with those to whom it more appropriately belonged, and who were, in every respect, so entirely competent to their own vindication.

The object which he had more particularly in view, was to notice the extraordinary arguments which had been resorted to, for the purpose of perverting the true character and objects of the report, by gentlemen in opposition to it, and the dexterous attempts which had been made to sophisticate the whole question, in order to present it in an aspect before the country totally different from that which in reality belonged to it.

The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] whose example had been followed by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. SOUTHARD,] had denounced it as an unauthorized interference with the rights of the States, and as calculated to destroy their credit, and bring about general embarrassment and pecuniary distress in the country. And, in the first place, he would ask how did it invade or affect, in the slightest degree, the rights of the States? Had the committee recommended any measure, or proposed any action, by which their rights were to be assailed? No, said Mr. B. nothing of the kind has been proposed by them, but a proposition directly the reverse of it. A proposition of inaction is recommended for the adoption of the Senate, by which, as a branch of the Legislative Department of the Government, it declares its unwillingness to an assumption of the State debts by the Federal Government.

So far, therefore, from invading or interfering with the rights of the States, its tendency was to protect them against the application of the public money, by this Government, to a purpose clearly unconstitutional, and which, if carried out into practice, would convert our federative system into a consolidated despotism. In other words, it opposes that scheme, which, with many other ingenious contrivances peculiar to the present day, has resulted from the modern credit system, and which seeks to obtain the aid of legislative authority to plunder the proceeds of honest labor and industry, and to transfer them to the possession of those who are not entitled to them.

But it has been alleged that the reference which has been made by the committee to the debts due from the different States, is an improper interference with the rights of the States. And from whom does this doctrine come? From a political party who advocate the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States, which is but an indirect mode of assuming the State debts—from a political party, who vote to apply the public money to works of internal improvement on the soil of the States, and who have, under the policy of the American system, assumed to control and regulate the labor and industry of the people of this country.

It is very clear, said Mr. B. if these extensive powers claimed by gentlemen in regard to appropriating the public money be correct, that the power to assume the State debts by the same course of reasoning equally exists—a measure, the intention to bring forward which has already been announced in the other end of the Capitol, and which there is too much reason to apprehend will be pressed upon the consideration of Congress at a day not distant, by a powerful combination of political and pecuniary interests, acting in concert, to render the Government subservient to its purposes.

The very doctrine, therefore, that gentlemen contend for, in regard to distributing the public moneys arising from the sales of the public lands among the States, is essentially a recognition of the principle of assumption by the Federal Government. If, therefore, gentlemen advocate a doctrine which, to a certain extent, contemplates an assumption of State debts, and which will be probably followed by a still more extensive system, they surely ought not to complain that the Senate should inquire into the magnitude of the debts which they are thus to be led, step by step, to assume. This course results from the very doctrines of gentlemen themselves, and if there has been any inquiry into the pecuniary liabilities of the States, it has been invited by those who, on this floor, advocate measures that, if carried into effect, are but the commencement of a system of assumption of State debts by the Government of the United States.

It was true that gentlemen who had spoken in opposition to the report and resolutions, had disavowed the intention to support an assumption of the State debts, and had expressed their concurrence in the conclusions to which the committee has come in opposition to such a system of policy. If gentlemen were really sincere in their declarations—and it was not for him to question their sincerity—he must be allowed to express his surprise at their earnest opposition to the adoption of the resolutions.

The Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from New Jersey had denounced the course of the committee as tending to injure the credit of the States which were already indebted, together with those which had authorized loans that were yet to be effected, and had predicted that the adoption of the resolutions would produce a rapid decline in the price of State stocks, and would be followed by general pecuniary distress and bankruptcy. What had the committee said in their report, to justify such apprehension? They had not, in the most remote manner, called into question the entire ability of the States to redeem all the obligations which they had incurred. They had referred to the amount due from them, to show the magnitude of the sum which the Federal Government would have to assume, if it embarked in a scheme so mischievous and unconstitutional. Why this timid sensibility on the part of gentlemen, because this subject had been referred to? Did they suppose that the mere mention of the amounts due from States—amounts which were annually made public by the States themselves—could in any degree affect their credit? Gentlemen had not properly distinguished between great wealthy and flourishing States, whose credit rested on solid foundations, and banking corporations, whose capital was often fictitious.

If, said Mr. B. the credit of the indebted States is affected at all, it will be not by any thing that the committee has said in their report, but by the extravagant declaration of bankruptcy and distress, which gentlemen themselves had indulged in. They had indirectly impugned the credit of the indebted States, themselves, by asserting that a simple annunciation of this body, that it would not consent to assume their debts, would tend to discredit them. He believed, himself, that the credit of the States rested on no such precarious ground, and that they were both able and willing to meet their engagements.

Mr. B. said that, so far from perceiving any thing in the course of the committee to censure, he saw that in it which should command entire approbation. They had exhibited, with an ability which did them great credit, the pernicious consequences that would result to the country from the assumption of the State debts—a measure which he would say, if it should be at any time adopted, would not only be fraught with incalculable mischief to the country, but would prove dangerous to the existence of the Union itself.

SPEECH OF MR. JOHNSON,

OF MARYLAND,

In the House of Representatives, December 19, 1839—

After Mr. WISE concluded his main speech on the subject of the right of the New Jersey members to the seats claimed by them, at the end of which he had moved the Previous Question on a pending proposition—

Mr. WILLIAM COST JOHNSON said that he had given notice to the House this morning, when he withdrew his point of order, that he should take the earliest moment to renew it. He would read it again for the information of the House.

"The Speaker of this House is bound by the laws of the United States to administer the oath of office to each member who presents himself and has a regular certificate of election, attested in conformity with the laws of New Jersey and the Constitution of the United States."

[Several members here rose to a point of order, by stating that the motion for the previous question was not debatable.]

The SPEAKER decided that the previous question admitted of a limited debate, but not, however, so as to touch the merits of the main question.

Mr. JOHNSON said that he maintained that his question was one of privilege—a question always in order—one of the highest dignity, and rode over every other question.

The CHAIR said that he was reluctant to interpose, but felt bound to enforce the general parliamentary law.

[Much confusion ensued, and many members rose to points of order.]

Mr JOHNSON said that he had not yielded the floor, and that he could effect his purpose as well by raising a point of order in a varied form, which he had reduced to writing, and would now send to the Chair, and withdraw his first:

"A motion to take the previous question is not in order until rules for the government of the House are adopted; nor while there are members of Congress who desire to be sworn in.

Mr. JOHNSON maintained that a motion for the previous question was wholly inadmissible in the present incomplete organization of the House. No rules had yet been adopted for its organization. The previous question was unknown to the old parliamentary laws. It was a refinement of modern usage, and always a tyrannical exercise of power which a majority would use, and most frequently abuse, to oppress a minority. Rather than a rule of the general parliamentary law, it was an exception to the general law, and therefore could not be rightfully enforced in the present condition of the House. But he did not rest this point of order wholly on the inadmissibility of the motion for the previous question; but the point, he humbly conceived, could not be contested, that no business could be done, no question whatever could be taken, when there were members waiting ready to be sworn in. This was a question which went to the Constitution and the laws of the United States. No arbitrary rules of this body, or of the general parliamentary law, could be quoted to overthrow an institution which some of the members had sworn to support.

Mr. J. feared that John Randolph had spoken too truly when, with his sagacious mind, he had penetrated the future, by judging of the past, and said that the time was not distant when a member of Congress would be called to order for referring to the Constitution of the United State. What was prophecy is now sad reality and truth.

He maintained that it was incompetent for the House to consider any proposition whilst there were members waiting ready to be sworn.

[Several members here rose to points of order.]

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Tennessee, said that, to relieve his friend [Mr. JOHNSON] from the repeated interruptions of some members, he would move that he be permitted to proceed.

The SPEAKER then put the question; which was carried by a large vote without a division.

Mr JOHNSON resumed, and said that he returned his most cordial acknowledgments to the House for their manifestation of respect, and should not abuse their kindness by a long speech. The petty interruptions which he had received had annoyed the House quite as much as they had him. He saw how uneasy some gentlemen were when he alluded to the Constitution which they had sworn on the holy Word of God to support. His purpose was less to address the House than to address the Speaker, but he hoped he would have the attention of all.

Mr. JOHNSON said that he maintained that the resolution and motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] was wholly out of order and inadmissible; that, by the long and uniform usage of the House, by the laws of the States, by the laws of the United States, and by the Constitution of the United States, the Speaker, he insisted, was bound to swear in all members who came to him to be sworn bearing evidence in conformity with the laws of their own States that they had been duly elected as Representatives in this House; that the Speaker had no discretion in this matter, under the high obligations he had assumed to the House, to the Constitution, and to the country, which he [Mr. J.] would endeavor to demonstrate.

He said that, before he would proceed to give his reasons for the position which he had assumed, he would take occasion to say that he wished to impute nothing improper to the course which the Speaker had taken. It was well known to him (Mr. J.) that the Speaker had been called unexpectedly to preside over this House. The thought of being elected had perhaps not occurred to him or his friends until the day before his election. Called thus suddenly to discharge the high and important duties of that station, it could not be expected that he would be at once and ever ready to decide upon all the various questions and duties which would intervene in his multifarious and arduous labors.

Then, so far from censuring the Speaker for not having at once administered the oath of office to all the six members of the New Jersey delegation who presented themselves to be qualified, it was perhaps a mark of prudence and of wisdom for him to have paused, as he did, and to ask of the experience of the House what would be the course of propriety and of duty in this juncture of affairs. It was wise in this, at least: it gave him time to hear the views of others, and to allow the Speaker to examine the question for his final determination.

He did not understand the Speaker to say that he would take no action but what the House would indicate; but that his opinion was, that they should be sworn in, and that he would not have hesitated had it not been that the members of the House had voted on the question before they were organized, and that he now asked them what he should do.

Such a course is regular, precedented, and parliamentary. A Speaker, upon a vexed question of order, often refers to the House, oftener, perhaps, to experienced members, for their views, or to ask for precedents to guide his course. Nor is it unusual for judges on the bench to ask of the bar their recollection of the law, or the particulars of some former decison of the Court. So far as the rules of the House on points of order under the rules may be brought into question, it can never be unwise in the Speaker to refer the question of doubt to the solution of the House by its vote; for the rules are made by the House, and subject to its alteration as well as decision. But, so far as the present question is involved, he humbly conceived it one not for the action of the House at present, but for the deliberation and execution of the Speaker. It is a question of higher dignity than a question of parliamentary form and law; it is a question involving the Constitution, the laws of Congress, the laws of New Jersey—a question which goes to the very basis and foundation of the Government.

That the Chair should desire to listen to a discussion on the question, under the circumstances, in order to hear expounded the law for his final decision, he should most cordially commend; but this House has no power to make a law for the case, nor can it expound, in the present case, the law; nor can the Speaker be relieved from the discharge of his duties, however responsible or unpleasant they may be, however much confidence he may have in a majority of this House, by asking a vote of this House upon a question, not of the rules, but a question who shall be sworn in under the law, which law is beyond the reach and counter-influence of this House, which is only a co-ordinate and co-operating branch of the Government, and cannot make laws without the concurrence of the Senate and of the President of the United States. Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. J.) you have been elected Speaker of this House by a majority of voices. You have been sworn into office by one of its members, [Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina.] The House elected you, it is true; but did the House decide that the Speaker should take an oath, and that a member should administer that oath to him? No, sir; it was a higher authority. The Constitution says you shall take an oath; the law of Congress defines the language of that oath, and that any member may administer it to you. Then, the moment that the Speaker is elected, and the oath of office is administered to him, he rises above the dignity of a simple member, and becomes an Executive officer of the Government for many purposes, armed with all the powers of the law and is bound to discharge the high and sacred trusts reposed in him by the law and the Constitution. The first Executive duty he has to discharge is to swear in all the members. If it should be asked who are members, the answer is of easy solution: those who have the credentials of their State, made out according to the laws of their State, as authorized by the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution and the laws will not authorize him to go behind the certificate made out in due form, with all the solemn sanctions of the law.

Are their seats contested, let those contesting them petition this House after it is organized. Is their claim a strong one, and one which can be quickly settled, refer it to the Committee of Elections; for, why have this House always heretofore organized a Committee of Elections, if nothing is to be referred to it, and if the House, before being fully organized, decide all contested elections without evidence of any kind? If the members who have been sworn in are not entitled to their seats, and the case is of easy solution, they can report in a few hours, or in a few days, and then this House can resolve itself into its high judicial capacity, and vote them in, if they have better claims than those whom you first swore in. Is the case one of difficult solution, the Committee of Elections can have the polls purged, the election returns examined; the State is represented in the mean time, and her other interests protected; and, when all the facts are made clear, the committee can report the result of their investigation and deliberation, and the House can then take order on the subject, with all the facts of the question before them. The law makes the duty of administering the oath of office imperative upon the Speaker, after he has been sworn in. It says, he "shall" administer the oath to "all" the members present.

The first clause of the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution declares that—

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may, at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

The first clause of the sentence is now the active principle of the law, Congress never having passed a general law on the subject. In the absence of any general law, the law of New Jersey becomes the rule, the living law of the land, as much so as if it were really a part of the Constitution itself. For, in the absence of any general law of Congress, the Constitution would become inoperative and a dead letter, had not the States passed laws, in conformity with the provision of the Constitution, regulating "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Represenatives."

By the law of New Jersey, enacted to carry out this provision in the Constitution, which was in force when the claiming members received their certificates, it is declared in the fifth section that—"The Governor, or person administering the Government, and Privy Council, shall also determine the six persons who have the greatest number of votes from the whole State for Representatives in Congress of the United States from this State; which six persons, the Governor or person administering the Government, shall forthwith commission, under the great seal of the State, to represent this State in the House of Representative of the Congress of the United States."

Mr. J. said that he would ask if it was in the power of human language to be more explicit—to express more clearly than the language of this law does who are the members from New Jersey? It is possible that there can be a mist or a shadow of doubt in the mind of any individual who are the members that should be sworn in?

If the law had named the individuals, their identity would not be more easy of recognition than those pointed out in the law who have the certificate of election under the great seal of the State. Has any one doubted the validity of this law? Has any one doubted the authenticity of the certificates which have been presented by the members from New Jersey? He would answer no. No one has made even an insinuation of doubt. Are not the certificates of the five members precisely like Mr. RANDOLPH's who has been sworn in? Where is the law which allows the Speaker to go behind the certificate? Where is the law which authorizes him to appeal from himself to a majority of this partially formed House—this inchoate body? I have searched in vain for such a law.

I have looked in vain for even a precedent. Where is the law which allows the Speaker to discriminate between two certificates precisely alike in every particular, to swear in one, and hesitate to administer the oath to the other? But the first law passed by the first Congress, after they had a quorum, was a law regulating the oath of office, and who should administer it. On the 7th page of the Journal of the first Congress, April 6, 1789, the following order was made:

"Ordered, That leave be given to bring in a bill to regulate the taking the oath or affirmation prescribed by the sixth article of the Constitution, and that Mr. White, Mr. Madison, Mr. Trumbull, Mr. Gilman, and Mr. Cadwalader do prepare and bring in the same."

The sixth article of the Constitution declares that—

"The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State Legislatures, and all Executive and Judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution; but no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States."

I will read the first part of the second section of the act passed to carry out the provisions of this article of the Constitution. It stands first on the statute book, and is entitled—

"AN ACT to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths.

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the oath or affirmation required by the sixth article of the Constitution of the United States shall be administered in the form following, to wit: 'I, A B, do solemnly swear, or affirm, (as the case may be,) that I will support the Constitution of the United States.' The said oath or affirmation shall be administered within three days after the passing of this act by any one member of the Senate to the President of the Senate, and by him to all the members, and to the Secretary, and by the Speaker of the House of Representatives to all the members who have not taken a similar oath, by virtue of a particular resolution of the said House, and to the Clerk: And in the case of the absence of any members from the service of either House, at the time prescribed for taking the said oath or affirmation, the same shall be administered to such member when he shall appear to take his seat.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That at the first session of Congress after every general election of Representatives, the oath or affirmation aforesaid shall be administered by any one member of the House of Representatives to the Speaker, and by him to all the members present, and to the Clerk, previous to entering on any other business, and to the members who shall afterwards appear, previous to taking their seats."

What can be more mandatory, what more positive and unequivocal, than the language of this law? After the Speaker shall have been sworn in by a member, he shall administer the oath to all the members present previous to entering of any other business, and to those who afterwards appear, previous to their taking their seats.

Where in this law is any discretion left with the Speaker to postpone the discharge of this positive injunction? Where is any allusion made to the opinion of the House in its informal state, or its quasi organization, or in its full and complete organization? This is the binding, existing, paramount law of the land, and no vote by any majority of this House can either take from or add to its source. No vote of this body can add to or lessen the obligations enjoined upon the Speaker by this plain and important statue law.

No one now doubts its constitutionality. At the time of its passage there were some slight doubts raised, as will be found in Elliot's and Lloyd's Debates. I will read a few sentences from Judge Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, pege 704. The distinguished commentator says:

"As soon as the Constitution went into operation, Congress passed an act prescribing the time and manner of taking the oath or affirmation thus required, as well by officers of the several States as of the United States. On that occasion some scruple seems to have been entertained, by a members, of the constitutional authority of Congress to pass such an act. But it was approved without much opposition. At this day, the point would generally be deemed beyond the reach of any reasonable doubt."

The question of its constitutionality is at rest; no one debates its binding force. This House can have no power to resist its execution, as it has been executed by every Speaker who has preceded you from the formation of the present Government to the present meeting of the members of this House.

With a knowledge of this plain law, which points out (as Mr. J. humbly conceived) the line of duty as plainly as if it were written with Promethean fire, can a justification be urged for its not being promptly executed, that a vote of a part of the members elected to Congress constituted themselves into an informal House of Congress, and by a tie vote declared that the five New Jersey members should not take their seats, because that informal assemblage of members were guilty of a usurpation of power and a direct violation of the Constitution and the laws of the United States? Will such wanton conduct relieve the Speaker from his duty to the country?

The informal body that gave that vote were not acting under oath, and were violating the law of the United States in attempting to either vote members in or out of their places; for the law of 1789 expressly declares that the Speaker shall administer the oath "to all the members present previous to entering on any other business; and to the members who shall afterwards appear previous to taking their seats."

So far as the informal body acted in order to extricate itself from the difficulty in which the vile profligacy of the Clerk had placed it, it was legitimate, because it was necessary for its very existence. So far as it proceeded to place itself in a condition to elect a Speaker, and to do nothing more, it was necessary and gravely important. But every act beyond that was usurpation, which outraged the law of the nation. The Clerk violated his duty in not following the established usages of the House in reading the list of members who had a certificate of election according to law. There is no positive law of the land which makes him the presiding officer of the House on its organization; it is usage—usage established under the old Confederated Congress. I find in the second volume of the Congress of 1777, page 305, that when President Hancock took leave of Congress, the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That the Secretary officiate as President until a new choice is made."

The Secretary's list gives no positive right to a member to a seat. It is only called in order to furnish evidence that the members are in attendance. It is the certificate of election under the law, with all the solemnities of the law, that is evidence, and which alone is evidence, and which cannot be rightfully rejected upon the organization of the House. The Clerk well knew what had occurred in the case of Moore and Letcher, for it was well known that the then Clerk of the House placed the name of Moore on his list, although his certificate was informal and imperfect, by which he offended two members, friends of Mr. Letcher, who did not vote for him, by which he lost his re-election. The present Clerk, less honest, saw this question, not as a faithful officer, but as one who knew he would get his daily bread—and that was reason enough for him—by refusing to call the five members who had certificates of election, and that he would thereby secure his re-election, and subserve the political purposes of his party.

But how stands the question so far as the members whose seats are not contested have given an opinion in the mere informal organization of the House? By a unanimous vote they have declared that the contesting members are not entitled to the seats. That is a negative pregnant, and amounts to a direct affirmation that they believe, although they will not avow it, that other claimants are entitled to all the rights and privileges of their places. They have, by a tie vote, giving no opinion in relation to the members who have the regular certificates of election. And, it is well known to you and to all of us, that, had Mr. HAWES, of Kentucky, been in his seat at the time, he would have voted in the affirmative. Then you have the assurance, in the first place, that the members are unanimous in the opinion that the contesting members should not be sworn in, and you have a majority of the members who believe that the other five should be.

The only argument (said Mr. J.) which I have heard urged with any serious earnestness in the House before you were elected was, that, if the members who had the certificates were allowed to vote, a Speaker might be elected by their votes, and that afterwards it might possibly appear, upon examination of the election returns and of the whole case, that the other gentleman would be entitled to the seats.

The Speaker has been elected without their votes. Now, the argument is, that because members voted once to reject them wrongfully and in violation of law, and without having the oath of office administered, they must vote to reject them again. The morality of which is, that the latter outrage is justified by the former, and the essence of the logic is, that two wrongs will make one right.

Mr J. maintained that a more direct assault never was made upon the Constitution and the laws than the vote excluding the five New Jersey delegates. As ample as are the powers of the House of Lords of England, the members of this House have outstripped them in exercising power. When sitting in judgment, the peers do not give their decision on oath, as do the members of the House of Commons, but simply on honor. But every peer is bound to take the oaths prescribed by the laws of England, before he takes his seat. "Any peer voting before he has taken the oaths, renders his whole property liable to forfeiture." But a portion of the members of this House, with the imperative law of the United States before them, with the Constitution which enjoins an oath, and with the usage of all the civilized and Christian world which requires public functionaries to forbear to decide upon the rights and interests of others, without the fear of Heaven, in the most solemn form presented to them, and in the form of an oath, have evicted five members from their seats; and members from a State which furnishes her opinions in times past as well as present, that she requires an oath, not only of those whom she may appoint to represent her interest, but from all who may either directly or indirectly have to pronounce upon any matter touching her welfare as a member of this great Republican Confederacy. I will (said Mr. J.) read her opinions in her own language from the book I hold in my hand.

[Mr. RIVES here called Mr. JOHNSON to order.]

Mr. JOHNSON said that his evil genius had risen behind him to haunt him once more with his confused points of order.

Mr. J. resumed his remarks, and was about to read from the Journal of the old Congress, when

Mr. ATHERTON said he would call the gentleman from Maryland [M. JOHNSON] to order; he was wandering from the true line of debate.

Mr. JOHNSON replied that the gentleman had twice called him to order. The first time he had proffered the impatient member one of the books before him to read whilst he was progressing in his remarks to the CHAIR; but the gentlemen had thought fit to call him to order again. He must now be allowed to say, with becoming and profound sincerity to that distinguished member, that he did not adopt him entirely as his standard for taste or his model in debate; it was his misfortune and his fault. That learned and logical member argued as with intuitive induction; he [Mr. J.] sometimes reasoned by analogy. He had not, and he greived most sadly for it, that elegant and happy facility of giving language to his thoughts with that inimitable perspicacity which distinguishes the learned member from New Hampshire. He had often listened with perfect rhapsody, as had the House on many occasions, to the brilliant displays of the learned member. The gentleman had the most rare talent to collect all the resources of his gifted and richly cultivated mind, and embody them, with a facility peculiar to himself alone, in one elegant and sonorous sentence; and that sentence was—order, order.

After this explanation, which Mr. J. hoped would be satisfactory, he trusted he might be allowed to proceed without further interruption.

The paper which he was about to read was to be found in the Secret Journals of the Congress of 1778, and was in the first volume, page 374. It was one of the ablest papers of that day, and he would only read that part of it which was germain to his purpose and the subject he had under consideration.

THURSDAY, June 25, 1778.

"To the United States in Congress assembled:

"The representation of the Legislative Council and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey showeth: That the articles of confederation and perpetual union between the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Deleware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, proposed by the honorable the Congress of the said States, severally, for their consideration, have been by us fully and attentively considered; on which we beg leave to remark as follows:

"1. In the fifth article, where, among other things, the qualifications of the delegates from the several States are described, there is no mention of any oath, test, or declaration to be taken or made by them previous to their admission to seats in Congress. It is, indeed, to be presumed that the respective States will be careful that the delegates they send to assist in managing the general interest of the Union take the oath to the Government from which they derive their authority; but, as the United States, collectively considered, have interests, as well as each particular State, we are of opinion that some test or obligation, binding upon each delegate while he continues in the trust, to consult and pursue the former as well as the latter, and particularly to assent to no vote or proceeding which may violate the general confederation, is necessary. The laws and usages of all civilized nations evince the propriety of an oath on such occasions; and the more solemn and important the deposite, the more strong and explicit ought the obligation to be."

Many of the framers of the Constitution were members of the Congress before whom the remonstrance of New Jersey was read and considered, and hence, very likely, that clause in the Constitution which enjoins upon members to take an oath or affirmation. And hence, too, most likely, that clause in the law of 1789 which enjoins upon the "Speaker" to administer the oath "to all the members present, and to the Clerk, previous to entering on any other business, and to the members who shall afterwards appear previous to taking their seats." The law of Congress adopts almost the very language of New Jersey. New Jersey that had thus early tried to protect her rights, to plant round herself, as it were, safeguards with all the binding force of law, and the solemn influence of religion, is the first victim on which this first infraction of the law has fallen. She sends her delegates here with all the authority of her law, with all that is required by any existing binding law, and you spurn them from the Hall. What higher proof can she give than the credential made out in conformity to her laws, impressed with her great seal of State? I will not (said Mr. J.) discuss her great seal. I will not inquire if a new one is made upon the election of every Governor. I will not ask if it is six inches in diameter, like the great seal of England, and, like that, is cut into four pieces upon every accession to the Throne, and placed in the Tower, and a new one of silver formed. These inquiries I will leave for the curious. Sufficient for us to know that it is the highest proof of her will, it is the most solemn evidence of her sovereign authority. It should every where be evidence both of her will and her authority.

When was the power of the great seal of a State questioned before? Go where you will but to this House, and it will not be disputed. Go to the courts of law, its presence will of itself speak its power.

I will refer to authority, for I fear argument will be less convincing.

In Baldwin's Reports, page 78, in the case of the United States vs. Wilson and Porter, in the Circuit Court of the United States, it was decided that "A pardon granted by a Governor of a State, under its great seal, is evidence, per se, without any further proof."

With all the investigation which has been bestowed, not a single case has been presented where the individual who has the legal evidence of his election has not been allowed to occupy his seat until the particulars of the election could be investigated. Not a single case can be found in this country or in England.

I will read a case from Jacob, which has not been read, and which meets the question before the House, and before you, Mr. Speaker, in every particular:

"In 1640, it was ordered (by the House of Commons) that where some are returned by the sheriff, or such other officer, as by law hath power to return, and others returned by private hands, (as has been done here,) in such case those returned by the sheriff, or other officer, shall sit until the election is quashed by the House."

What stronger proofs can be offered? What mind, unless it is predetermined, can hesitate a moment in declaring that the members from New Jersey who have the certificates should instantly be sworn in?

Mr. J. said he would not appeal to the members of this House, for he apprehended it would be useless. He could not appeal to those who, on former occasions, had so loudly advocated the rights of those who held the certificate of election, and who had so suddenly, on this occasion, reversed their former positions: it were useless. Nor would he appeal to some who were always dwelling on State rights. No; he would not; for State rights had become, with many, a catchword—they used it most when they most abused it. State rights would be (he said) in a deplorable condition if they rested upon some of their professed friends for support. He would not speak of the motives of any member, for it was neither his privilege nor his right to do so. He would, however, state that he generally adopted the rule laid down by Junius in his letter to the Rev. Mr. Horne: "To judge of the integrity of men by their conduct, and not by their professions." But he would say, if the New Jersey members were not received promptly as the Representatives—the ministers of their State—she could well consider herself as expelled from the Union, and she would have a perfect right to withdraw all connection from the Government. She would have a perfect right to send her agents to negotiate elsewhere. Had such treatment been inflicted on some of the states of the Union in times not long past, such would have been the result. But it is you, Mr. Speaker, that we look, to prevent this injustice to New Jersey, this infraction of the laws. You derive your power, Mr Speaker, on the subject, (he would repeat again,) not from this House, but from the law. The House but elects you. The law invests you with power, and power to execute the law. This House may elect you, as it has elected a President of the United States. He does not, for that reason, appeal to this body to ask its opinion upon his duties. He appeals to the Constitution and the laws as the rule of his conduct. The Constitution and the laws have defined your duties. The law—not this House—says you shall swear in the members who present themselves to be sworn in. The New Jersey members have presented themselves. I am authorized from them to say that they are now ready to receive the oath from you. The Constitution, the law of the United States, and the law of New Jersey, are for the time suspended. You can give them vitality and action. And I repeat, that the law of Congress, made in pursuance of the Constitution, and to carry the provision of the Constitution into full force, and the law of New Jersey, made, also, in pursuance of the Constitution and by its authority, to give it efficiency, are as binding upon you and the members of this House as if they had been written in the Constitution itself, and had been made a part of that organic law.

Mr. J. said that in concluding his remarks, which he had extended, he feared, to too great length, he would say that if the Speaker viewed this subject in the same light in which he did, he would not longer hesitate to administer the oath to the members from New Jersey. He hoped that the Speaker would calmly examine the law and its philosophy, and relieve the House from this protracted discussion. The unprecedented condition in which the House had been placed, and the country, required of the Speaker to exercise, rigidly and fearlessly, all the powers with which the Constitution and the laws had invested him. Say to the New Jersey members, come forward and receive the oath. Hold up to the country the laws and the universal usage, and you will receive the thanks of the nation. You will receive the respect and admiration, in a little while, of those who are now prejudiced by the warmth of partisan feelings. They will, in their calmer moments, be as ready as any to justify and commend the act.

Swear them in before the House take a vote on the question. If this question is decided not by the law and the usage, but by a vote of this House, the example will be mischievous, the precedent will be fraught with permanent and abiding evil. It will open a door in times to come, when parties are excited, and the nation convulsed, which will easily lead to the total overthrow of the Constitution and the Government. The crisis now requires moral fortitude, a firm and fearless reliance on the laws of the nation.

Sir, (said Mr. J.) when but a few years ago the question of nullification was extending from the South to the North, fast, wide, and wildly, many politicians, some with pure, others with designing motives, caused a dinner to be given in this city to forward the feeling, and to commit President Jackson to the doctrine. When, by the previous concert of a few leaders, toast after toast was offered, speech after speech was made from able men selected for the purpose from various points of the Union, when the feeling seemed to be spreading with electric contagion, when all eyes were directed to Gen. Jackson with the confidence of ardent hope, it was at that moment that he rose, with a firm and noble grandeur, and proclaimed amidst his devoted friends, "The Union—it must and shall be perserved." There was a moral sublimity in the act, which gave us much lustre to his character as his proud victory at New Orleans.

Administer the oath to the New Jersey Representatives, for you alone possess the power and the right, and you will heal the breach which has been made in the Constitution and the laws. Do this duty firmly and quickly, and (Mr. J. said) my life on it, the warm greetings of your magnanimous constituents will thank you, every friend of the Constitution every where will thank you, posterity will thank you.

SPEECH OF MR. ADAMS,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

In the House of Representatives, Wednesday, December 20, 1839—After a long and somewhat stormy preliminary dispute on questions of order, and the priority of business—

Mr. ADAMS rose and addressed the House nearly in the following words. It is not my intention to trespass upon the patience of the House by occupying much time. The first point to which I go is this. It is the same in substance which was made as a point of order by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. W. COST JOHNSON,] namely, that this House can proceed to no other business whatever until all its members have been sworn. I began by reading out of time, for I had reserved it for another place, this law of the United States. [Mr. A. had quoted the statute of 1789, which provides as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That at the first session of Congress after every general election of Representatives, the oath or affirmation aforesaid shall be administered by any one member of the House of Representatives to the Speaker, and by him to all the members present, and to the Clerk, previous to entering on any other business, and to the members who shall afterwards appear, previous to taking their seats.]

I say that this law is now binding, but, preceding that, there are some provisions of the Constitution to which that law applies, and to which it will be necessary for me to refer. The first is this:

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union; according to their respective numbers."

Then follows the manner in which the numbers shall be determined.

But, as I presume the words of the Constitution in this passage are in the minds of all gentleman, I will read no further, but will state that it was then declared that New Jersey should have four Representatives in this House; that a census should be taken from ten years to ten years; that each State should have a representation according to its numbers ascertained by the census; and that immediately after the last census of 1830—that is, on the 22 of May, 1832—an act was passed for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the fifth census, which provides that the House of Representatives shall BE COMPOSED of one Representative to every 47,700 persons in each State; and it goes on to specify, "that is to say"—and then follows the specific number of Representatives for each State, of which it declared that New Jersey shall have six. Now I say that the House of Representatives is not, in the sense of this act, "composed" until new Jersey have six Representatives on this floor. I set aside the act of God which has deprived my State of one of its most valuable Representatives; I set aside the act of God by which one of the Representatives from New York was prevented from attending here by a deep domestic affliction; and I set aside another act of God by which one of the members now in this city has been disabled by bodily indisposition to attend here in his place. And must I set aside another privation of five members? excluded, not by the act of God, not by the neglect of the people of New Jersey, but the arbitrary decision of less than a majority of this House, that five more gentleman who presented themselves here as five out of the six Representatives to which the law says that New Jersey shall be entitled in this House, have been virtually shut out and excluded from it. This is the Constitution. This is the law. I have read them both. The Constitution says that New Jersey is always entitled to have in this House a certain number of Representatives in proportion to her population. A law of the United States, unrepealed, and therefore still of binding force, says that after the year 1832 the House of Representatives shall be composed of a given number of Representatives, six of whom shall be from New Jersey; and I ask whether this House of Representatives is so composed? And, if it is not, whether it is a constitutional and legal House of Representatives till it shall be?

But in answer to this question it may be said, and it has been said, there are others who claim to be Representatives from New Jersey. Now the Constitution says that each House of Congress shall be the exclusive judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members; and the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] a few days ago, with extreme ingenuity, (an ingenuity which I could not help admiring, whatever other sentiment it might have occasioned in my mind,) called on us to analyze this provision, and said that in it were contained three distinct rights: first, the right of judging on the election of its members; secondly, of judging of the returns of their election; and, thirdly, of judging of their qualifications. The course of the gentleman's argument it is not necessary for me now to follow; but in this clause of the Constitution there is one word of which he took no notice, but which I now ask him to analyze, and ask this House to analyze, and that is the word JUDGE. Now, in analyzing this word judge, I propose to ask, first, what it imports, and secondly, why it was inserted. And in the first place, I say that this word "judge," as here employed in the Constitution, implies a trial, implies parties, implies a contest, implies evidence, and a law according to which the judge is to act. The Constitution of the United States has not said that the House of Representatives shall have arbitrary power to exclude or to expel any member from its Hall, and from all the rights of a member of the House. It does not say that the House shall possess the arbitrary power to do this, but it says that this House shall have power to judge. And how? Not by its mere arbitrary act; not according to the simple fiat of the majority. No. The authority conferred is a judicial authority. Now I ask, in the second place, how it has happened that such a provision is inserted here, in an instrument which is founded on the principle that the legislative, judicial, and executive powers of this Government shall be kept separate; that the legislative branch shall exercise no judicial or executive power; that the judicial branch shall exercise no executive or legislative power; and that the executive branch shall exercise no legislative or judicial power. That is the great, the high, and solemn principle on which this Constitution of the Union and all the Constitutions of the States are founded. Now, if in such an instrument we find one exception in which express judicial authority is conferred on the legislative branch of the Government, I ask, why has this been granted? Was it that this House might exercise its fancy, its caprice its party prejudice, its injustice, and thus expel any of its members at pleasure? No. The House must act a judicial capacity; it must proceed on a trial, in which there are parties, in which there is evidence, and solemn argument upon the evidence.

But there is another power conferred on this House by the Constitution, and that, I must admit, is in a considerable degree discretionary. The power is absolute in itself, and this Constitution has not said for what it shall be exercised. But when this power was given, did the authors of this instrument suppose it would be attended with no danger? Far from it. And the proof is found in the fact that, in this one instance, they dissolved that great and almost universal law which requires that legislative bodies shall decide by majorities, and have required the consent of two-thirds before this power can be exercised—I mean the power of expulsion. There must be two to one before any member can be expelled from this House. That is the caution and the guard under which alone the Constitution authorizes us to exercise a power so tremendous.

Now, then, let us for a moment inquire how this stands. In our proceedings within this Hall, when we were in an informal and unorganized state—when not a member had been sworn to the faithful performance of his official duty, less than a majority of this body, a mere tie, and that in a House not composed according to law, did decide that five members who were requisite to the composition of the House, should not be allowed to vote. What was the effect of such a decision? I say it was a virtual expulsion of those members. It was the same thing as if the House; by a simple majority, and not even that, had quoted that five of its members be expelled. Here, then, was an act done by less than a majority, for which the Constitution requires a vote of two-thirds. I say that the effect of this act of less than a majority is precisely equivalent to the expulsion quoad hoc of five members who formed a part of the composition of the House. I say it was an act which this House has no power to perform—that it was unconstitutional, illegal, null and void; and I vouch the Constitution and the laws of the United States to prove it. What is the next consequence which follows, if this be legitimate? It was this unformed, unsworn, unorganized body, not composing a House of Representatives which had in its hands a discretionary power to expel any one member who happened to be obnoxious to one-half of the members. I say, that body had no power to pass such a vote, and further I say, that this body has as little. What must be the consequence if such a doctrine be admitted? Supposing this body in its present state be a House of Representatives, which I say it is not so long as there are five members duly commissioned and claiming seats who are excluded from it—still the remainder has no power to declare that they shall not vote; it is unconstitutional. These men have the same right to vote which you or I have, or any other member of this House, and the House cannot divest them of that right. This House has no power to say A, B, C, and D, shall not vote. If it has the right to say so respecting these five New Jersey members, it may say the same respecting all others, for these stand on identically the same ground with all other gentlemen here. If you say you have a right virtually to expel them, you have the same right to expel any other member, and then we are come precisely to the case referred to yesterday by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] and the account of which he read to the House—the case of Oliver Cromwell, when, by the agency of a clerk, he excluded from the House of Commons all the members of the Parliament of England except such as he esteemed the righteous and the godly. There is not a hair's breadth between that case and ours; and the tenant of the White House may, with the help of this precedent, send down to us a minute of those who, in his opinion, are the righteous and godly members of the House of Representatives, with an order to turn out the rest.

And now to come to the position I take, namely, that the five members appearing here with credentials from the Governor of New Jersey have the same right to sit and vote with every other member of this House; and in support of that position I refer again to the Constitution, to the law, and to immemorial usage without one exception. The question as to the first right of any member of this House to take his seat, subject to a subsequent inquiry and decision by the House as judges, is founded on the evidence which he produces of his membership. And what has been this evidence? It has been such as is prescribed by the laws of the several States; in general, it is the signature of the Governor of the State; the very highest authority known in all courts throughout the world; the very highest evidence of all documentary acts. I have heard much said here about the broad seal, and gentlemen have argued about the broad seal as if its virtue was in itself: we have heard of the great seal of England having been thrown into the Thames by James II, and that the conclusion is, therefore, no credit is due to broad seals—that is the logic. But it is not the broad seal itself, it is the principle which lies under it, that is to be looked at: which, by the laws of all States and nations, renders it the highest evidence known among men. The seal itself is nothing. The power which created can change or break it at pleasure; but its admission as authentic proof of record by the universal consent of all nations; this it is which gives it value. It is a question for the States whose seal is set aside. If, by any act, you show contempt of the seal, you show contempt of the power from which it emanates, and of the law of nations. That is the principle; a principle founded in reason, founded in humanity, and necessary between nations. I hope it is not to be affected by the sinking of the broad seal of England, or its being carried away by a tyrant. In this contempt for broad seals there seems involved the principle that, whenever images or statues are held sacred, the sanctity lies in the marble and not in the god represented by it. It is not a question here how many inches, or feet, or yards, or acres, a broad seal may cover; that is not the question: but the question is, whether, by your act, you will set aside the highest evidence any State or nation can produce. It is not a question of a broad seal; but it is a question whether the sovereign State of New Jersey, speaking in its own forms of law, in the most authentic form in which it can speak, according to the laws not only of this, but of all nations, shall be buffeted and kicked out of this House. That is the question. Now, I say that, by the Constitution, by the law, and by immemorial usage, not only between the States of this Republic, but among all civilized nations, these five commissioned members have produced to you the highest proof possible of their membership, and that you cannot reject them without rejecting the evidence they have produced.

Now, it is said against all this that there is a suspicion! a suspicion of fraud. Of fraud? Where? Of fraud in the application of the broad seal? Of fraud in the evidence? Of fraud in the act of the Governor of New Jersey? No; there has not been the slightest intimation of such a thing; but behind the commission there is a certificate of one who is not a certifying officer known to the law, a certificate not sworn to, that in the election there was fraud. That is a suspicion. Well, and is there not another suspicion? Is there not a suspicion that in that very majority which he certifies, there was fraud by the admission of illegal voters? And such fraud as will change the majority? Have the gentleman's suspicions settled between these two? No. I know there is too much justice here to settle on any such induction. That is to be settled when this House comes to act as a judge the proper time and place.

[Mr. DUNCAN here interposed. Has the gentleman any allusion to me? Loud and general laughter.]

None at all. Not the least. None whatever. [Here the Hall resounded with shouts of merriment.] For my own part, I do not know which of these suspicions is founded in truth, and which not, or whether both may not be. I cannot say whether there has not been fraud in the returns, or fraud in the voters. That we are hereafter to decide in our capacity of judge, and not by the preceding will and pleasure of the House. That is a question for hereafter; but, in the meanwhile, does that suspend the right of a member to be sworn? The principle and the practice in such cases have always been to receive those bringing regular returns of election according to the Constitution and the laws, to admit them in the first instance to their seats, and then, as judges, to decide upon the whole case. I commiserate the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. DROMGOOLE,] who rummaged a large volume of contested elections, and in all that record could not find one single case which did not make directly against him, (as has since been fully proved) An authority has been read to us respecting the practice of the British Parliament from Jacob's Law Dictionary. I have a higher authority—the authority of Blackstone, speaking in his Commentary. In the chapter which speaks of the manner in which elections shall be held in England, Judge Blackstone says—

"The election being closed, the returning officer in boroughs returns his precept to the sheriff, with the persons elected by the majority; and the sheriff returns the whole, together with the writ for the county and the knights elected thereupon to the clerk of the Crown in Chancery; before the day of meeting, if it be a new Parliament, or within fourteen days after the election, if it be an occasional vacancy, and this under penalty of £500. If the sheriff does not return such knights only as are duly elected, he forfeits, by the old statutes of Henry VI, £100, and the returning officer in boroughs, for a like false return, £40. And they are besides liable to an action in which double damages shall be recovered by the latter statutes of King William, and any person bribing the returning officer shall also forfeit £300. But the members returned by him are the sitting members, until the House of Commons, upon petition, shall adjudge the return to be false and illegal."

There is the law of England. The return cannot be set aside even when the sheriff has been bribed. The sheriff is punishable for his villany both to the public and to the individual who may suffer by it; but, nevertheless, the member returned is the sitting member till the House on trial shall adjudicate the return to have been false and illegal.

Here I rest my case—the case of our five associates who have claimed to be sworn at that table, and I here challenge and openly defy any and every member of this House to point me to one single principle of the Constitution, of the law, or of immemorial usage, which shows the contrary, and gives this House iota of right to deprive the people of New Jersey of their full representation in this House.

When the New Jersey case arose more than a year ago, and that became probable which has since happened, or rather when that was most excessively apprehended which has since taken place, namely, that the election of a person to fill that Chair would depend on the exclusion of those five gentlemen from their seats, and the consequent sacrifice of their rights and of the rights of their constituents, I did conceive that there was a great question involved, to which there were two fair and equitable sides, and I came to the conclusion that this question should be adjudicated, not by caprice, not by arbitrary will or absolute power, but adjudicated according to law, before a Speaker should be chosen. I knew that this could not be done by the Constitution, by the law, or by immemorial usage; I knew that those who brought returns in legal form must be sworn and could not be turned out of their seats but by the adjudication of this House; and I saw at the same time how inconvenient, if not impossible, it would be for the House to spare the necessary time for the citation of the parties, for the examination of evidence, for solemn argument, and that entire process which rightfully belongs to a court of justice, and is necessary to a judgment in conformity with truth. I saw that very plainly; so did others, and I offered a resolution with a view to see whether this painful extremity could not be avoided. I believe a gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CRAIG] has offered the same or a similar resolution since we met.

[Mr. CRAIG. The resolution I offered was the very same verbatim et literatim.]

The resolution is now useless as respects this case, since the election of Speaker has been decided; and here I must be permitted to say that it seems, as if by a retributive act of Providence, that election has been decided precisely as it would have been if the five excluded New Jersey members had been admitted. Neither of the two great political parties into which this House is divided was able to carry its own candidate, and a gentleman has been placed in the Chair who would have been placed in it in that case, but with five more votes in his favor. Having a very high idea of the agency of Providence in drawing good from evil, I have not been able to avoid some suspicion that this is a retributive Providence on us for the great waste of time which has here taken place to no useful end whatever; for, after all the violent struggle having for its ultimate object the filling of that Chair, the self-same individual has been brought into it as would have been brought there if all the commissioned members of the House had been allowed to vote, and there had been no trampling on Constitution, law, and immemorial usage. But the principle of my resolution was, and of the gentleman's resolution from Virginia is, in my opinion——

[Here Mr. ADAMS was interrupted by Mr. F. THOMAS, of Maryland, who made a point of order, the discussion of which occupied the House for more than an hour, but which terminated in Mr. ADAMS being permitted to proceed.]

Mr. ADAMS proceeded. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, and somewhat surprised, that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr THOMAS] should be so excessively uneasy at the few observations I have submitted, and that he should be so apprehensive as to the few which still remain to be made; and that he has thought proper to consume so much time upon what I consider to be an exceedingly frivolous question. As to the first part of the motion made by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. W. C. JOHNSON,] namely, whether the previous question is now in order or not, I have nothing to say. The subject is too small, too trifling, for me to consume time upon it. What I speak to is the second part of the motion. It is that which makes the point that, until the members from New Jersey are sworn, this House can, by the Constitution and laws, proceed to no other business. I say I was in order in speaking to that part of the motion, and that I can speak to it. Of course therefore, when the gentlemen from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] moved that I have leave to proceed in order, according to his views of "in order," his motion was substantially that I should be gagged. If I am to proceed according to his notions of "in order," I had better take my seat, and say nothing. I am exceedingly happy that the House has come to the conclusion to hear me, and I will not abuse its indulgence by occupying very much more of its attention.

In the course of this discussion, it has appeared that it is exceedingly objectionable to some gentlemen here to hear appeals made to the Constitution and laws, and immemorial usage, for the purpose of securing to the people of the United States their right to a representation in this House. I can readily conceive that these are grating sounds on the ears of some gentlemen, and that to hear them once is enough; but to hear them time after time, as I think they ought, until they hear their effect, that is still more disagreeable, disgusting, and tedious. I am happy that that is not the temper of the House, but that we may still appeal to the Constitution and laws and immemorial usage, in remonstrating against that enormous encroachment upon them, the exclusion, the expulsion of five members from this House, who, by the Constitution, the laws, and immemorial usage, are entitled to their seats as much as any other gentleman here.

When I was interrupted by the exceedingly candid gentleman from Maryland, [Mr THOMAS,] who is willing to let me proceed "in order," according to his views of order, I was referring to a resolution which I offered in this House at the last session of Congress, and which, I believe, is now before the House in the shape of a resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia; and I was proceeding to state that I did think there was a great and important question between the parties. I am now speaking to the duty of the Chair—to its duty to swear in the members from New Jersey before any thing else is done in this House; and I speak to it in order to express my conviction that that is a duty, to the performance of which he is bound by the Constitution of the United States, by the laws of the United States, by the immemorial usage of the United States and of the British Parliament; and that no resolution or vote of this House can interpose between him and the performance of that duty. I was about to proceed to say that that important question (which I did believe to be of very great importamce, and which I did hope this House would find some means of settling before we came together) has, in point of fact, lost all its importance; because the Speaker has been chosen, and because the question is no longer before the House. Now, I can conceive that a member of this House, with a high respect for the Constitution, the laws, and usages, while the question of Speaker was before the House, may still say there is, after all, behind that, a question as to the will of the majority of the people of New Jersey in the election of their members to represent them in this House. And, sir, I am willing to concede to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. DROMGOOLE,] who argued the point a day or two since, that this House had the power to proceed to try and adjudicate the question before the Speaker was chosen. I concede it to him; but then I say that, if they do so undertake to decide that question before a Speaker is chosen, they must do it upon the constitutional principle as judges, not by their will; but that they must act under the authority given to them by the Constitution to jugde of the elections, returns and qualifications of the members of this House. And I further say that, if they do it in that manner, they cannot do it without a trial, without hearing the parties, without receiving evidence, without hearing arguments, and that it must be a judicial act, and not an act of autocrats.

Well the House has chosen to do it otherwise; and that there might be no failure of any incident to stamp upon them the inconsistency of their act, that have done it with a resolution on their table, (not yet repealed,) which was offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] that this House would proceed to try and determine the question before the election of a Speaker. That resolution is still before the House unrepealed. It has, to be sure, been violated. The election of Speaker has taken place. By an arbitary act, not by a judgment—for there has been no judgment, no trial, no hearing of parties, no reception of evidence—but by a naked autocratic act, it has been decided that the five members from New Jersey shall not be permitted to vote in the election of Speaker. Now, I say that that House unconstituted, or this House constituted, had no right to pass such a resolution; and I say this, that it is the duty of the Speaker, prescribed by the Constitution, prescribed by the law, prescribed by universal usage, to perform that duty, and that it is not competent for this House, by a unanimous vote, to release him from the performance of it. What is the alternative? What are we to suppose? We are to suppose that the power to voting to every member depends on the will of the majority, and not upon the Constitution and laws; for, upon the same principle, by virtue of the same process by which it was determined that the members from new Jersey should not vote—by the same authority, I say, my friend from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] might have had a sure way to stop my mouth by moving that I should not be permitted to speak or vote; and then a tie according to the precedent, on the question whether I should vote or not, would have expelled me as it has expelled the five members from New Jersey; and as he could have done it to me, he could have done it to any other member: and thus one-half of the members might be made to hold their seats not at the pleasure even of a majority, but of the other half.

Now, it is that precedent against which I protest in this case; and I wish the House to take into consideration that which is so settled and determined, so fixed by the authority which I read a short time since, (probably the highest in the law of England,) namely that a member returned by a sheriff who has been bribed is yet entitled to take his seat in the House of Commons, until she ha been adjudged (not arbitrarily expelled, but adjudged) to have been illegally elected. At the time I offered the resolution alluded to, at the last session of Congress, a difficulty had occurred to me; and I think, if the gentleman from Virginia persists, as I hope he will, in calling for a decision on his resolution, that he will find, when he comes to discuss it, that the difficulty which I found will present itself to him also. When I offered that resolution, it was rather with a view to see whether, upon cool deliberation, some plan or device might not be found by which this adjudication should take place without consuming an unreasonable or unnecessary portion of time. This had led me to inquire in my own mind into the principle upon which is established the law, both of the British House of Commons and of this House. What is its principle? Every one will admit that it is an evil—that it is a wrong done to a portion of the constituency—that it is a great inconvenience to decide that a man who, after all, shall turn out not to be duly elected, should be admitted to vote until that determination is made. But how was the evil to be remedied? The remedy which had occurred to me was that which this House finally determined it would take; that is, that whatever time it might take, they would examine, try, adjudicate, and decide the case, before the election of Speaker. But there are great difficulties in this mode of proceeding. It is a choice of evils and inconveniences; and I must confess that I have not yet been able, satisfactorily to my own mind, to devise any principle (not an arbitrary proceeding or an autocratic act, but a principle) upon which these contested elections can be tried without consuming time before the election of Speaker. And hence I derive what I believe to be the principle of the establishment of the law I have referred to; that is to say, that it must be assumed, in the first place, that members regularly returned according to law, are duly returned. This, it seems to me, must be the principle; because the only alternative is to deprive the constituency of its Representatives. The moment you determine to take any other cause for the decision of this question, you not only turn a member out of the House, but you deprive his constituents of the Representative. Now that is a much greater evil of the two; and it appears to me to carry with it all the reason of another principle; that is, the principle of privilege—the right of privilege—the privilege of members of the House from arrest, from summons in a court of justice. Why, the privilege of a man from arrest—from being brought to obedience to the laws—is a great evil and inconvenience. There are many individuals who suffer in consequence of it. The privilege by which no member shall be summoned to a court of justice as a witness, either in public, criminal cases, or in individual cases between man and man, is a great evil—a great inconvenience. But what then? The privilege here is established—it is established here by the Constitution. It is established to an infinitely greater extent in the Parliament of England, for privilege there is indefinite—determined upon principle to be so—and it has been carried to a most extravagant length.

But the principle upon which this privilege from arrest was settled is laid down in Jefferson's Manual by an opinion of the author of that book, and it is in terms extremely applicable to the present case. I will read it:

"This privilege from arrest, privileges of course against all process the disobedience to which is punishable by an attachment of the person; as a subpœna ad respondendum, or testificandum, or a summons on a jury: and with reason; because a member has superior duties to perform in another place."

That (continued Mr. A.) it is the authority given by the book which Jefferson cites. Now, what is his own opinion?

"When a Representative is withdrawn from his seat by summons, the 30,000 people whom he represents lose their voice in debate and vote, as they do on his voluntary absence: when a Senator is withdrawn by summons, his State loses half its voice in debate and vote, as it does on its voluntary absence. The enormous disparity of evil admits no comparison."

There (continued Mr. A.) is the opinion of Jefferson in a case which I consider to be perfectly analogous. "The enormous depravity of evil admits no comparison." What is the evil on the one side? It is the special privilege of an individual, which may be injurious to the public or to individuals. What is the evil on the other side? It is, that the 30,000 [now 47,700) men whom he represents are deprived of their voice and vote in the representative assembly of the nation. Now, this principle gives me also the principle upon which it has been established, that in cases of contested election the members regularly returned shall be admitted to sit until the House shall have adjudged that other persons are entitled to the seats. I say that "the enormous disparity of evil admits no comparison."

What is the evil of the admission of members, upon the regular credentials or commission which the law has prescribed as the testimony alone admissible for giving them seats here in the first instance? What, I ask, is the evil? There are two points of view in which the evil is to be considered. The first is in a party point of view. The second is in a view as it respects the people, the constituency, the nation. Now, I bring this question to the precise case before us. I ask, what is the evil of admitting the five gentlemen here from New Jersey who have presented themselves, according to the law and the Constitution, and have asked to be sworn? What is the evil? Why, gentlemen very warm in their party feelings will say that the evil is enormous; upon all those party questions which may arise, it may give a majority to the party opposed. That is the answer of party, of party spirit.

What is the answer as respects the nation? In the present case we have been told that the gentlemen who demand admission would misrepresent the people of New Jersey; and that their competitors, the five others, would be the only true representatives of the people. What is the fact? The people of New Jersey, and, I believe I might say, the people of the United States, of almost every separate State in the Union, are precisely in the condition of this House which represents them. We all know it is so in New Jersey, for, in this very case, there were two tickets of these two parties—one member of one party elected on that ticket by a majority, and five others of the other party claiming to be elected on the other.

Now, what do justice and equity say? Are we to take the voice of the people (so divided that a spider's web could scarcely stand between the question) to be, that one portion is to be considered as the true representatives of the whole people of the State of New Jersey, or that the other portion is to be so considered? I say, for myself, in all candor, that I believe the State of New Jersey would not be misrepresented by either of the two parties. I believe that the people of New Jersey would be well represented by either. They are all respectable men. Those who claim seats here we know, they having been uncontested members of the last Congress. On the other side, we know that there are among the competitors two men who have recently received from the people of New Jersey the highest office in their gift. Of one of them I can say more. He has served here with me; served on one of the committees, in the business of which the great parties of this House were as much interested probably as in any other committee, and, on the great question of protection to domestic manufactures—one of the bones of contention amongst us—my word for it, not one of the members claiming would vote differently to what he did. These were the interests of New Jersey: and the great question of the tariff which divides the people of this Union, but most deeply interesting to the people of New Jersey, would be decided by the votes of both these parties in the same manner. Am I to be permitted to say that these two Governors, so recently chosen by the people, or that the three other gentlemen, equally respectable with them, would misrepresent the people? I say no such thing—I believe no such thing. It is not amongst my principles to do this. I cannot undertake to say, upon a mere political difference of opinion, however deep or important, between myself and another man—I cannot undertake to say that he, with the oath of God upon him, misrepresents his own constituents. I do not believe it. And, for every thing that relates to the interests of the people of New Jersey or to the interests of the people of the United States, I, for one, if this question is to be determined, not upon adjudication, or by judges, but by arbitrary power—I say I would rather that they who now declare that these five members shall not vote, would go to the end of their position, and say that the five others should. Infinitely rather would I have the five competitors securing to the people of New Jersey their representation for a length of time which none of us can foresee; for, if you exclude them now, you virtually expel them. If they are expelled, then their constituents, five-sixths of the people of New Jersey, are without representation here—nearly a whole State of this Union. And when my friend from Pennsylvania over the way [Mr. SERGEANT] reminded us that this was the State in which were located Trenton, and Princeton, and Monmouth—the State which braved the very crisis of the Revolutionary war—a State on whose soil you cannot step without treading on the grave of some sufferer in the cause of your independence—when I am reminded of these things, and when I see a proposition, wherever made, to deprive the people of that State of their rightful representation here, I cannot submit to it—I cannot cease to invoke in their behalf the Constitution, the laws, usage, and every law that ever was binding here, to let them in. And if you determine, by this arbitrary decision, that you will not admit the five who have the legal credentials, I say, in God's name, admit the others, because then at least you will not have violated the rights of the people of New Jersey.

I cannot forbear, in this case, to consider the people of New Jersey under the form of a single individual. One of the great dramatic writers of antiquity, in one of his plays, represents the people of Athens in the form of a single man named Demos. Demos is the people. It is in one of the plays of Aristophanes. Now, I consider the people of New Jersey here as one man. Then, to come to another dramatic representation. I think I hear the people of New Jersey say, "What is my bond? You have a right to cut a pound of flesh next to my heart out of my body—that is the bond; that is, according to the law of Venice." I do not know how it may be here, but, according to that law, the bond was so. There was the right, or at least the power, to cut out a pound of flesh next to the heart of the individual. And what was the final decision in that case—a decision devised by a woman? She allowed the man at last to cut out the pound of flesh. "You have a right to do it," said she; "the law says that your bond shall be carried into execution, if you insist. Take your pound of flesh, therefore, but be careful not to spill one drop of blood. If you do spill one drop of blood, your bond is forfeited, and your lands and goods are confiscated to the State." Now, I maintain that the people of New Jersey have a right to say the same thing. There is the pound of flesh; here are my five Representatives; they are a part of my corporation, of my body; cut out the pound of flesh if you will, but take care not to spill one drop of blood; for if you do——

[Mr. BYNUM here rose suddenly, and addressed the Chair, supposing Mr. ADAMS to have concluded. After very general laughter,]

Mr. ADAMS resumed. I have too much respect, Mr. SPEAKER, for the candor which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BYNUM] has this day evinced, to deprive him much longer of the opportunity to present his views. I shall close my remarks very soon.

Sir, it has been said that this is res judicata—that this question is settled; and I think that the argument proceeds from a gentleman who, at the same time, declared that it was not according to his views of constitutional right. But it is res judicata, and, although he was against it, and though he thinks it was wrong for the House so to decide, yet, when he came to the question—

[Mr. RHETT asked leave to explain. He was understood to say that he had not taken the ground that the House could not judge the question. The ground he had taken was, that the House ought to go either on the commission, or should go elaborately into the whole case. He was opposed to going elaborately into the whole case; therefore, he went for the commission.

Mr. ADAMS referred to the resolution which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] had himself offered, and which was still upon the journals of the House]

Mr. A. then proceeded. But the gentleman says the question upon the commission was decided by this House. Does the right of the people of New Jersey depend upon that commission? If so, the members coming here under it have a right to be sworn. If not, the House has no right to set it aside. That is my doctrine; and I must confess that I do not altogether understand the logic or the political morality of that principle which, in the first place, opposes a wrong, and, when the wrong comes to be carried into execution, supports it. I have read, in a certain book, something like this charge made upon a man, "When thou sawest a thief thou consentedst to it." I do not mean to say that the gentleman consented to thievery, or that there is any thievery in the case. But I hear him say that what is wrong, and what he has pronounced to be wrong, he will consent to; and, as it cannot be carried but through his vote, he will give a decisive vote for it.

[Mr. RHETT again rose to explain. He had never said what the gentleman attributed to him. If he (Mr. R.) recollected, what he had said was, that the House having decided this matter, he would vote for every proposition giving it the direction proposed by the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, which was, to make it a question of election. He wanted to get rid of it, so that the House might go on with the greater matters before it.]

Mr. ADAMS resumed. The gentleman is at liberty, Mr. Speaker, to make as many explanations as he pleases; but the saying one thing and the doing another seem to me to be so inextricably involved in his two processes, that I cannot reconcile them together as logic. "To that complexion it must come at last." You say one thing and you do another—the one and the other directly and immediately succeeding. And that House—the body that now composes this imperfect and unconstituted House—agreed upon this proposition; they determined to go to trial, and ten minutes afterwards they determined to elect a Speaker without trial; not to adjudicate, not, as the Constitution authorizes them, to be judges of election, but to decide the question, without trial, without evidence, without hearing the parties, upon their mere will and pleasure. Such was the action of that body.

And, as to the process of reasoning here, have we not upon the journals of the last Congress a most signal example of a case in which the res judicata was set aside by this House? What was the resolution in that case? It was not a resolution depriving the people of the States of their Representatives, but it was making Representatives for them. Two members came here claiming seats from the State of Mississippi, at what was called the special session—the first session of the Twenty-fifth Congress. Some inquiry—a very modest one—was made. One gentleman rose and said, that if his credentials were called for, he would call for the credentials of every man in the House; and I saw it boasted in an Administration newspaper, that this frightened the Whigs out of their senses, and that they agreed to let him in, because they had not got their credentials in their pockets. I say I saw it gloried in as a capital manœuvre. Well, these two gentlemen had credentials, which upon their face declared that they were elected for the called or extra session—from the time when the election was held (probably in June) until the next November, which was the time of holding the regular election in Mississippi. These gentlemen not only frightened the Whigs out of any question as to the validity of the credentials, but persuaded the Committee of Elections to report that they were elected for the whole Congress—yes, for the whole Congress, with credentials bearing upon their face that they were elected for the called session, or until the month of November. Such were the credentials; and the gentlemen never produced them, either to the House or to the Committee of Elections; and so good-natured were the committee, that they not only did not ask for them, but they reported that the two gentlemen were elected for the whole Congress. This is the history of the first decision, and this House decided accordingly.

The month of November came. The people of Mississippi, according to the laws of their State, elected two Representatives—other men, not those whom this House had thought proper to make their Representatives. These two others came here and claimed their right to represent the State of Mississippi. What did the House do? The House rescinded their resolution of the preceding session—the res judicata—by a majority, not by a tie—turning neck and heels out of doors the two gentlemen whom they had previously declared to be members; and then went on to make another decision as wise and just as the former; that is to say, that the members duly elected by the people of Mississippi were not elected, and that they must go back again. What was the consequence? Why, that the people of Mississippi had the trouble and expense and charge of a third election, in which they returned the same two individuals whom this House had refused to recognise, and this House was compelled to receive them. Sir, every decision of this House was a precedent to be avoided, and the only decision that was right and just and true was the final decision of the people of Mississippi themselves. But, in the mean time, the people of Mississippi had been here for four or five months without a representation at all. Still these decisions of the House were made by judges. There was an adjudication; it was a res judicata; but the House itself reversed its first res judicata, and the people of Mississippi reversed their second. I hope I shall not hurt the feelings of any who took part in that fabrication of Representatives for Mississippi. I do not mean such a thing; I speak merely of the decision of that Congress on these election questions as I think of them now, and as I thought of them then When first the question was taken, I told this House that the people of Mississippi would do themselves justice—that they had yet to go through that process, and I remonstrated against the assumption of power on the part of this House to make Representatives for the people of the United States. And, sir, I am happy that the people of the State of Mississippi ratified and confirmed the opinions I entertained. But I have brought this case to show that the res judicata in this House is not as it ought not to be, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, an absolute despotism, not to be altered or revoked under any circumstances. If this House goes one step beyond the bounds of the Constitution, by assuming power which does not belong to them, the best thing they can do for themselves, for the interests of their country, and for the rights of the people, is to retrace their steps.

SPEECH OF MR. CAMPBELL,
OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

In the House of Representatives, February 14, 1840.

"The SPEAKER announced the first business in order was the resolution reported from the Committee of Elections by Mr. CAMPBELL, chairman, asking the House to grant that committee the privilege to have all printing done which it deemed necessary to facilitate the investigation of the New Jersey disputed election.

"The question pending when the resolution was last under consideration, was the motion of Mr. CAVE JOHNSON to amend the proposition from the committee, by authorizing that committee to have printed all the evidence they had collected in relation to this election.

"Mr. CAMPBELL said he had been instructed by the committee to accept the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. W. JOHNSON.]

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON then offered the following resolution as a substitute for his former proposition:

Resolved, That all the proceedings and papers before the Committee of Elections in relation to the New Jersey election, be reported to the House by the committee, with a statement of the names of the individuals who received a majority of all the votes given at the election for members of the Twenty-sixth Congress in that State, and that the same be printed for the use of the House, and the committee have leave to have such other papers and documents in relation to other contested elections, pending before them, printed by the public Printer of Congress.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina rose and said: It was a matter of some surprise, to him that the gentlemen from Tennessee, [Mr. CAVE JOHNSON,] when he had offered an amendment to a resolution reported from the Committee of Elections, and when that amendment had just been accepted as a modification of the resolution, should now shift his position, and offer for the consideration of this House a proposition so essentially different from the one he had first presented. Surely the gentleman is difficult to please. He first makes a proposition that all the papers in the possession of the committee in relation to the New Jersey case, whether relavant or not to its merits, should be printed, and no sooner is his proposition accepted by the committee as a modification to its own resolution, that he calls for a report of the names of those who received the greatest number of votes irrespective of irregularities in the conduct of the election, or of illegality in the votes.

Mr. C. felt that the gentleman's amendment now presented, calling for the names of those who had received the greatest number of votes, made it incumbent upon him briefly to state, with the indulgence of the House, the reasons why the committee had not, ere this, reported on the New Jersey case; and in doing so, he would endeavor to confine himself to a detail of such facts, not already in the possession of the House as were necessary to this explanation.

Previous to entering into an examination of the testimony submitted for its consideration, the committee adopted certain resolutions as the basis of its action, which, in his judgment, embodied the true principles of evidence applicable to the trial of this case. These resolutions were, in substance, as follows: That the credentials of the Governor of New Jersey are prima facie evidence that they who hold them are entitled to their seats; but their correctness being questioned upon the ground that all the votes polled were not counted, the committee would proceed to inquire who had received the greatest number of votes. That all votes received by authorized officers, acting in conformity with law, were prima facie legal; but it being alleged that pluralities had been obtained by the admission of illegal votes, and by frauds perpetrated on the ballot box, the committee would receive evidence as to the truth of these allegations, and inquire who had received the greatest number of legal votes, polled in conformity with the Constitution of the United States and the laws of New Jersey, and were, therefore, duly elected, and entitled to occupy, as members of the House of Representatives, the five contested seats from that State.

These resolutions, looking to a plurality of legal votes, and constituting them the basis of its final action, were adopted by a considerable majority of the committee. But we are now called upon by the gentleman from Tennessee to report to this House the names of those who received a majority of all the votes polled, irrespective of frauds in the conduct of the election, or of illegality in the votes.

After the adoption of the resolutions just referred to, a mass of testimony was examined, which appearing inconclusive, under the circumstances of this case, as to who had received a plurality of the legal votes, the committee, at the request of one of the parties, agreed to allow additional time for the procurement of testimony.

The time allowed was longer than Mr. C. thought was necessary—longer than, as a member of the committee, he was disposed to grant, but it was agreed upon by a majority of the committee, in opposition to his wishes; and although he felt strongly tempted, as a choice of alternatives, to advocate a preliminary report, to be made immediately, upon such testimony as was before the committee, or upon such as could have been procured in a few days, under the power to send for persons and papers, he did not, upon the whole, think that a difference in opinion as to time, was sufficient justification for him to abandon the position which he had at first taken, to make but one report upon this subject, and that that report should be upon the merits of the election.

Long, however, as is the time allowed, he doubted whether it was much longer than would be occupied in debate by this House upon a preliminary report, made by a divided committee upon testimony insufficient to establish the fact, (not as to who had received a majority of votes, for that could be easily shown,) but as to who were duly elected. So that, in reality, this apparent procastination may be the means of accelerating the final decision of this subject. For who can doubt, (continued Mr. C.) that had the committee made a divided report, stopping short of the merits of this election, we should have witnessed a revival of those scenes which so much distracted our deliberations in the early part of this session; and not improbably, after a long and excited discussion, the subject would again have been referred to the committee, with instructions to report upon its merits—scenes which will not improbably be revived, if the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee should be adopted by this House.

There was but one of two courses for the committee to have pursued. The one was to have made a preliminary report as to who should occupy the contested seats until the election was decided on its merits; the other was to suspend a report until after a full and thorough investigation, or such facts could be laid before the House as would enable it to come to a satisfactory and final conclusion upon the election.

Had the committee supposed that its duties were limited to collecting the returns, that had not been counted by the Governor and Privy Council, to the adding up and reporting who had received a majority of votes, as was now proposed, a very short time, perhaps a single day, would have sufficed; but such were not its limited duties. The present contest, he conceived, went beyond the returns, and involved the inquiry of who, under the Constitution of the United States and the laws of New Jersey, have been duly elected members of this House. No gentleman—not even the gentleman who moved the amendment—can deny that it is the voice of qualified voters only, expressed in conformity with law, that constitutes an election.

If the course adopted by the committee is destined to meet with the disapprobation of the House, said Mr. C. a full share of that disapprobation must rest upon me. When the committee was first organized, it stood eight to one in favor of a preliminary report—a true index of the House by which it had been created—four gentlemen, members of the committee, being in favor of a report upon the credentials, which had already, by no very equivocal expression of opinion on the part of the House, been repudiated,—four being disposed to report upon the examination of the testimony before us, who had received a majority of votes. I alone, of all the members of the committee, was disposed from the first to go into the merits of the election; and, whether for good or for evil, the latter course has at last received the sanction of the majority, and is that which has been adopted. Had the committee determined upon a preliminary report in the abstract, which it might easily have done, I would have endeavored in good faith to have carried out its views. And, although I did not feel myself called on in committee to express my opinion of the basis on which such a report should be made, if made at all, I do not hesitate to say that, had a preliminary report been determined upon, and it had been left to me to decide between adopting the Governor's credentials and the majority of votes, as indicated by the poll books, I would not have hesitated a moment to have preferred the latter. But in deciding, not on a question of returns only, but of election, who can doubt that it is the voice of qualified voters only that should be respected? It could never have been the intention of this House to limit the power of the Committee of Elections to the collection of returns—to the mere duties of a returning officer—to the mere adding up of the votes. To deny to this committee the right to inquire into irregularities, or frauds, or illegality, would be in effect to deprive the House of its constitutional power to judge of the election of its members, and to prostrate the elective franchise at the footstool of every petty and unprincipled manager of an election.

When the committee was first organized—when eight out of nine of its members were favorable to a preliminary report—it was urged from every side, with much force and eloquence, that great injustice would result by the exclusion of five-sixths of the representation of New Jersey from this hall, until, after a thorough, and perhaps protracted investigation, we should have it in our power to lay before the House such facts as would enable it to come to a satisfactory decision as to who had been duly elected.

Sir, (said Mr. C.) I admit to its fullest extent the magnitude of this injustice—injustice that cannot be exaggerated by any language in which it can be described, an injustice that I would most willingly avoid, though the exclusion, instead of being applicable to almost an entire State for weeks and months, were applicable only to a single district, for a single hour. But it is not manifest to every gentleman, that with the difference of opinion that exists in this House, if the committee had made a divided report upon the question of returns only, the scenes which have alread taken place in this hall would have been acted over again; that upon the same testimony, with very immaterial additions, which the House has already had before it, the same changes would have been rung, and perhaps the House have again declined to any decision as to who were entitled to seats. In the mean time the investigation of the election would have been suspended, and the final decision upon its merits delayed.

It is certainly important that the people of every part of this Union should, at all times, be fully and fairly represented; and when they are not so, they do not enjoy an equality of privileges. But this is a great question of principle unmixed with expediency, and he would ask whether either the advantages of a representative Government, or the purity of the elective franchise, can be preserved by admitting gentlemen to seats in this House, who claim to be, but who may not in truth be, duly elected? Shall this House elect, out of doubtful claimants, the representatives of the people? Or, shall it confine itself to its constitutional right of deciding whom the people have elected? The former would be destructive of liberty, subversive of the Constitution, and an evil, at least as great as the exclusion of a portion of the Representatives from a State, until all resonable doubt is removed as to whether they were duly elected. Better it is that the voice of the people of any particular part of this Union should be silent for a short time in this hall, than that it should be falsely reflected by those who are not their chosen Representatives.

Upon the principle here advanced, and which may appear to be somewhat startling, this House has, except in its organization, invariably acted. The position is this: when an election is involved in reasonable doubt, except in case of a sitting member, a sufficient investigation to remove the doubt should precede the right of membership. So far has this principle been carried, that instances are numerous in our cases of contested elections, when, it being found impracticable to decide with positive certainty who was duly elected, the seat has been declared vacant, and so remained until after a new election. No longer ago than the last Congress, the State of Mississippi was without a Representative for nearly an entire session, in consequence of a decision declaring the seats vacant. The case under consideration is a very unusual one, and there is not, in the annals of our contested elections, one precisely parallel to it. The case of Letcher and Moore, in the Twenty-third Congress, approaches nearer to it, in all its features, than any other, and affords a precedent directly in point as to the course pursued by the committee. Mr. Moore claimed a seat on imperfect credentials; Mr. Letcher upon the majority of votes, as indicated on the poll books. Neither of these gentlemen was admitted to a seat in the organization of the House, and the subject was referred to the Committee of Elections. The majority of votes upon which Letcher claimed a seat was clear and undisputed, acknowledged in the first paragraph of the report of the committee; and yet, instead of being admitted to his seat as soon as that fact was ascertained, the committee passed a resolution postponing the trial, and allowing time to obtain additional testimony to try the election on its merits. [Mr. C. here read from a volume on contested elections.] Thus we see that notwithstanding Mr. Letcher claimed distinctly on the ground of an acknowledged majority of votes, the committee, instead of recommending that he be admitted to a seat, thought it incumbent upon them to investigate the ballot boxes. The result of the trial was unfortunate. It terminated not in admitting either gentleman, but in declaring the seat vacant, and sending the election back to the people.

Mr. C. said it would be uncandid in him not to acknowledge that he felt some apprehension of a similar result in the present case; and this consideration had much weight with him as to the expediency of the postponement of this case for additional testimony.

That the people of New Jersey had made an election substantially in conformity with law, he had no doubt; and no honorable man, no patriot, no Jerseyman of proper principles, would endeavor to set that election aside. The people of that State had exercised one of their highest prerogatives in making the election; and, if either set of claimants, for selfish, base, or unworthy purposes, would stifle the voice of that people, fairly expressed, they must be regarded as traitors to the Constitution—as enemies to the liberties of the people—as recreant to the principles of honor. Conduct so base could not fail to be unmasked; and they who, for selfish purposes, would attempt it, must sink abashed and confounded under the indignant scorn of that people whose liberties they would have violated, and whose rights they would have sacrificed. He had heard it suggested that such an attempt might be made; but he believed it not; for surely gentlemen selected as candidates by the rival parties of that gallant old State, as individuals to represent the national councils, cannot contemplate a design so flagrant—so contemptible. The blood of the Revolution, so freely shed upon her battle fields, would rise in judgment against such a prostitution on the part of those who have been selected, not as the instruments to tear down, but as the pillars to uphold, their institutions, for which that blood was shed. But even if such an attempt is made, its accomplishment is rendered difficult, if not impossible, from the following consideration. It is well known that parties in that State are thoroughly organized—so much so, that it is known to what party almost every individual belongs; and for one, I repudiate the idea that the mere fact of proving an illegal vote, should be allowed to operate in favor of the party to which the individual giving it belongs. In other words, the mere proving that an illegal voter voted, must leave a presumption that he voted for the party to which he belongs. However much, in some respects, an overweening devotion to party is to be deprecated, the spirit of party has, in many respects, a beneficial tendency; and among them is, that it excites watchfulness, and acts as a guard against attempted frauds, should such be attempted, in the investigation of an election.

He had heard it stated as an objection, that the procrastination of this trial on the part of the Committee of Elections, would be, indeed, that it was used for party purposes. He was at a loss to discover how it could thus be used. But to avoid the possibility of such a result, so far as he was concerned, he would take it upon himself to say, that there was evidence before the committee, received by it as competent, though its sufficiency has not yet been passed upon, showing that the Governor's credentials were based on imperfect returns, and that the gentlemen who claim, in opposition to these credentials, received a majority of the votes polled. If the committee had supposed that its duties were limited to the mere act of correcting the return, or to the adding up of votes polled, and reporting who had received a majority, without inquiring into illegalities or irregularities, that duty might have been performed, perhaps, in a single day. But that this was not the intention of the House, he thought was manifest from the following consideration, to which he would call the attention of gentlemen generally, and particularly the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee, who had offered this amendment. It is this: simultaneously with the reference of the papers on this subject, there was referred, by the House to the committee a mass of depositions impeaching the validity of the election held at certain townships, and the legality of numerous votes that had been received. Will any gentleman say that it was not the duty of the committee to have examined these depositions, thus referred, previous to making their report? The very act of looking into these depositions impeaching the legality of votes, was in itself the commencement of an investigation into the ballot boxes. And would it not have been a perfect mockery to have made a partial, and stopped short of a thorough, investigation? The very reference of depositions impeaching the legality of votes, produced a necessity of examination before reporting, and was equal to an express order from the House that the ballot boxes should be investigated.

But it may be said that the parties should have been ready for trial. This, he admitted, was a strong argument, and in most cases where due notice of contest had been given, would be regarded by him as conclusive. But this was a very unusual case. Neither party admit that they are the contestors; and all know that neither were the sitting members. This was an obstacle to timely preparation; and the gentleman who asked an extension of time for the procurement of additional testimony, alleged that it was not practicable for them to be prepared when this case was taken up. Taking this circumstance in connection with the fact that there is no regulation on the part of Congress for taking testimony in contested elections, and that there was no law in New Jersey at that time applicable to this case, the committee determined to postpone the decision of the question of ultimate right until a day certain; the parties employing the interval in the preparation of their testimony, and the committee expressly reserving the right to report the facts, with its opinion thereon, whenever it might judge it expedient to do so.

An investigation into the ballot-box was at all times an unpleasant and ungrateful task; and he was not surprised that high spirited gentlemen should object to traversing the country to search out illegal votes. But the importance of preserving purity in elections overrides all private considerations. The ballot-box lies at the foundation of our institutions. Preserve it pure, and you preserve the Government itself. Do not suffer the pure spirit of American liberty which is breathed throughout the ballot to be contaminated by an amalgamation with foreign principles. Do not allow those who do not acknowledge our institutions, but who owe their allegiance to other Governments, to corrupt the sources of our own laws at the very foundation. He did not wish to be understood as making any allusion to either of the parties in the present case; for although but one of these parties had, to the best of his recollection, made allegations of illegal votes, yet in this, as in most other cases of highly excited election, it is not improbable that illegal votes have been received for both.

He could enumerate many evils attendant on the investigation of the ballot box, especially when the ballot is by secret voting; but all these objections sink into insignificance, when compared with the high and permanent importance of preserving our elections pure.

He would here merely allude to a circumstance that had taken place previous to the reference of this case, as indicative of the sense of the House at that time, as to what should be the course of the committee. To the resolution proposing the reference, there was an amendment offered, instructing the committee, in substance, to make a report as to who should occupy seats until the election was decided on its merits. The mover of the resolution distinctly refused to accept the amendment as a modification. The House did not adopt it, and the resolution passed in comprehensive terms, instructing the committee to inquire and report who were "entitled to occupy, as members of this House, the five contested seats."

Observing by the clock that the time had almost expired, allowed by the rules for the consideration of reports from committees, he would not detain the House longer than to express his thanks for the attention with which he had been heard, and to express his conviction that they whose claims are founded in justice, have but little to apprehend from a thorough investigation into this subject, but will ultimately take their seats in this hall the unchallenged Representatives of the freemen of their State.

SPEECH OF MR. DAVIS, OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Senate, January 23, 1840—The Independent Treasury bill being under consideration, and the Senate having evinced a determination not to adjourn without taking the question upon the final passage of the bill—

Mr. DAVIS said: I rise, Mr. President, with great reluctance at this late hour to address the Senate, fatigued as it is with an unusally long session, and exhausted by the debate; but, painful as it is, I must entreat their indulgence while I make a brief reply to the new doctrines which have been now, for the first time, published here, and come to us through channels that leave no doubt of their being the doctrines of the Administration. They involve and have drawn into this debate great and momentous considerations, affecting the most cherished interests of the people I represent, as well as of nearly the whole country. With the exception of a few incidental remarks made by me a day or two ago, no one from the North and East has addressed you during this discussion; and as some part of the debate has been pointed in its character, and directed to me personally, as if the positions assumed were incapable of refutation, I feel urged by an irresistible sense of duty—nay, I cannot reconcile myself to forbear from making some reply.

The Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER,] with his usual acknowledged ability, and the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] following in his track, have advanced the propositions that the embarrassments and distress with which the country has been grievously afflicted for several years past, and which now paralyze all its energies, are imputable to the pernicious influence of bank paper; that this bill contains the necessary corrective, as it will check importations of foreign goods, suppress what they call the credit system, and, by restoring a specie currency, reduce the wages of the laborer, once the value of property.

This is the character given to the measure by its friends; and, alarming as the doctrines are, I am gratified that they are frankly avowed. I have been anticipated, to a considerable extent, by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. HENDERSON.] In what I have to say, I shall, however, confine myself chiefly to the speech of the Senator from Pennsylvania, who has gone more in detail into the subject, for we all acknowledge his ability on this floor, and his capacity to do ample justice to the subjects which he discusses.

I do not propose to follow him through a very large portion of his elaborate argument to prove that Executive power has of late been shunned, instead of being sought after, or that the present and the old Bank of the United States are identical, and both National Banks. Enough has been said on these points. He has, however, asserted that we have abandoned all the arguments which we have before used against the Sub-Treasury, because the progress of events has proved them unsound. Not so; far from it. With others, I entered into that debate, which is before the public, and the arguments unrefuted stand as firm as ever; but it would be a profitless task to reiterate them here; and this is the reason why they are passed over in the discussion.

But, sir, I will not dwell upon any of these matters, but go to that in hand. The Senator says we labor under distressing embarrassments, and so we do; no one will have the hardihood to deny it, for all the country in sorrow bears testimony to it. We have, it is true, seen an occasional gleam of light, but it has been soon obscured, and we have been shrouded in a gloomy uncertainty. He says, further, that the cause is excessive issues of bank paper, speculation, and a bloated (I use his words) credit system. He lodges the guilt on the shoulders of the banks alone. It is neither just nor fair to hold them alone responsible, and I will make it manifest by showing that they were seduced into their errors by the Administration.

Before the late President (Jackson) seized the public money and took it into his own custody, in 1833, there was no complaint about the currency; all the people know this, for all, even the President himself in one of his messages, united in declaring, in substance, it was sound, and equal to that of any nation on earth. There was no complaint, no inconvenience, no embarrassment, from this source, in doing business; but contentment and satisfaction every where. About this there could be no mistake, nor will any one here attempt to refute the well known facts.

But from that act of the President, which was the first movement to reform the currency, to this day, there has been what the Senator is pleased to call "expansion, contraction, and explosion," in rapid and fearful succession; crisis upon crisis, pressure upon pressure, panic upon panic, have succeeded, till we have reached a state of suspicion and alarm that has deranged and almost suspended business. The storm in its fury has swept over the country, once and again uprooting the stateliest and firmest trees, and leaving in its track a dreary, desolate waste. Its marks are too deeply engraven, too distinct, too well defined to leave any thing uncertain—any thing equivocal. It fell upon us with such withering energy as to leave no doubt when, where, and how it began.

Gentlemen may tax their ingenuity, they may task their inventions, to discover other causes of distress—they may belabor and hold up to scorn and execration the banks as long as they please—they cannot change the facts, for they cannot obliterate history. Things were well, and every body knows it, till 1833. Then began the bank reform by the removal of the deposites—and then began the rapid series of "expansion, contraction, and explosion"—then followed crisis after crisis—then came the derangement of exchanges, and then the embarrassments which have overwhelmed the country—then came, too, the nine hundred banks of which the Senator speaks, though he has probably swelled the number beyond historical truth.

The Senator admits, what cannot be denied, that the Administration proposed and carried into effect the State bank deposite system. It was in this place and by them that State banks were taken into favor, petted, and boastingly held out to the country as affording a better and safer currency. Into them was the revenue put in enormous sums, and they were directed to deal freely upon it by the President for the accommodation of the people, and it was his pride and pleasure to make known to us that the public money was thus employed, instead of being locked up; a striking commentary upon the present plan of vaults and safes, Mr. President.

The Senator admits that this was the policy of the Administration, and that the disastrous consequences predicted by the Opposition have been verified. He might have gone further; for it is truth equally undeniable, that this policy sowed the seed of nearty or quite one-half of the whole number of banks—between eight and nine hundred—and of more than one-half of the capital; that it was the parent of the paper "expansion, contraction, and explosion," of which he has spoken in terms of just severity; that it is alike the parent of the bloated credit system which he affirms has made us all gamblers; and that the mad speculation which raged over the country, and has furnished the theme for declamation and denunciation in these halls for three years past, was begotten by it. Such are the facts; and on the projectors of this policy let the responsibility rest. We had had no "expansions, contractions, or explosions," for a long period, that did not fairly belong to the vibrations of trade; none that excited alarm, or seriously disturbed public confidence, till we came to this reforming policy; but since then the public mind has scarcely been tranquillized. In 1834 came the first fell swoop, which overturned and bankrupted thousands; and it originated here. In 35-6 came the great era of bank-making and trading upon the public money, then accumulated to sixty or seventy millions, as nearly as I remember, which threw the country into a feverish excitement, and even firm, well-balanced minds out of their adjustment. There was a rage for fortune-making and fortune-hunting such as had never been witnessed, and which nothing but this policy was capable of generating. The Senator might and ought to have limited the bloated credit system that made us all, as he affirms, gamblers, to this period, and left the offspring to stand beside its parent as a proof of the disasters of this policy, and of the fulfilment of the predictions of the Opposition; for go together they must, and live together they will in history; and no sophistry, no ingenuity can ever separate them. While the Senator admits this policy to belong exclusively to the Administration, and to have been strenuously opposed by us, and its melancholy consequences predicted, he now repudiates it as erroneous, and we must allow to him and his friends whatever credit belongs to an abandonment of it after it had literally exploded, and the mischief was accomplished. But, sir, he and they must be reminded that I could, if I would, read from the messages of the President, and from the successive reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, language of exultation, triumphing in the entire success of the policy, boasting that the currency was on a better footing than ever, that the exchanges were greatly improved, and that, too, at the very moment when the bloated credit was most expanded, and speculation was the most rife and rank. Such was the delusion that the madness which had seized multitudes was trumpeted forth as evidence of success and general prosperity. The Senator clearly reasons from false premises when he makes the banks the origin of our embarrassments, for they were only instruments in the hands of those who projected the measures that have made them what they are.

But the Senator goes further, and traces the evils of banks and bank paper into England, and alleges, without qualification, that from this cause business there is as badly paralyzed as it is here; and I am not about to make an issue upon that point, for I must hurry on to other matters. He makes an inference, however, which I must notice. He says that to this circumstance alone we owe our ability to manufacture goods. If England was a hard-money country, our mills and hammers would all be silent; but the paper system so raises the price of wages, and, consequently, the price of production, that she cannot send forth her goods so cheap as she otherwise could, or so cheap as they are made in hard-money countries, where wages are lower. And do we owe our success to this folly? Do we stand on such a slippery basis, having no foothold but upon an error of policy, stupidly persisted in? I desire to be informed how the hard-money countries, as they are called—Italy, Spain, Holland, France, and Germany—for they have all been put into that class, though not with strict historical accuracy—stand the competition of England, with her bloated credits? Yes, how, sir, do they figure in the competition? Who has supplied our markets and the markets of the world? If metallic currency makes production cheaper—if it gives vantage ground to a country in the general round of trade, how is it that these nations have not long since run England out of our market with their cheaper goods? How is it that we draw annually from England twofold more of imports than from all the residue of Europe? Why is it that they, especially France, shut their ports against most kinds of English goods, to protect their own manufactures? Why is the same policy pursued elsewhere? In these countries the hard money scheme has had a long, full, and faithful trial, and we know the result. England, without any advantages over them in our ports, has overwhelmed them with her competition; and so it is wherever trade is open to her upon a footing of equality with them.

Is it not, Mr. President, a surprising fact that the Senators who have spoken upon this subject have selected the two most free, most commercial nations—nations which, by their extraordinary enterprise and their unsurpassed knowledge of business, have carried their trade to the remotest parts of the earth, and excelled all others in the accumulation of wealth, and the enjoyments it brings with it—nations highly civilized, and standing among the most enlightened in the globe—as the examples of unwise, imprudent, and vicious government—so destitute of the first principles of political economy as to waste the products of their labor through the unseen and incomprehensible influence of bank paper?

There is no denying that they have outrun all others in prosperity while in the use of this paper, and yet, according to the theory of the Senator, they have all the time labored under a most oppressive policy, bloating wages and property, while it has been the happy lot of other countries to live under the auspicious influence of hard money. Spain, Italy, France, Holland, Germany, on the other hand, have become pattern nations, distinguished for their wisdom, and also for the happy condition of their laborers, who, doubtless, failing to realize their condition, escape, whenever they can, to this country or some other part of this continent.

But, sir, I must leave this topic and go to another. The Senator assures us that this paper brings with it this alarming attribute—as it expands and contracts, so property and wages rise and fall; thus making it the vital principle of the body politic, giving to it pulsation. In speaking of paper, I once and for all, wish always to be understood as meaning the paper of sound specie-paying banks, redeemable at sight, unless I otherwise specify. Is this a sound axiom of the Senator? Is bank paper the sole or chief regulator of the value of wages and property? If so, whenever there is a common currency there should be a uniform price. Let us see how the position is sustained in the United States, where, in all parts of the country, we have banks. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HENDERSON] stated that the services of an ordinary laborer, which would cost fifteen dollars in his part of the country, he had ascertained could be had at Pittsburg for a quarter, or less, of that sum, and in New England, as I understood him, for about half. Every body knows the vast difference in the expense of living between Boston and New Orleans, and between New York and any remote country town. But how is it with hard money countries? Expenses of all sorts are unquestionably fourfold greater in Havana than in Florence; and I might go on multiplying examples, for it is much more difficult to find two places that correspond than two that are at variance. Does it not not follow that currency, while it undoubtedly has an influence, is not even the principal cause of this diversity?

But, sir, I cannot dwell on this. The Senator contended, by an ingenious argument, that a reduction of wages would be beneficial to the laborer, because property would necessarily fall in the same ratio, and, in the fervor of debate, addressing New England through me, he appeals to her to embrace this alternative as a resource to rescue her manufactures from the ruin which lays in prospect. Embrace what, Mr. Mr. President? How will a corresponding fall of wages and property aid the laborer? How is his condition to be improved by it? The most that can be said is, that his relative condition is unchanged. But can he embrace the degraded condition of by far the larger class of laborers in England and Ireland, where the alms-houses are filled with paupers, and those who support themselves struggle for life? Can he descend a grade lower, to hard money Italy, where, as the authority read by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] will prove, but I will not stop to read it, wages are three pence a day? Is it an invitation to abandon the physical, moral, and intellectual comforts and enjoyments which surround the industrious man here, and descend to the deplorable condition of those who fly from their country to this as a place of refuge for the poor, the naked, and the hungry?

But, sir, as I have more to say of this in a more appropriate connection, I shall pass it for the present, with a single remark—if such are the advantages of other countries, why do the poor emigrate hither, and why do not our citizens emigrate thither?

I will now notice the effects upon the public policy which are imputed to this bill. We have always been told that it was a simple proposition to divorce the Government from the banks, so as to enable it to hold its own money, and, therefore, harmless in its character, as it would affect nothing else.

But, sir, the Senator from Pennsylvania, while he declares that he is not for an exclusive hard money currency, or, in other words, is not hostile to well regulated State banks, if they can be well regulated, as he expresses himself, argues that this bill will diminish importations, suppress credit, and stop speculation, by modifying the currency so far as to work out these extraordinary ends.

I am by no means satisfied that it is capable of producing all these consequences, but, as such a power is imputed to it by its warmest friends, and those who are in the councils and confidence of the Administration, who bring it forward, and no doubt bring it forward with this view and expectation, I shall, in this reply, confine myself to the position assumed. That it will do the country no good, I have never doubted; but I have never allowed myself to believe that it can exert that influence upon its affairs which is ascribed to it.

If it will diminish importations in the right way, so far it has my most hearty concurrence, for they have run into an injurious excess. This again is the result of a false policy, not imputable to paper, as the Senator supposes, even as a principal cause. It comes of encouraging foreign labor instead of our own; of stimulating this trade under the persuasion that it is more beneficial to the country than to strengthen and foster our own industry, until it has reached a point of injurious excess, suspending our laborers from employment and taking from them their bread. We buy more than we sell, leaving a balance of many millions now due to Europe, which is to be paid out of the resources of the people; and it is time to retrace our steps. The President, who has been a promoter of this policy, complains in his message of this excess as a serious evil, and I rejoice at it; but he fails to indicate the remedy. He talks vaguely of economy, but is silent upon our great interests of the North and East. We must, sir, stand by our own laborers, and not suffer them to be overwhelmed by this process, and then appeal to them to lower their wages. Our duty is plain, and we must pursue it with manly firmness. The workshops of Europe must not be allowed to supersede ours. This is the remedy. But the bill will suppress credit—suppress bloated credit! What, sir, is credit? One would think it some new invention to defraud the public, by the manner in which it is spoken of; but it is co-existent with business, and wherever there is or has been business, there credit has always existed, and has been and will be abused to a greater or less extent. I cannot comprehend how commerce or trade can be carried on successfully without it! Abolish credit, and for what? Because the false policy of the Administration in 1835'-36 stimulated it to excess! Because, like the freedom of speech and of the press, it may be abused! I know of no other period against which any general and just charge can be brought. What would be the condition of the country if men were denied credit? Nothing more deplorable. The young man born to no inheritance now goes into the world with his character for honesty and integrity; this is his great and only resource, and by the faith placed in this he commands the funds necessary to go forward in business. And, Mr. President, it is one of the glorious characteristics of our institutions that this path is open to his enterprise, and the way to wealth, as well as to honor and fame, is clear of obstructions for the most obscure and humble individual. Shall we deny to such the only chance they have of success? Shall we trample on them, and grind them to dust with the iron heel of power? No, sir, I will espouse no such anti-Republican doctrines. I will vote for no law that declares to the poor that they shall remain in hopeless poverty, and to the rich that they alone shall have the enjoyment of property.

But speculation is to be put down. If the Senator means by speculation, unwise and hazardous traffic, it has always existed, and always will exist, where enterprise exists, unless he can uproot the desire in the human mind for the sudden acquisition of wealth. He might as well undertake to stop the emotions and passions of the human heart. The only way to make men prudent and sagacious in business—and it is very desirable they should be so—is to make them see far enough into the future to avoid ruinous hazards; but the rash, who often have a passion for wealth, will indulge illusive hopes and make ruinous bargains, unless the Senator can enlarge their understandings and increase their sagacity.

There is but one process by which credit and speculation can be suppressed, and that is, by denying the means and facilities of business, not to speculators alone, but to all; and that is exactly what the argument of the Senator tends to. He proposes to diminish the circulation, declaring that there is an inflation, when we are crippled down by the scarcity of money. He would diminish to a vast extent the resources and ability of lenders, when the public is in despair for want of circulation. He assumes that diminishing the currency will diminish wages and the value of property, and so it may be; but the first great and abiding result will be a diminution of business. His theory abolishes credit, and leaves nothing but a reduced currency to do business with, and no one can deny that a reduction of business must follow. Is the country prepared for this? Do we grow too fast? Is our enterprise too great? Do we labor too much? Have we too much to eat, drink, or wear? Are our comforts and enjoyments so multiplied that a sound policy requires they should be curtailed? What response will the people give to these inquiries? Let him who is willing to be pared down first stand forth and proclaim it. Wages are to be diminished by curtailing the demand for them; for that is the effect of reducing business.

The Senator, in his argument, seemed to forget that the evils of a contracting and contracted currency bear as oppressively upon the public, and more so, than those of expansion. The difference is this: in expansion, the weight of loss falls on the creditor portion—in contraction, upon the debtor portion: but in either case it is a grievous calamity. He cannot reduce the currency below what is necessary, without even more suffering than arises from too much.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALKER] goes for the abolition of paper. The quantity of specie in the country is not supposed to exceed about $60,000,000; the President put it at $35,000,000. This he argues would insure a great reduction of wages and of the value of property, which he insists will be beneficial. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] is also for metal alone; and these gentlemen have bestowed the highest encomiums upon the policy of the hard money countries. The latter is enchanted with the fact that the Hollanders have grown rich and become great lenders of money, while we are borrowers; and I will solve for him this enigma upon his own principles. He imputes it to gold, and infers that we should be lenders if we had a metallic currency only. Who, Mr. President, are the lenders of Holland? Those individuals who have amassed millions who at one time owned most of this city, and who can buy up empires with their boundless wealth, having profited by a state of things which made the privileged few rich, while the many are left poor—while the laborer, as I can prove, gets but his 3d. and 4d. a day. This is the last policy we desire; the last that would be in harmony with the genius of our people or in unison with their true interests. It is diffusive wealth that we desire; a general prosperity among all; property scattered every where, attainable by all that deserve it; and thus invigorating a successful business, in which all may participate, instead of amassing it in the pockets of a few. We are borrowers; be it so. It is better, infinitely better, to borrow, and thus diffuse capital to excite industry and enterprise, than to amass it in heaps and become lenders to nations, with a nation of paupers at home.

But, sir, I fear I have dwelt too long on these matters, and will hasten to notice that for which I chiefly rose. Much has been said of labor, and what is it? I may say, without offence, it is a commodity bought and sold like merchandise in the market. A man has his skill and service to sell to whomsoever will buy them; and his anxious desire is to obtain the most liberal remuneration. The Senator says the value of it is regulated by bank paper. Not so, Mr. President, not so; but chefly by the amount in market, and the demand which exists for it: currency may, however, at times, have its influence. If the supply is great and the demand small, then wages are necessarily low; but if the supply be small and demand great, they are high. When business is flourishing, the demand is urgent, and wages rise; when it is depressed, the demand diminishes, and wages fall. Hence, too, in countries densely populated, the supply is necessarily greater, in proportion to the business, than in countries thinly peopled. Thus we see why wages in a great country, new and full of resources, like ours, are in quick demand, while in China, where there is a vast surplus population, the market is overstocked, and they are low. Hence, too, it is, that in such conditions of society we always find the greatest poverty, suffering, and degradation. Bank paper is obviously not the sole or chief cause which fixes the value of wages.

But, sir, let us pursue this subject a little further, as it is capable of further illustration.

There are three great classes of laborers: those who produce from the earth are agriculturists; those who convert the products of the earth into useful forms are manufacturers; and those who are engaged in transporting and exchanging the products of the other classes, are commercial. These great divisions of mankind are founded on no law but that of civilized, social existence. In our country at least, each and every person may pursue any or all kinds of business. But experience teaches us the necessity of those divisions, for wool, cotton, and flax are of little value till turned into cloth, but the farmer would find it difficult to run a mill to make cloths, or to build and sail a ship to take his produce to market. From this division, too, come our markets. We must have food and clothing, and we must obtain them by an exchange of the products of labor, but we cannot exchange a horse or a watch for a joint of meat, or for a pair of shoes; such property must first be broken into parts, and this is the peculiar office and almost the only use of money. It measures the value of property, and brings it into a form suited to our convenience. This is the relation which it bears to business, and no other; and while I admit its great importance, I deny that it lies at the foundation, and is the great regulator of the affairs of men, as seems here to be supposed. The friends of this bill, I know, assume that we have an inflation, and that money rules, guides, and regulates business; when, in truth, the inquiries ought to be, first, how much is necessary as a circulating medium, that we may know whether there is an excess; and, second, does paper necessarily create an expansion, or unnecessary enlargement of the currency, that we may judge whether it ought to be abandoned. These matters, which are assumed, are precisely what ought to be proved. The Senators assume as evident truth what is not apparent. They affirm that paper becomes redundant, excessive, inflated. But they do not attempt to establish the fact by any proof. Since the first of January, 1838, our circulation has not much exceeded one hundred millions; it may, at some periods, have reached one hundred and twenty, inclusive of metal and paper. Is this excessive? Has it reached a point above the urgent necessities of business for two years past? If it has, how much is enough? Some days ago I put this inquiry distinctly to the Senate, and it remains, and will remain, unanswered. If it can be proved that we have too much, it is not difficult to ascertain, with sufficient exactness, what amount is necessary. I desire Senators to make known the process by which they arrive at their conclusions in so vitally an important matter. They seem to take it for granted that there is no evil but expansion to fear, while nothing is more certain than that too small a circulating medium works out as great, if not greater, injuries, than one too large.

We have heard much declamation about bloated credit, gambling and speculation, but if the existence of all these were established at this moment by unquestionable proof, it would have little tendency to establish the fact of excessive circulation, for they have no necessary connection, but each may exist independent of the other.

Will the Senator maintain the proposition that paper cannot and has not circulated without inflation or excessive credits in trade generally? I go further, and ask him if excess is any thing more than an occasional occurrence, growing out of markets quickened into activity by events rather casual than permanent? Is there any excess of paper in the usual course of business from sound banks who redeem and are able to redeem their paper at sight, dollar for dollar, in metal? It is not easy to see how excess ever exists under such circumstances. I can go to-day into any bank in Boston or New York, and draw out a dollar with the same amount of paper, and that dollar is as good, and will buy as much, in France or Germany as any dollar there. The paper, then, is clearly worth as much as the silver, for it buys it. If the paper of banks is maintained at this value, and so redeemed at all times, it is not easy to comprehend how it is inflated, or that more is in circulation than is needed for use. The idea of inflation presupposes some unsoundness. All money, metallic as well as paper, does and will fluctuate in value, and, if this be inflation, then gold and silver is no more exempt from it than paper. It is by no means easy to determine which fluctuates oftentimes—money or property. Cotton is forty dollars a bale to-day, to-morrow it is thirty-five, and next day forty-five; it does not follow that the cotton alone has fluctuated, or that it has fluctuated at all; for gold and silver may be so abundant as to depress the value of property, or so scarce as to raise it. It is every day's occurrence to find gold and silver fluctuating in value, commanding at one time a premium, and then none; nay, under some circumstances, falling below good paper. No matter what we have for currency, there will be fluctuations in its value greatly affecting trade, as a circulating medium of uniform amount cannot be maintained any more than you can limit business to an exact amount.

This all proves what seems not to be well understood, or Senators would reaason differently—that there is but one way to determine how much circulation is necessary. It is impossible to ascertain how much money may be necessary for each member of the Senate for the current year, and it is equally impossible to anticipate the wants of the great public. The question is left, therefore, to be settled by the laws of trade, as all other matters of business. We learn how much flour and corn are required annually by the demand for them. Just so we learn how much money is required to carry forward business, by the ability of men to buy it. So much is necessary, be the amount great or small; and, in a growing country, it would be just as wise to limit the amount of produce as the amount of monetary capital. Surely nothing can be more absurd than to attempt to determine the amount, without reference to the exigencies of the country—to say that eighty millions, or any other arbitrary amount, is enough. There is no advantage to be gained by lowering the value of property, unless the same amount of labor, or the same amount of property, enables us to obtain more of the necessaries of life. This fact should, therefore, be first clearly established, for the process is necessarily attended with great sacrifices. The Senator from Pennsylvania seems to understand that reducing the circulation will reduce property and wages in the same ratio. If it does, in what is our condition bettered, even if we could reconcile debtors to it, who would be ruined? He seems to believe that our relations in foreign trade will be improved, but I shall show him his error, and that he ought to arrive at exactly the opposite conclusion, for his theory, if carried into execution, would inflict upon the laborer as well as the owner of property the most injurious and oppressive consequences. He solemnly affirms, and I give him all credit for sincerity, that he believes a reduction in wages and property would be beneficial. Let us see.

Suppose that wages and property will be reduced one-half by the bill—that is, if wages are now a dollar a day, they will be half a dollar; and if beef and mutton are now eight cents a pound, they will be four; and so of all the productions of the United States, and of all property created here. Upon this state of facts, as things are, the laborer would have, at the expiration of twenty days' labor, twenty dollars to provide supplies for himself and family. As they will be, he will have ten dollars. Now, sir, be it remembered that we buy and sell in foreign markets by their standard of currency, and that lowering wages and property here is to have no effect there, according to the reasoning of the Senator, as their currency must regulate the price of their wages and products; but cotton is to sell, and goods are to be bought, as if no change had taken place. Goods, therefore, will come into this country no cheaper. If, then, the laborer goes into the market with his money, as his wages are, he will have twenty dollars to expend in tea, coffee, sugar, and the thousand necessaries which come from foreign countries; but if he goes into it as they will be—ten dollars, under the operation of the new theory—it is plain, therefore, that with the same amount of labor, he can purchase but half as much foreign merchandise; in other words, it will in effect be doubled in price, while it is apparently the same.

But the Senator did not stop here, for he alleged that, while the laborer would be in a better condition, the exporter of produce—that is, cotton, &c.—would derive a greater profit, the measure of which would be the amount of reduction of wages and of property, as he would thus be able to produce so much cheaper. To make myself understood, I will proceed with the same supposition that wages and property are to be reduced one-half. Then his theory is, that the cotton-planter, for example, would produce his crop at half the present cost, by the saving in labor and the support of it, and consequently derive double profit. That he would produce cheaper is undeniably true; and if he should sell for the same price he now does, and bring home specie, he would realize double profits, provided his laborers are supported wholly on the products of the United States. This, however, is not the course of trade or of business. But from whence would the profits come? Not from foreign countries, for no change is to occur there, but from the pockets of every consumer of foreign goods in this country, for the change is wholly in the wages and produce of our own country. The idea is, that, if wages and property sink together one half, the relative positions of the laborer and the owner of property are the same, for the laborer can purchase as much with one half the money, and the same amount of property will purchase as much labor as before. But the laborer will, at the end of any given period, have but half as much money, and the same amount of property will be worth but half as much; consequently, all the surplus gains of the farmer, mechanic, manufacturer, and laborer, will be but half what they now are, in nominal amount. If property in foreign countries should descend in the same ratio, the most that could be said of our condition is, that it is no worse, for it is obviously no better. But if we descend while they remain stationary, and a profit is thence gained to the exporter, nothing is plainer than that such profit is drawn from the consumer of foreign merchandise, as it will take twice as much of our labor or products to buy it as is now required. If the theory establishes the fact that the exporter is to reap double profits for cotton, it establishes, beyond controversy, the fact also that that profit will be a tax upon every man that consumes a foreign article, and that it will be wholly drawn from their pockets. The Senator has led himself into an error by supposing that foreign productions are to come to us cheaper, while our exports are to keep up where they are. He thinks the importer sells in a market inflated by paper, and realizes an extraordinary profit. But he must perceive that the low and depressed state of the working classes in Europe is proof enough that no excessive profit is obtained here upon goods—none that can bear essential reduction; and that while raw cotton maintains its price, foreign goods must also maintain theirs. In the great competition of trade, this idea of excessive profit to the importer is fallacious; and as the notion of a reduction is founded on it, that is also fallacious.

To follow out the case I have supposed: The income of every man, except the exporter, is to be reduced one-half in the value of wages and property, while all foreign merchandise will cost the same, which will obviously, in effect, double the price, as it will take twice the amount of labor, or twice the amount of the products of labor, to purchase it.

I do not ascribe this power to the bill, but it is enough for me that its friends do. What response will the farmers, mechanics, manufacturers, and laborers make to such a flagitious proposition? Can they be reconciled to such a measure of oppression? one that extorts from them the fruits of their industry to professedly enrich the planter who now enjoys a prosperity unequalled in the rest of the country? No, sir, such plans of sectional aggrandizement, and such a disregard of the interests of the greatest and most powerful class of people in the country, can only excite their disgust and indignation. Thus, sir, I have traced the benefits of this bill, if it have any, as interpreted by its friends, to the rich and powerful. I have, if I mistake not, demonstrated that they are to be made richer by a tax upon their less fortunate, but more industrious and more necessitous fellow-citizens—a tax that they never can and never will submit to, so long as their power can be felt through the ballot-box.

But, sir, this is not all. While we are thus to have intolerable burdens loaded upon us, to add to the weight of our embarrassments, and to increase our sufferings; and while the debtor portion of the public are to be crushed and ground to dust between the upper and nether millstone of this process, the man of money is not only to escape unharmed, but to have his pr[illegible] perty doubled. He who holds cash, or its equivalent in notes, bonds, or stocks, will be able to buy double the amount of property with it, and will therefore have its value doubled on his hands; for, while wages and property are to go down, money is to go up in the same ratio.

If the friends of the bill have given to it a true construction, it is a bill of privileges to the rich, but a scourge to all others.

What is the debtor portion of the public? Is it so insignificant as to be disregarded? Sir, I will venture to assert that the amount of existing indebtedness in any commercial country is nearly, if not quite, equal to the value of all property in that country, whether it be rich or poor, prosperous or unprosperous, and you cannot change, to the extent gentlemen have supposed, the relation of debtor and creditor, or thus diminish the resources of the debtors without a crash, a waste, and desolation such as has never been experienced. Suppose a man has purchased $10,000 worth of property at present prices, and given his bond for it; you reduce its value one-half, and it is worth $5,000. How is it possible that, with resources thus reduced, most debtors can ever pay?

But, sir, you cannot maintain a state of things such as has been supposed. You may embarrass and distress us as you have done, but this bill will, in the end, work out no such advantages as are anticipated for the planters. The theory contains in itself a principle that will defeat the end in view. Go on, sir, if you please, and so legislate as to bring to the cotton planters the extraordinary profits anticipated, at the expense of the other branches of industry; how long will it be before that pursuit will be overloaded with competitors, till the market will be inundated with cotton, and its price fall just in the ratio you have stimulated its productions? Down it will—down it must, by the laws of trade, come to a level with the fall of other productions. And what will be gained by the whole process? Nothing; absolutely nothing, except that it will take more of our labor and more of our productions to buy foreign merchandise; our gain will turn literally into a loss. This is capable, I think, of demonstration, if it does not already sufficiently appear; but I have no time to enlarge, interesting and all important as the subject is.

What motive can we have, sir, to reduce wages and the value of property? When did the sun ever shine upon a laboring people so blessed as those of our country have been? Where have they ever been able by industry to feed, clothe, and educate themselves so well? The history of the world proves nothing more certainly—nothing with clearer demonstration, than that where wages are lowest there is the greatest poverty and suffering; there the condition of the laborer is most forlorn and wretched; there is the least moral and intellectual culture; and there our race is sunk into the depths of political degradation, incapable of raising itself to that lofty elevation attained by a free enlightened people, capable of governing their own affairs. It tends to the opposite of every thing dearest to us, for the descent will carry with it not only wages, but all the high qualities which fit us to be what we are—free and independent. This is a sufficient answer to all that can be said upon the subject.

Such is the remedy for the disease which afflicts our country; and while its advocates shadow forth its evils far beyond any conception of mine, if the bill be carried into effect, as has been proposed here, I must confess that I see in it nothing to soothe or relieve the public—nothing to restore confidence, which is the great and desirable end—nothing to avert future panics—nothing to stop this scramble after the gold and silver going on between us and other countries—nothing that has healing power enough to revive and maintain prosperity.

But, sir, much as remains to be said, I must draw to a close, as my object was merely to notice some leading remarks of Senators, which have developed the new and extraordinary doctrines of this Administration. I was anxious to vindicate the rights of the great mass of the people, who acquire their support by labor, and whose interests, as laying at the basis of all prosperity, I have at all times and on all fitting occasions espoused and maintained with whatever of ability I possess. In this, sir, I have taken great and sincere satisfaction, believing it to be the great end of our free Government, and the only sure means of sustaining it. In the name and in behalf of that great, powerful, and enlightened class of my fellow-citizens of Massachusetts, whom I have the honor to represent, I enter my solemn protest against the doctrines here advanced; and if my voice could reach them in their dwellings, their shops, and on the decks of their vessels, I would exhort them not to be deluded by false theories leading them on to ruin, but to rouse up their energies, and, at the ballot-box, manifest their indignation at all attempts to oppress them by diminishing their business and taxing their labor to enrich others. I would entreat them not to sit still and be made such as they see the distressed and impoverished laborers of Europe and Asia.

NOTES.

The statistics referred to in the remarks of Mr. DAVIS are contained in Porter's Progress of Nations, and Wade's History of the Middle and Working Classes, two recent and respectable authorities, relying for the correctness of the facts contained in the following extracts chiefly upon the statictics collected by the British Government.

These developments show the farmer and all other working men the condition of the working classes in Europe, and upon what limited means they subsist. It is this class of men with whom they are to run the race of cheap production, and consequently of coarse and wretched existence; for the same causes which reduce them to hopeless penury will produce like results here. If a few pence a day will not support men there, it will fail to do it here. The intelligent working man of the United States will pause before he precipitates himself into such irretrievable wretchedness to cheapen the products of labor. He will inquire whether it tends to elevate or depress his race; whether the privileges and hopes of a freeman are utterly delusive, and end in retracing his steps to the degraded condition from which we all believed we had escaped. In his descent from his present commanding position, he may well carry with him these reflections, sit down in despair, and spurn all the dazzling theories of self-government as illusory, if they leave him to subsist on the humble diet, and to grapple with the sufferings of the most desolate portion of mankind.

Wages in France.—Calais common laborers 7½ per day, with board, and without dwelling; Boulogne, 5d. per day, do. do.; Nantes, 8d. per day, without board, and without dwelling; Marseilles, 4d. to 7d. per day, with board, and without dwelling. The food in some districts "consists in rye bread, soup made of millet, cakes made of Indian corn, now and then some salt provisions and vegetables, rarely, if ever, butcher's meat." In others, "wheaten bread, soup made with vegetables, and a little grease or lard twice a day, potatoes, or other vegetables, but seldom butcher's meat."

Sweden.—"The daily wages of a skilled agriculturist are 7d. or 8d.; while the unskilled obtain no more than 3d. or 4d. and board themselves. Agriculturists in the southern provinces live upon salt fish and potatoes: in the northern provinces, porridge and rye bread form their food."

Bavaria.—"Laborers are paid at the rate of 8d. per day in the country," without board.

Belgium.—"A skilled artisan may earn in summer 1s. 2d. to 1s. 5d.; in winter, from 10d. to 1s. 2d.; unskilled half as much, without board, live upon rye bread, potatoes, and milk." Agricultural laborers have less.

Germany.—Dantzig laborers 4½d. to 7d. per day, without board; Mulhburg, 7d. per day, do.; Holstein, 7d. per day, without board.

Netherlands.—South Holland laborers, 3d. to 4d. per day, with board; North Holland, 20d. per day, without board; Antwerp, 5d. per day, do.; West Flanders, 96s. to 104s. per year, with board.

Italy.—Trieste laborers 12d. per day without board; do. 6d. per day with board; Istria, 8d. to 10d. per day without board; do. 4d. to 5d. per day with board; Lombardy, 4d. to 8d. per day do; Genoa, 5d to 8d. per day do. and without lodgings; Tuscany, 6d. per day without either.

Saxony.—"In 1837 a man employed in his own loom working very diligenily from Monday morning to Saturday night, from 5 o'clock in the morning until dusk, and even at times with a lamp, his wife assisting him in finishing and taking him the work, could not possibly earn more than 20 groschen [about 60 cents] per week. Nor could one who had three children aged 12 years and upwards, all working at the loom as well as himself, with his wife employed doing up the work, earn in the whole more than $1 weekly."

Navigation.—Between us and England this is placed upon a footing of equality; all advantage to our navigators being abrogated. If any interest can bear direct competition, this is the one. But let us see the result as set down by Mr. Porter. "In 1821," says this writer, "the proportion of British vessels which entered the ports of the United States was 7 1-5 per cent. compared with the American tonnage employed in the foreign trade of the United States; while, in 1835, that proportion was increased to 39 per cent. The actual numbers in each of the years from 1821 to 1835 have been as follows:

Year.	British. Tons.	American. Tons.	Year.	British. Tons.	American. Tons.
1821	55,188	765,088	1829	86,737	872,949
1822	70,669	787,961	1830	87,231	967,227
1823	89,553	775,271	1831	215,887	922,952
1824	67,351	850,033	1832	288,841	949,622
1825	63,036	880,754	1833	383,487	1,111,441
1826	69,295	942,206	1834	453,495	1,074,670
1827	99,114	918 361	1835	529,922	1,352,653
1828	104,167	868,381

The British increase is 860 per cent.; the American 77 per cent." This is the result of treaties and conventions called reciprocal.

PENSION BILL AND PENSION AGENTS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 7, 1840.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LINCOLN of Massachusetts in the Chair,) and took up the bill making appropriations for the payment of certain Revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States.

Mr. R. GARLAND rose to reply to what Mr. SMITH of Maine had said, and proceeded to read the names of several of the pension agents, together with the amounts of money in their hands, as stated in a printed official return from the Department; among them were General Johhn P. Van Ness, of Washington; Isaac Hill, of New Hampshire; Mr. Brockenbrough, of Richmond, Virginia; and George W. Jones, of Wisconsin. He repeated the question he had put, in the House, to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, viz. whether the pension agents had not the money appropriated by this bill already, in fact, in their hands, and whether such was not the practice of the Government?

Mr. JONES said that he thought he had already fully explained on that subject. He was not prepared to state positively or exactly what the practice of the Government in this respect had been, because he was not in possession of the requisite information; but he presumed that when provision was made to meet the payment of pensions, it was done in time to have the funds required at the several points where they were to be disbursed. He then went into the details of the estimates on which the present bill was founded.

Mr. BANKS, of Virginia, took the floor for the purpose of explaining in relation to Dr. Brockenbrough, of Richmond, whose name had been referred to by Mr. GARLAND. Mr. B. had no more to do with the investigation or payment of the claims of Revolutionary pensioners than the gentleman from Louisiana. His was a merely ministerial agency, in strict fulfilment of law. Mr. B. concluded by moving that the committee rise, and report the bill to the House.

Mr. MARVIN of New York addressed the House at some length on the evils of the existing mode of compensating pension agents, by an advance to them of public money before it was needed, that the use of it might be a remuneration for their services. Mr. M. referred to a debate on this same subject at a former session, and to the positions he had at that time assumed, and the returns which had been called for from the Department. The total amount of pensions annually paid being four millions, not less than two millions of it came into the hands of disbursing agents six months before it was needed. The pretext for this had been that these agents received no salary or pay of any kind; but so badly did the system work, that the Commissioner of Pensions had been continually applying to Congress for an alteration of the law, and the allowance to these officers of a fixed salary. He adverted to the honest exposure made by the late lamented Mr. MCKIM, of Baltimore; and to the fact that a certain agent in the State of New York, disbursed $400,000 annually, and had in his hands $200,000 for months at a time, sometimes four or five months, before it had to be expended. So notorious was the use of these funds by the agents holding them, that a letter had been published from one of them, who received less of these advances than he thought himself entitled to expect, actually complaining openly of that fact, and reminding the Department that the use of the money was the only compensation pension agents received for the duties they performed. Mr. M. never contended that these public officers should not be paid for their services; but so long as the law stood as it now did, it ought to be enforced, and not evaded. There was an express statute, passed in 1836, which provided that they should serve without compensation. The bill, as introduced, made provision for paying them; but, as it was urged that the United States Bank had done the very same duty free of charge, that clause was stricken out, and the duty required still to be performed, as before, free of cost to the Government. The present practice was wrong, and ought to be condemned by the people's Representatives. When this House passed laws, all Executive officers were bound to execute them according to their true intent and meaning, and not to seek modes of evading them.

Mr. M. went on to show that the practice of the agents as soon as the money in their hands under one head of pension was expended, though they might be full-handed under other heads, was immediately to write to the Department for more funds. By this means an agent had been known to keep $200,000 in his hands nearly the whole year round. The money was worth six per cent.; so that such an agent was in the receipt of little less than $12,000 a year—nearly one half the salary of the President of the United States! Was this right? A draft could go from Washington to Albany, where this man resided, in ten days at furthest: why must the money be sent him four, five, or six months beforehand?

Mr. HOLLEMAN said that, if the gentlemen who opposed the bill and complained of the present mode of remunerating pension agents had offered any amendments, or proposed any remedy, what they said would be more to the point. But, after all, what would it amount to? Did the Government lose any thing by the present arrangement?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes; the use of the money.

Mr. H. The money would be in the Treasury.

Mr. MARVIN. Had not we to issue Treasury notes and pay an interest on them of six per cent.? Was this losing nothing? [Cries of "order!"]

Mr. H. said that the Treasury notes had been resorted to because of a temporary pressure on the Treasury—money must be paid, and there was nothing in the Treasury to meet the demand. But as to this advance to the disbursing agents, where was the difference to the Government whether the money lay in the hands of those who collected, or of those who were to pay it out? The money was as liable to be used in the hands of the one as of the other. All the difference was, that one set of agents would gain by it in one case, and another set in the other. The Government made nothing, and it lost nothing, by the present arrangement. Nay: there were some advantages attending it. It prevented a vast accumulation of money which would otherwise take place in the city of New York; now it was dispersed through the country. In the cities, gentlemen charged that it was used for bribery: besides, it was a positive gain to the Government, to the whole amount of the salaries which must otherwise be paid to these officers. Mr. H. however did not approve of the present plan; he would prefer some other mode. But if gentlemen complained, why did not they move an amendment instead of embarrassing the passage of this bill?

Mr. REED of Massachusetts agreed with gentlemen who had preceded him, in the opinion that the present mode of compensating pension agents was a bad one, and ought to be reformed. In practice, however, he supposed it would, just now, make little difference, for he presumed the Administration would soon come to the House and complain that they had no money. But still this was a proper occasion to explain the conduct of the Administration. Under the pretext of giving these agents no compensation, they paid them ten times as much as any salary they could receive by law. Very large sums of the public money were purposely left in their hands, and it was not to be expected that they would not use it. He was for paying these officers directly; then the people would know what it was they were paying; but now it was all secret. He hoped an amendment would be proposed, restraining the Government from making these premature advances of public money under the pretence of getting ready to pay pensions. He never would put it in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to allow one man a salary of ten thousand dollars, and another of five, and another of two, just at his sovereign pleasure. Every body knew that if these men put their money in any bank, with a certainty that it would not be called for for four or five months to come, they could get four or five per cent. interest on it.

Mr. PETRIKIN said that this debate reminded him of the old proverb, "Much cry and little wool." The Opposition gentlemen were eternally harping on economy in little matters, but when matters of importance were brought forward, they always shoved themselves before the wheels, and prevented, if they could, the House from doing any thing. What was the secret of their objection to these agents? They wanted the business thrown into the hands of their beloved banks, who held in their hands thousands upon thousands of the public money, without paying either principal or interest. All this was well. No harm in this. But, when individuals held a few thousand dollars for a little while, what a tremendous shouting they raised! The House had heard nothing of all this uproar when the United States Bank was the disbursing agent of the Government, and held millions and millions of the public money. Complaint was made because these agents did not take money from one head of pension and apply it to another. But they dare not. The law would not let them. Did gentlemen suppose they could gull the people with all this noise? The people, he could tell them, had too much sense to be gulled in this way. But there was another matter he would call these gentlemen's attention to. It was to the perquisites they themselves received, over and above their eight dollars a day. Mr. P. to be sure, shared with the rest, but he did it openly; he did not approve the allowances, but, at any rate, he took them openly, and above board. He did not skulk away in the dark, and cry "thief! thief!" while he was doing the same himself. He was for giving these Government agents a fixed salary; but let it be remembered that they had ten times the responsibility which members of Congress had, yet they could get eight dollars per diem, and a good deal more in perquisites, and take it all very quietly. He hoped gentlemen were not going to object against this bill; he hoped they would let the poor old soldiers get their money. The banks did the very same thing that was now charged on those pension agents. Mr. P. had often gone to them to get the pension money for some poor old fellow, and been told that all the money under that head of pension was out. What! because a man was a Democrat, must he work for nothing? It was very hard times. But the people were not so gullible as gentlemen seem to think. They could see through all this fuss about saving. Still he thought it would be better to give them salaries at once. As for himself, if he had all the money they got, he could make no use of it; it would be idle in his chest; but there might be others who could, and if they could, why, he supposed they would. [A laugh.]

Mr. CRAIG made some remarks, at the conclusion of which he proposed an amendment, (handed to him for that purpose by Mr. R. GARLAND,) providing that no money appropriated should be placed in the hands of pension agents more than one month before the time for the payment of the said pensions.

To this amendment Mr. UNDERWOOD proposed an amendment, providing for an allowance to the pension agents of a certain per centage on the money disbursed by them, but limiting the total amount to be received for such services by each of said agents in one year to $1,500; and prohibiting any agent from using or loaning the public money entrusted to his hands, under penalty of imprisonment for not less than one nor more than five years.

Mr. CRAIG of Virginia said that his object in rising had been to congratulate the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. REED] on the change of opinion which had happened to that gentleman, respecting the best mode of paying the officers of Government.

[Mr. REED. I have not changed my opinion at all. It is now just what it has always been.]

Mr. CRAIG resumed. I state, nevertheless, that the gentleman's opinion has undergone a radical change, and he himself is the witness to it, and that directly, not indirectly. How long has the gentleman held his present opinion? I will ask him what was the mode of compensation when the Bank of the United States was the general receiving and disbursing agent of the Government? What was the gentleman's opinion then? And what will it be if such a bank should again go into operation? If the gentleman complains so much on finding that a few thousands of dollars be here and there in the hands of disbursing agents, what will he say when we substitute for them a bank having in its hands the whole funds of the Government, on which to issue bills and earn discounts? Does not such an institution fleece the community to the amount of millions? Surely; the matter is as plain as the sun at noonday. And is not this paying our agents indirectly? If we may pay a bank in this manner, why may we not pay an individual? Is it not hard that the banks should work for nothing and find themselves? We must, therefore, give them the public funds and the public credit, and the consequence is, they fleece the community. This they have been doing, and this they will do, so long as they are permitted to stretch their arms around the whole community, and squeeze till they have pressed out all the blood from every pore.

But these remarks will be more pertinent when we come to discuss the Sub-Treasury bill. I shall then be delighted if the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MARVIN,] will come up to the mark. If he will then lend us his aid in throwing guards round about the public agents, I, for one, will give him the right hand of fellowship. For ages past, in all our reasoning on the banking system, we have inverted the pyramid of logical induction and tried to make it stand on its apex. We have always been reasoning backwards. Confidence was to be the basis, and banking was to follow; whereas the proper mode would have been, first, to show that the banks were worthy of trust, and then let confidence follow. Will confidence purchase us beefsteaks and pancake? Yes, confidence is produce money, and then money will buy the beefsteak. That seems to be the plan of some gentlemen.

[Mr. REED here rose to explain. The gentleman from Virginia, he said, had totally misunderstood him. He had changed no opinion, nor expressed any change; his doctrine was this, that whenever it was necessary for Government to employ agents, there ought to be an explicit agreement as to the compensation to be allowed them, so that the people might always know what it was they were paying. The gentleman from Virginia talked about the Bank of the United States as an exception to this rule; it was no exception. The Bank and the Government made an express bargain, in which the Bank paid a heavy bonus openly and explicitly for the use of the public money, besides agreeing to do all the duties of a receiving and disbursing agent free of cost. The party aim was plain and explicit, and every body could understand it. But what bonus did these agents pay? or what written bargain did they enter into? There seemed to be a tacit understanding that they were to have the use of some portion of the public money for some time before it had to be paid out—but how long or how much, was left altogether discretionary with the Secretary, and that officer could make a man's compensation ten thousand dollars a year, or one thousand, at his pleasure. The thing had been done, and the practice could neither be denied nor justified.]

Mr. CRAIG said that he did not deny himself to be the subject to party influence; he was in some respects a party man, but it was because he believed that the party with which he acted was founded and built up on the maxim that no party could long exist whose policy was not based on the principles of right; as soon as they shifted their ground, no matter how numerous or how strong they might be, they must ultimately fail.

Mr. C. after some further remarks, submitted (in behalf of Mr. R. GARLAND) the following amendment:

"Be it further enacted, That no money appropriated by this act shall be placed in the hands of pension agents more than one month before the day for the semi-annual payment of pensions."

Mr. STANLY made some remarks, in the course of which he spoke of the refusal of the Legislature of Pennsylvania to take away bank charters, or compel them to resume specie payments. Mr. S. alluded, also, to the proceedings which took place on the last night of the last long session of Congress, when the Sergeant-at-arms had been despatched to the railroad cars to bring back certain departing members, who refused to return. Among the number was the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PETRIKIN] who had spoken in a previous part of the debate, and to a portion of whose remarks Mr. S. replied.

Mr. BEATTY said he did not rise to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] in relation to his colleague, [Mr. PETRIKIN,] for he believed him fully able to vindicate himself from any aspersions; but he got up for the purpose of inquiring of that gentleman from what source he derived his authority for saying that the Legislature of Pennsylvania had refused to compel the banks to resume specie payments.

Mr. STANLY replied, from the public journals.

Mr. BEATTY was understood to recommend the gentleman from North Carolina to have better authority before he made such statements. Every Democratic member had voted in favor of the bill providing for the resumption of specie payments on the 15th of February, and every Whig in the House voted against it. The journals of the Legislature would show further, that when the bill went to the Senate it was referred, in the usual way, to the Committee on Banks. He desired to contradict the broad statement that the Democracy of Pennsylvania refused to meet the responsibility of that measure. He denied it.

Mr. B. was understood further to say that he was present at the night session referred to, and that he had offered a resolution in relation to those members who refused to come back from the railroad cars.

Mr. SERGEANT then rose and addressed the House at some length, though heard at times by the Reporter very indistinctly. He said that what he considered the great evil in the present state (system he could not call it) of the management of this part of the monetary concerns of the United States was the fault in the general management.

The fault was not so much in the payment of pensions or of any other particular fund, as in the utter want of system and of accountability according to law. And here he would take occasion to ask the attention of the committee to this business, according to his recollections. If he should be in error as to any particular, he would be glad that any gentleman should set him right. There was a time when the whole moneys of the United States were under the immediate protection and custody of the law of the United States. There was a period from the year 1816, to the year 1833, or 1834, when the whole moneys of the United States were kept where Congress directed them to be kept. Congress made the laws, and Congress, in certain cases, unmade those laws; but whilst the public money remained as it was then, it was kept under the authority of law, and subject at all times to the authority of both Houses of Congress. This had ceased to be the case in relation to the moneys of the United States. They were no longer so. They were placed under the management of the Executive, and this great change in our money system had been accomplished by means to which he would not advert because they were now a part, a very memorable part, of the history of the country.

It had been said in the course of the debate that the giving to pension agents the advantage of having the money of the United States in their hands was only conferring upon them the advantages which the Bank of the United States formerly had. This was a mistake. The Bank of the United States had never received any advantage at all from the payment of the pensioners; and, if gentlemen would look into the history of the matter, they would find such to be the fact. The whole service of paying the pensions of the United States, with all the risk and labor which accompanied it, was performed by that institution without compensation, directly or indirectly. When Congress chartered the Bank of the United States, certain stipulations were agreed upon between the Bank and the United States. On the part of the United States it was stipulated that their treasure should be deposited in the Bank and its branches until there should be some reason to suppose that it was not safe. This was a fact familiar to all. Congress reserved to itself the power (if it should think proper to exercise it) of imposing an additional burden upon the Bank—that was, of executing the duty of commissioner of loans in any or all the States, transferring public moneys, &c. without commission. By the charter, the Bank was not bound to execute that duty, nevertheless, it did execute it, and without charge. Now what did the United States Bank get? Not a dollar, directly or indirectly.

[Mr. S's voice was here lost for a sentence or two.]

He would call the attention of he committee to another fact, which, in his judgment, would throw light upon this question, and would give it a bearing worthy the consideration of Congress. Before the removal of the deposites, according to his recollection, some one had felt a desire to be appointed pension agent in a State where there was a branch of the United States Bank; and the Secretary of War, supposing he had the power to order military pensions to be paid by any agent he might think proper, gave the United States Bank an order (in New Hampshire) to pass over the funds and books into the hands of an agent there. Upon looking at the act of Congress, it appeared conclusively that the Secretary of War had no such authority, and the thing was abandoned. There were individuals and institutions desirous to have those pension agencies. Why did they desire them if there was no advantage to be derived? An examination into the history of the matter would show presently what the advantage was. The United States Bank declared itself unable to comply with the order of the War Department above alluded to, because it was contrary to law; and, as he had said before, the thing was relinquished. Well, the United States Bank ceased to be the commissioner of loans, it ceased to be the payer of pensions, and it ceased to be the depository of the public moneys of the United States. What was the consequence? That, for all these purposes, the Executive had the selection of the agents; whereas, before that, they were selected by law, under the authority of both Houses of Congress—the Representatives of the people to whom the care of the public purse had been assigned.

What was the next consequence? That what had before been given by law was distributed by favor. Did people ask for these pension agencies without a prospect of emolument? No: and from the period when the management of the public treasure ceased to be thus controlled, up to this day, there had been no system proposed that bore the least evidence of a desire ever again to put the Treasury of the United States, as it was, under the care of the Congress of the United States. All these powers were now in the hands of the Executive. This was a fatal change in the money affairs of the nation, and, in his judgment, the people of the United States would never do themselves justice until they should restore the Treasury of the United States to the custody of their Representatives in Congress, where it once was.

Look at the consequences. No man would say that there was no advantage derived from being a payer of pensions. What was it? It was the possession at all times of a sum of money belonging to the United States; so that if a man were a pension agent for a length of time, he would know what sum he might depend upon always having in his hands. It had been avowed by a gentleman on the other side, that this was the compensation for the services; and thus the pension agents were placed in the same relative condition to the community as banks. What was the advantage of a bank? Its capital. It could lend out its money as an individual could; and, generally speaking, it could do no more. A bank also had its deposites. These varied from day to day; but, nevertheless, it could tell nearly on what it could calculate as its permanent deposites, and upon those deposites it would trade. And if money was placed in this manner in the hands of a pension agent, would he not have sufficient instinct of trade not to keep it unemployed? Could any man fail to see that if such a system were to prevail throughout the money affairs of the United States, the whole Treasury of the United States would be placed in the same situation, and there would be transferred to these depositaries of the public money all the advantages which the United States Bank is supposed to have had, and that, too, without the equivalent which the Bank gave, either in bonus, or its facilities for the distribution of funds? What, then, had been gained by taking it from one set of men or institutions, in order to give it to another?

Mr. S. proceeded to remark on the mode in which these matters were in fact managed at the present time, and to show that, under it, no man could tell how much pension agents might receive. That they received something, was agreed on all sides. Did they get it according to the amount they distributed? No; but according to the amount they had in their hands. There was great objection to the payment of compensation by unknown measures, or to unknown amounts.

Mr. S. alluded to the selection of State banks, or persons immediately connected with State banks, for the performance of these duties; by reason of which, particular banks had the advantage of the public funds to any amount to which they might be awarded to them. He spoke generally—not particularly as to the pension fund, though that was a part. The consequence was, that inducements were offered to trade upon the money of the United States. Were we not told, and had it not been proved, that from the year 1833 and 1834, down to this time, too much of this sort of stimulus had been employed? That we had gone from a state of sound and substantial health into a plethora, from which we were now shrinking away in a manner so rapid as to awaken the most serious apprehensions for the result? Had not our affairs changed so fearfully as to bring us (as was once said in the British House of Commons) within a few hours of the state of barter? How had this happened? By the State bank system. By overtrading with banks—by overtrading in the community, by means of the facilities of the banks. To some this might appear a small affair. In human affairs the greatest concerns of men, considered alone, were small. It was the combination of all these small causes that produced at last the great result.

There was a radical vice in the system which never would be removed until Congress should again take into its own hands the selection of the depositaries of the public money, and the direction and control of the public money, without the intervention of the Executive or any branch of the Executive. He felt it to be his duty on this and on all occasions to declare what appeared to him to be a great fundamental truth—that, as regarded the Treasury of the country, we were living without law, and that thence evils of the most frightful magnitude followed; and what evils were yet to come from the same cause, it would require more than human wisdom to foretell. One solemn truth was known to all—that, at this very moment, the country was in deep distress, and was covered with the gloom of deep apprehension. He declared that there was one great cure—a remedy which had never failed—and he appealed to the history of the country in proof of his assertion—and that was for the Government of the United States to take into its own hands, under custody of the law—not of the Executive, but of both Houses of Congress—as it formerly did—its Treasury, and thus have the regulation of the public funds. Things went well (concluded Mr. S.) when you had a system of that sort—and when you parted from it, things went ill, and have gone worse and worse from that day to this; until at last, upon this matter of pensions, no man can tell how much any pension agent receives—whether $1,000 or $10,000—nor in what way he receives it.

I will vote for a remedy for this particular evil. It falls far short of my idea of a remedy; still, so far as it goes, it is good.

Mr. UNDERWOOD had seen the operation of this pension agency system, and had seen its consequences. In the State of Kentucky there was only one pension agency, and that was located in Lexington, some 200 or 300 miles from the lower end of the State. He lived (the Reporter understood Mr. U. to say) some miles further west, beyond Lexington.

Some years since, in pursuance of a statute which they had, he applied to the Secretary of War for the establishment of a pension agency in his section of country; and stated to the Secretary that, through the instrumentality of the banks in Kentucky, the money of the Government could be disbursed to the pensioners in that State without costing one cent. No agency was established, even on these favorable terms; and, from that day to this, the pensioners in that section of country were put to a semi-annual expense of two or three dollars to obtain the pittance dealt out to them by the Government. Why was this? Let gentlemen look at some sections of country, and they would see that there were some States which had four, five, and even six pension agencies, while others had but one.

Look at the history of this pension fund. Reports from committees had been made here, year after year, calling upon the Secretary of War to establish agencies; he having, by the law as it now stands, power to establish an agency any where in the United States when the public service required it. Why was all this? The reason was plain. By the use of the large sums of money furnished to pension agents for some years, such a profit was attendant on its custody as to make the agencies desirable, and applications had been made for them until some States had six, whilst others had but one. What was the source of the evil? There was a sytem (if system it could be called) by which the appointments of these agents was left to the discretion of the Executive Department of Government, with power to appoint as many as might be deemed requisite. Mr. U. here entered into some calculations as to the profits derivable from the use of the public moneys thus left in the hands of the pension agents.

The President of the United States had denounced the use of the public money without authority as that which ought to be made a felony, and punished as such by law. Now, was it either a good or a safe policy to tolerate the use of the public money for the purpose of giving profits to individuals? Was it not the best plan that could be adopted to induce men to become defaulters? The principle was one which ought to be abandoned, and the sooner it could be done the better. He was opposed, however, to the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. R. GARLAND] These pensions were paid the 4th March and the 4th September. What would be the consequence if the amendment prevailed, which provided that no moneys should be placed in the hands of the agents until within a month of the time of disbursement? The direct and immediate consequence would be, that they could no longer use the money so as to make a profit, and that they would not accept an office, requiring time and labor, but yielding no emoluments. They would resign, and the pensioners might be thus left unpaid. We must, therefore, either allow the principle which all gentlemen seemed to discountenance, of permitting the agents to use the moneys for the purposes of profit, or we must provide by law some per centage on the amount disbursed by way of compensation for the labor. One of the two modes must be adopted. It might be said that there were three plans: the first was, to let the agents work for nothing; that would never do. The second was, to allow them to compensate themselves for the use of the public money. The evils of that plan were numerous and manifest; so much so as to render it unnecessary for him to dwell upon them. The third plan was the one he was about to propose; that was, to allow a per centage on the amount of the disbursements.

Mr. U. was anxious also to avail himself of a principle which had been recommended by the President of the United States, and wished to test the sense of the committee upon it. He desired to know how far the prohibitory principle in relation to the use of the public money by Government agents would meet with the sanction of the Representatives of the people.

Mr. U. then moved the following as an amendment to the amendment:

Each pension agent shall be allowed as compensation for his services —— per cent. on the amount of money disbursed by him: Provided, That no pension agent shall receive as compensation more than 1,500 dollars per annum.

Be it further enacted, That it shall be unlawful for any pension agent to use or apply to his own purposes, or to lend to any person or persons, or to suffer any person or persons to use, any part of the public moneys placed in his hands or subject to his control; and, if any pension agent shall violate the foregoing provisions of this section, he shall, upon conviction thereof before any court of competent jurisdiction, undergo and suffer imprisonment for a period of time not less than one nor more than five years, at the discretion of the jury convicting the offender.

The blank in the first part of his amendment, Mr. U. said, might be filled up in the House.

This, he thought, was the best plan that could be hit upon for the moment to supply the loss of that great system which had been so justly characterized by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SERGEANT,] which was the only safe system, and that to which we must return before the financial affairs of this country could be brought back to their former sound and healthy condition.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON rose and said that there was one great error pervading the country, in the estimation formed of those who were at this time administering the affairs of the nation. It had been thought that they wanted boldness. Never had there been a greater mistake. It required boldness of the highest character, considering the principles upon which this Administration put itself before the country, to come here in the face of the world, and endeavor still further to impose on the credulity of the country, by offering a proposition directly at war with all the principles they had professed upon the leading measure of the Administration.

What was the proposition now made? He appealed to some gentlemen—to some of his colleagues, whom he saw in their seats, and who, he knew, were sincere in their opinions as to the Sub-Treasury, and he would ask them whether they could reconcile their opinions on that subject with the vote which they were now called upon to give? For popular effect, and he believed mainly, if not exclusively, for popular effect, without raising an eye to the great interests of the country, an habitual war has been carried on against the banking institutions of the country. And what was the condition of things in relation to the pension fund at this time? Banks were not appointed agents. None but individuals were appointed. But who are those individuals? For the most part officers, presidents or cashiers of banks, and receiving and discharging the trust, no one doubts, not for their own, but for the benefit of the banks.

Why appoint them? Was it that the benefit might enure to them, instead of the institutions with which they were connected? Did any body believe it? Here was one of those tricks which had so much characterized the practice of this Administration, and by which they accomplished their favorite objects without responsibility. In the first place, the public money was deposited in the banks —and what more? Why, the next branch of the subject was that over which an equal clamor had been raised—What right had the banks or individuals to the use of the public money? All said that there was no such right, unless the Government could thereby save money or make a better contract for keeping and disbursing its funds. And yet, in the face of this, the public money had been and was deposited with individuals, it is true, instead of banks—the profits, however, enuring to the banks, yet without giving to the public that security which the banks would furnish. If the money was deposited in banks, the whole stock of the banks was hypothecated as security. But how was it on the other hand? Could as sufficient security be procured from an individual who was needy enough to accept this agency? Or, in any event, could a security be procured equal to the hypothecation of the whole stock of the banks? Yet, still the cry was, the public money is not to be used. Oh! no—who had the right to use it? No one—neither a bank nor an individual; and yet it was openly avowed here, and by one of the party of the Administration, that that was the best mode of compensation for these disbursements. Give to these agents the use of the public money, although it cannot be done by law, that was the doctrine; and yet we were told by gentlemen speaking in behalf of the Administration, Give this money to the agents that they may use it, instead of giving them a fixed salary.

Now, if the policy here laid down was a just policy in relation to the pension fund, why was it not just, when applied to all others? Why should a douceur be given to private agents for the disbursement of this fund, by permission to have the money for their own profit, and not be given in every other case? If this was the best mode of compensation as applied to the pension fund, was it not so when applied to the keeping and disbursing of all the public money?

What was the great objection to the use of the public money? It was, that it was thereby placed in jeopardy; but if it was as safe when used, and as promptly forthcoming when wanted, and withal kept and disbursed without expense, what objection could there be? And what was there about this particular fund, that it should be deposited in the hands of individuals, and loaned out by them? Why should this fund be put in jeopardy, in danger of being lost, whilst all other of the public moneys is to be more scrupulously guarded? If there was one fund that, more than another, "had need the guard of dragon watch with unenchanted eye," it was this very fund, applied as it was to the wants, and, in many instances, to the necessities, of those who gave us all our institutions; and yet we are told that the cheapest, best plan, was to give it to private agents, that they might loan it out. Was there ever so monstrous a proposition asserted as this, considering by whom it is asserted? The President of the United States had recommended that it should be made felony for any Sub-treasurer or keeper of the public money to touch one dollar; and yet, so far from making it felony in this case, the agent was told that he must use the money, and that this was all the compensation which he would receive. Was there ever such palpable, impudent inconsistency? It was felony to touch any other moneys appropriated to pay the public creditors, because the money was thereby put in jeopardy. But not only was it not felony in regard to this the most sacred of all the funds of the Government, but the agents were absolutely instructed to make use of the money. And the House had been told by a highly respectable gentleman of the Administration party, [Mr. HOLLEMAN,] that this was the only compensation which the agents were to receive. With what grace could the President of the United States turn out of office a pension agent for doing that which he was instructed to do?

But what further? It was seen that this money was deposited in the hands of agents months in advance of the necessity for its payment; and now, at a time when the Government was literally living from hand to mouth, when it had not money to meet its ordinary expenses, these moneys were to be paid out months in advance of the time at which they were wanted. In other words, money wanted for severe present emergencies could not be got, yet money was to be raised and appropriated in advance for the payment of debts not yet due. And, in the mean time, what was done with the money? It was not even to be locked up in the nugatory and foolish manner proposed as to other moneys, to meet a debt due in future—to provide for the expenditures of the Government—but, what makes it worse than foolish and nugatory, it was thus to be raised, and interest paid upon it, that it may be given to agents to be used as they might think proper, and for their own benefit. At a time when the Government could not pay its own debts, it demanded money in advance to be let out for private purposes and individual profit, or, what was worse, the profit of banks.

Nor was this all. How was the money to be got? If any one thing was more disingenuous than another in the message of the President of the United States, it was the covert calls of the Administration for money. What had the President said in a recent message? He (Mr. T.) took some pleasure in the recollection that he had had the good fortune first to make an issue with the President of the United States as to the resources of the Government. It had been denied in the official organ that he, (Mr. T.) when he had made a direct issue with the President upon this point, had only said what every one knew, that there would be a deficiency in the Treasury. This statement had been made directly in the face of that part of the message which said that the resources of the Government for the next year would meet the current expenses of the Government without a resort to loans or taxes. Every body else knew better. No man who valued his reputation would deny it. But Mr. T. was willing to attribute the error to unintentional inaccuracy, but the Globe tells us that it is otherwise. He (Mr. T.) had said on a former occasion, that he knew they would be coming here before long, cap in hand, asking for money; and they would come sooner than was expected. And on what pretext have they come? Why, of unexpected judicial decisions against the Government. Were not those decisions known? Or in any event, might they have not been anticipated? And now they were told that it would be necessary to raise more money. How? Not by an increase of taxes, says the President—not by an increase of the tariff, which is the only means now by which money can be raised. No; that would not do. The tariff regions are to be humbugged by a show of increase, while the Southern section is to be amused by opposition to it. The same game was to be played as was now going on in regard to the Cumberland road. The President's friends in the West say that he is in favor of the road. The South is told that he is opposed to all such works, on constitutional grounds. The tariff was not to be raised—still money must be had—some other means must be resorted to, says the President. What other means were there, but to borrow money upon interest, which they would not do, or to resort to the expedient of the poor spendthrift, who gives his note when he has spent his money; and whilst, with the recklessness and immorality of all spendthrifts, they have no expectation of being able to meet their notes, and no provision made, but must give other notes to pay those which were outstanding, for the sum total of the financial abilities of our American Necka is to give his note.

The matter, then, stood thus. The President wanted money, which was only to be got by borrowing, or by issuing Treasury notes, in either of which alternatives interest must be paid. If we had the money, it would be wrong thus to appropriate it before the occasion occurs for which it is required, with a view to its being loaned out by individuals for individual profit. But it is infinitely worse.

What is the proposition? Why was the House asked to act on this bill with such indecent haste? Were they not setting aside the ordinary business of the country, in order that they might make provision for the payment of a debt that was not due, by paying interest on the very money raised for the purpose? What would be thought in private life of an individual who thus conducted his affairs?

There were thirty or forty agents for the disbursement of the pension fund. The amount proposed to be raised is three millions. The average time which will be required is six months, giving to these agents nearly ninety thousand amongst them. Why, sir, it would be just the same thing to give them this 90,000 without the complex process of borrowing it to give to to them that they may loan it out again. If he (Mr. T.) was not greatly in error on all these points, and, if he was, let it be shown, this struck him as one of the boldest propositions he had yet had occasion to notice.

Mr. STANLY said the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BEATTY] had undertaken to correct him in a matter of fact. The gentleman had said that every member of the Democratic party had voted in favor of the resumption of specie payments on the fifteenth of the month. Mr. S. wished to inquire whether the Democratic Governor of Pennsylvania did not oppose the measure of resumption on the fifteenth, and if he did not get a majority of what he called Democrats, in both branches of the Legislature, to sustain the position he had taken? If so, Mr. S. was right in the assertion he had made in the first instance.

Mr. BEATTY, in reply to this interrogatory, reiterated the denial of the correctness of the assertions of Mr. STANLY; and further denied that the Governor of Pennsylvania opposed the resumption of specie payments. The only difference between the Governor and the members of the Legislature, was a matter of opinion as to the time proper to exercise the power to compel the banks to resume; and he could assure the gentleman from North Carolina, and his associates, who were chuckling so much about the movements of the Governor of Pennsylvania, and a supposed breach in the ranks of the great Democratic party of that State, that their joy on this occasion, like their rejoicings on all former occasions, over victories in embryo, will be of short lived duration. They will find, to their sad mortification and discomfiture, that the Governor has not gone over to the enemy or to the banks. Mr. B. said he should always feel it his duty to repel any reflections of the kind against the authorities of the State he in part represented, and to the best of his ability, vindicate them; and he deprecated the practice some gentlemen had of introducing into debates there, matters entirely irrelevant to subject before the House, and exclusively of a local character.

Mr. B. said he did vote for the Cumberland road bill at the time referred to, but he would not permit any gentleman there to question his right to vote as he thought proper. He was under no party trammels that would compel him to vote for or against a measure that he did not think was in itself proper at the time. He was not placed in the situation of many other gentleman on that floor. He had never yet been driven to the necessity of defining his position there; because it was well known both there and at home. He hoped he had given the honorable gentleman from North Carolina all the information that was necessary to keep him straight or within the bounds of propriety, when he attempts to call into question his votes, or to censure the course of the Governor or Legislature of Pennsylavania. After which,

Mr. SERGEANT rose and said he regretted that the affairs of the State of Pennsylvania had been referred to at all in this House. No man who had looked at the present posture of the affairs of that State could fail to see that she was in the midst of a very great crisis, a crisis which might issue in much good or in much evil, but one about which there could be no hesitation in admitting that the united wisdom and patriotism of her whole people ought to be rallied to one deliberate and calm effort to carry her through it. And (continued Mr. S.) I believe that they will be so. I think I see the evidence of it in the movements which have already taken place, and in those that are now going on. I believe that extreme positions will not be taken, or, if taken, that they will be abandoned for the sake of the public good, when those who take them, like the members of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, shall be convinced they have been in error.

As to the Governor, I have nothing to say. I do not know that he has ever taken any position adverse to that which he now occupies. In relation to him, therefore, I have nothing to say. But in relation to the members of the House of Representatives of that State, (for I have seen nothing yet of the proceedings of the Senate,) in relation to them, I say that the course they have just adopted is in the highest degree honorable to them; that it is, in my judgment, the best augury for a wise administration of the affairs of that State that they have come forward as they have done; that the light which has been thrown upon the subject having convinced them that they were in some respects in error, they are now proceeding wisely to correct those errors, without abandoning any thing which they conceive to be essential. It is unfortunate that this discussion should have been introduced here. Pennsylvania has a Legislature and an Executive of her own; and I, as a citizen of that State, do not feel myself at liberty to enter here upon a discussion of those topics which are to be discussed there, and in regard to which, as I said before, I am happy to see the prospect of a just and wise disposition. My desire, as a member of the Congress of the United States, would be to let them alone—to leave their affairs to their own management—to let the Legislature decide, within the scope of their duty, what is due from them to the people of the Commonwealth, and to all the interests of the people of the Commonwealth, in whatever shape they may present themselves. I do not know that, in the Legislature of Pennsylvania, at this time, and on the question now before it, there is such a thing as a party line. If I understand correctly the debates and proceedings there, as I have read them, the discussion there has been conducted on the grounds of broad justice and liberal patriotism—not on the narrow ground of making or unmaking a President, or of making or unmaking a Governor; but it has been directed to the question of what would or would not contribute to the permanent prosperity and happiness of the Commonwealth; and I trust in God that the Legislature will go on, not mixing up with her deliberations any extraneous matters until they have arrived at the result that will best contribute to those ends. That they will arrive at such a result, I entertain the most certain hope.

Mr. LEET of Pennsylvania rose and said: I take occasion to say, Mr. Speaker, without having three minutes' warning that I should be called upon to take any part in this, to me, unexpected debate, that I sincerely believe that the sentiment which my honorable colleague [Mr. SERGEANT] has expressed, is nothing more than what is due to the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania. If you recur a moment to the causes which have produced the present state of things in that State, you may readily satisfy yourselves that the future prospects of General Harrison or of our present Chief Magistrate, Mr. Van Buren, have had nothing at all to do with the condition in which the Legislature is now placed. In the early part of the session of the Legislature, I think on the 23d of January last, a law was passed authorizing the Governor to negotiate a permanent loan of $870,000, and also a temporary loan of an equal amount, in anticipation of the permanent loan, for the purpose of meeting the interest that would full due on the 1st of February.

The Executive of that State made an effort to procure a loan to pay this interest on her debt; but, owing to the existing condition of our monetary affairs, as to the causes of which gentlemen may conscientiously differ, the money was not to be procured. Such, sir, is the simple fact: it could not be obtained. The question then arose, what was the Governor to do? And what did he do? It is true that, in the House of Assembly, in accordance with what was believed to be public sentiment and feeling, a bill was passed by one of the most decided majorities that has ever been known in that body on a question of currency—the vote standing 69 to 24—fixing the 15th of February (the present month) as the day on which all the banks were to resume specie payments, under a penalty of summary forfeiture of their charters in case of non-compliance. That bill was sent to the Senate. The first of February came, and there was no money to pay the interest of the debt. What, then, was the great question which naturally suggested itself to the Governor? It was, that the honor and faith of the State must be preserved at all hazards, so far as that object could be attained without a compromise of honesty or principle. I cannot say that the Governor was wrong. The Governor then communicated the fact to the Legislature, that on that day the interest on the debt would fall due, and that he was unable to negotiate a loan or to procure the money, and that he could not therefore redeem the faith or comply with the pledges of the State; and recommended the immediate adoption of a joint resolution, authorizing the issue of State stock to meet the interest owing by the State, as an earnest that the State faith would be preserved untainted. Now, sir, I am free to say that the course which suggested itself to me was, that the Executive should have communicated the facts and correspondence with the several banking institutions on the subject, and that he should then have left it to the Legislature (many of the members of which I happen to be acquainted with, and esteem as patriotic men) to determine what course should have been pursued under the circumstances, and what the exigencies of the State demand d. But being, as I well know him to be, anxious to serve the State in the best manner he could, the Governor suggested his belief that, if the fifteenth day of the present month were fixed upon, or any other immediate day, for the resumption of specie payments, it would be out of the power of man to prevent disastrous consequences. And here I must remark, in regard to this suggestion, that although, in the first instance, I was struck with the idea that the Governor had erred, yet he has, I think, upon reflection, compromised no principle—because it was a mere question of time. Probably, the more judicious course would have been, that the Legislature (and I say so with great deference to that body) should have raised a committee to inquire into the condition of all the banks.

[The SPEAKER here interposed, and said that the gentleman was going too much into detail. But, in obedience to loud cries from many parts of the Hall of "Go on—go on—proceed," &c.]

Mr. LEET proceeded as follows: I say, that if the Legislature of Pennsylvania—who, as some gentlemen assert, have receded, and receded at the instance of the Executive, (which I do not admit, because, as I said before, the question was merely one of time)—if the Legislature had appointed a committee to inquire into the condition of the banks, to have ascertained the nature and extent of their resources, together with all other necessary facts, I say that their position would have been precisely what it is now in regard to the resumption bill. Sir, Pennsylvania is as independent a State as any in this Union. It is the State in which I was born, and where all my ancestors have lived. In moral, intellectual, and physical resources, she is inferior to none; and I trust that she will never mix up with the party politics of the day a momentous question involving her credit and honor. I say that the Legislature of Pennsylvania is not justly open to censure from any quarter, because they have done that which a sense of duty as representatives of the people, bound by their oaths of office, constrained them to do. If I had the honor of a seat in that body, and upon a certain day the pledges of the State were to be redeemed, what would be my course? Should I look remotely to the election of a President? Should I look remotely to the election of a Governor? Or should I look to the great interests of the State which I represent; that is, should I comply with the engagements of the State? Certainly; and that I conceive to be the noble principle which has actuated them—that is what they mean to do.

Mr. Speaker, I have spoken according to the best information I possess in relation to the present condition of the affairs of Pennsylvania. I hope those affairs will not unnecessarily hereafter be dragged into discussion in this House. The Representatives from that State, of all political parties are ready, I hope and believe, to vindicate her credit and honor. Let us not bring her concerns into discussion here, when there is no sort of reason for it. She can manage her own affairs. She has made vast and magnificent improvements, and she is saddled with a heavy debt, but she is also possessed of great, aye, of inexhaustible resources wherewith to meet it. The people of that great Commonwealth are too honest and too enlightened ever to give countenance to a violation of public faith.

I feel deeply obliged to the House for its kind indulgence extended towards me in making these few hasty remarks, perhaps somewhat out of order; and should not have obtruded myself upon its attention had not the debate taken the peculiar turn it did.

Mr. BEATTY then rising to address the Chair—

Mr. MONROE moved, with all due deference, he said, to the State of Pennsylvania, that the further consideration of the affairs of that State, now under discussion, be postponed until Monday next, and be made the special order for that day.

Mr. BEATTY expressed his regret that the affairs of Pennsylvania had been introduced, and his determination to vindicate the honor of his State on all occasions, so far as his feeble abilities would permit him to do.

Mr. JONES of Virginia thought that the propositions of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GARLAND] and the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] could have no other effect than to embarrass the bill now under consideration, especially when it was recollected that a bill must shortly come up embracing a general system, and imposing restrictions of the severest character on all public officers into whose hands the public moneys should go. That bill would be open to discussion. The present was merely a bill appropriating money, under existing laws, to individuals entitled to receive their respective amounts.

Mr. BELL wished to inquire of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether the Treasury Department had any information which was in his [Mr. JONES's] possession, as to the present ability of these pension agents to pay the funds hitherto deposited with them, or whether applications had been made from any quarter for indulgence or time?

Mr. JONES said that he was not aware that the Secretary of the Treasury had any such information in his possession.

Mr. BELL. Then I understand that these agents have perfect ability to pay out all the funds now in their hands.

Mr. JONES. If any person is not able to pay out the funds placed in his hands, it is a fact which is not within my knowledge.

Mr. CURTIS hoped the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means would consent to lay this bill aside without taking the question, in order that the House might be placed in possession of information which, judging from the course of his remarks, the chairman was not now able to give. Mr. C. desired the gentleman to be able to state distinctly whether there were funds enough in the hands of the pension agents to meet the demands.

Mr. JONES said it seemed to him that the information sought by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] was already in the possession of every gentleman. There was a statement before the committee showing the amount of moneys appropriated for the several objects of the bill at the last session of Congress. There was also a statement showing the unexpended amounts under each head, and it clearly appeared that, for three classes of pensioners provided for in the third section, there was not enough by one or two hundred thousand dollars. This information was derived from the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. CURTIS. Then he gives me the information which is contained in this bill—which is——

[Mr. JONES. No: there is the information contained in the estimates accompanying the bill.]

Mr. CURTIS. And no other. This book (holding up the estimates) showed that there was no present necessity for an appropriation of more than two or three hundred thousand dollars; and the bill proposed to appropriate about three millions.

Mr. C. well remembered the course of this bill last year, and he well remembered the remarks made by one of his colleagues. When the bill came in two years ago, the then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] at a late hour, proposed that it should be taken up out of its order, as it had been on the present occasion—and that it should be forthwith passed; because, as he said, there was no money to pay the poor soldiers. The Revolutionary soldiers and officers, he said, were daily demanding payment, and there was nothing to give them.

His (Mr. C's) attention had at that time been drawn to the subject, and he had felt bound to call the notice of that gentleman to the state of the documents from the War Department, which had the control of this fund, and he (Mr. C) had been able to allege, as the result of his examination, that there was, at that time, the sum of two millions of dollars in the hands of pension agents. This statement was roundly denied by the gentleman [Mr. CAMBRELENG] in the way so peculiar to himself. It was denied also by a very respectable gentleman from Baltimore, who, on the very next day, came here and stated that he had made a personal examination into the facts at the War Department and at the Pension Office. He then admitted that there was proof that nearly two millions of dollars were in the hands of pension agents, and he then proceeded to say that it was the practice of the War Department to put the agents in possession of funds from four to six months in advance of the time of disbursement; and he justified it, as gentlemen have justified it to-day, on the ground that it was proper, by way of compensation for the services rendered. The then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means produced and had read several letters from pension agents; and he (Mr. C.) remembered that several of them were letters calling upon the Secretary of War for remittances of funds to their hands; and several of them went so far as to say that they would not hold the office unless more money was placed in their hands by way of compensation. One of these agents, residing in the State of Vermont, said that he understood there was a bill pending before Congress providing for the compensation of pension agents, and that, if no more salary was given than that which was contemplated, (which was fifteen hundred or two thousand dollars a year,) it was not worth while to keep the office. That particular agent failed the next week. The Government instituted suit against him, and, Mr. C. was happy to say, either had or would receive the the money. The Government had not been so fortunate in relation to a pension agent at Boston. Persons had sought the offices of pension agents on the ground that they could do the business as well as the United States Bank, and that they were willing to do it on the same terms. This was the commencement of these agencies in the United States. It had been urged here that they would do it on the same terms as the United States Bank—that they wanted nothing. He (Mr. C) would hold them to their bargain until some provision should be made by law in regard to these agencies. If the Government was under the necessity of issuing notes on interest, he was for saving that interest as much as possible.

Mr. C. combatted the idea which had been held out that there was no loss to the Government, and that the money might as well be placed in the hands of the agents. In doing this, he expressed his opinion that there was not at this time more than half a million of unappropriated money in the Treasury. He had seen the signs of what was to come in a paper read recently from the Clerk's desk. There was a great talk now about frauds on the revenue; a number of suits also had been been decided against the Government, and he wished the Treasury Department to show what the recent demands made upon it in relation to these suits were. He did not think that the statement would furnish any justification (so far at least as New York was concerned) for issuing Treasury notes. Whist the Government had to borrow money, he was for retaining it in the Treasury until it was wanted. If the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means would bring in a bill appropriating so much as was proper and necessary to meet the actual demands on agents for the next six months, he would vote for it; but he would not vote for a bill the effect of which was to place two millions of dollars in the hands of agents for their own use.

Two years ago, in the course of a discussion on a similar subject, it was admitted that half of the whole amount appropriated for pensions was constantly on hand with the pension agents? What was the whole amount? About four millions of dollars. How much then did the agents use? Two millions. What was the lawful interest on this amount. One hundred and twenty thousand dollars. And this amount was distributed among the agents, who numbered some thirty or forty.

Mr. WHITE of Ky. desired to put a question to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. If he had understood the matter correctly, an appropriation of two or three hundred thousand dollars would meet all the present demands upon the various pension funds. The present bill, as Mr. W. understood, appropriated one million of dollars. This would leave an excess of between seven and eight hundred thousand dollars after the entire demands for the 4th of March should be discharged; which sum of seven or eight hundred thousand dollars would remain in the hands of the pension agents for six months; that was to say, until the 4th of September next. Was this the state of the case?

Again: He would inquire whether this last named sum would be adequate to the demands for the 4th of September? It would not, be believed. Here, then, would be double legislation. The demand for the 4th of September would be, he believed, fifteen hundred thousand dollars; to meet which there would be this sum of seven or eight hundred thousand dollars. Why this sort of double legislation? He was the last man to refuse all requisite appropriations to meet all the various demands; but he would not appropriate money when there was no necessity.

Mr. JONES said he had a document before him, by referring to which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] could, in a few moments, ascertain the exact amount of money appropriated at the last session of Congress to meet the claims for pensions intended to be provided for by this bill. Mr. J. could not, on the instant, say what the precise amount was, but a few moments' examination would inform him fully on that point.

The gentleman needed not to be under any apprehension as to the large amounts of money which he supposed were to be transmitted to those various pension agencies, because the mere passage of an appropriation bill furnished no funds to the Department with which to meet demands. They were to be looked to from other quarters.

Mr. J. knew it had once been urged here that the mere fact of passing an appropriation bill put so much money in the Treasury of the United States, while the real fact was, that the passage of the bill created a demand upon the Treasury, whilst it brought nothing into it. We were, then, to look to other sources for the means; and if the conjecture of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CURTIS,] were true, that there was not more than half a million of money in the Treasury, it would require more than ordinary ingenuity to show how one or two millions were to be taken out of it to be placed where it had been usual to place moneys for the payment of pensions. All that was asked here was the appropriation of an amount sufficient to meet existing demands under authority of law—the names and amounts being furnished. It would be a new doctrine to pass half the appropriation now, and to receive the appropriation for the other half until the month of September, when Congress would not be here.

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky said the gentleman, in his answer, was only throwing him back upon his own difficulty. He (Mr. W.) wished to know whether this bill provided for the payment of pensions coming due on the 4th of September?

Mr. JONES said that the amount intended to be appropriated by the bill (including the unexpended balances of last year for the same purposes) was intended to cover the whole demand upon the Government for the whole year. The bill provided only for those cases for which appropriations had not been made under other laws, and, as he had said, covered the expenses of the whole year. The doctrine had never been maintained that Congress should pass the one half of an appropriation bill at one time, and the other half at another; and, if such a course was to be pursued, two sessions of Congress in each year would be required. Mr. J. then read extracts from documents accompanying the annual estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the amount of unexpended balances on moneys heretofore appropriated, and which, he said, in addition to the amount asked by this bill, would complete the sum wanted for this service during the year.

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky did not wish to embarrass the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means or this committee. All he wished was a plain statement of facts.

If he understood the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, the present bill provided for the payments coming due on the 4th of March, and also on the 4th of September—and the only necessity which existed for this speedy action was, that probably one or two of the pension funds might be deficient, whilst in others there was a large surplus; so that there was no necessity for immediate action, but for the fact that there might be a deficiency in one or two of the funds. Now, he would ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether there was not a general law providing for the transfer of any unexpended balances in one of the funds to meet any deficiency which might exist in another?

Mr. JONES said there was a general law vesting in the President of the United States the power to transfer appropriations under certain other heads therein enumerated. His (Mr. J.'s) recollection did not enable him at this time to say whether this law was applicable to the pension fund or not. His recollection rather inclined the other way; but he would not say so positively. The law could soon be referred to.

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky. If we now have two million dollars of this pension fund, being five hundred thousand dollars more than is required for present purposes, why should there be action upon the bill at this time? Why increase the fund? If we have a general law providing for the transfer of unexpended balances, from one head of appropriation to another, why bring the bill thus prematurely up? I ask the committee to rise until inquiry can be made. If there is no necessity for the immediate appropriation of this money, I hope no man is ready to put his hands into the Treasury for it. I move that the committee rise.

And, that motion having been agreed to, the committee rose and reported progress.

Whereupon the House adjourned.

SPEECH OF MR. JENIFER, OF MARYLAND.

In the House of Representatives, Friday, December 13, 1839—The question being on Mr. PROFFIT's motion to reconsider the resolution of Mr. SMITH of Maine, that the House at this time proceed to the election of a Speaker—

Mr. JENIFER said he understood the question before the Chair to be upon the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PROFFIT] to reconsider the vote upon the resolution "That this House, at this time proceed to the election of a Speaker," for the purpose of enabling him to offer a resolution to carry into effect an express order of the House.

Mr. J. said he was gratified that the gentleman from Indiana had moved the reconsideration. It would afford gentlemen once more an opportunity of pausing before they committed an act in direct violation of the rights of New Jersey, of her Representatives upon this floor, and of the order of this House unrepealed, now on your table. It will be recollected that the House by a large vote had resolved "to hear and adjudge upon the elections, returns, and qualifications of all claimants to the seats contested upon this floor, before a Speaker is elected." And now it is proposed to disregard this resolution by electing a Speaker without deciding which of the New Jersey claimants are entitled, and by refusing to permit either of them to vote. Mr. J. asked where are the pledges of gentlemen, that after the roll was called over, the rights of New Jersey should be decided on before they proceeded to the election of a Speaker? He called on honorable gentleman to fulfil their pledges; on that portion of the House which regarded their obligations, not to avail themselves of a trick by which they have deceived their opponents.

By a tie in the vote of this morning the question was lost—that J. B. AYCRIGG and his four colleages were entitled to their seats under the commission of the Governor of New Jersey; the vote stood 117 on both sides. Had the question been stated negatively instead of affirmatively, the decision would have been the reverse. And how was that vote accomplished? Gentlemen boast of having gained a victory by the vote of this morning. If it is a victory, it is a discreditable one; and if I show that it was effected by gross deception, the language which I use will not be considered too harsh to be applied to the perpetrators of it. Mr. J. said, when his friend and himself came here this morning, it was their desire and intention, as far as in their power, to settle the question of the New Jersey contest as speedily as possible, and proceed to the organization of the House. With that view, his friend from Virginia [Mr. WISE] had moved the resolution that J. B. AYCRIGG and his colleagues were entitled to their seats; and all that we desired was a fair expression of the vote of the members on the resolution. It was known that the vote would be a close one. It was known that Mr. HAWES, of Kentucky, although ill in his bed, could be brought to the House, if his vote were necessary. It was also known that one or two gentlemen of the Administration party had expressed their opinion that the members having the Governor's commission were entitled to their seats, and that they so intended to vote. In addition to which it was stated by a gentleman, now in my eye, that Mr. KEMPSHALL, of New York, the only absent member, had arrived in the morning cars. Under these circumstances, we did not desire to postpone a decision upon the New Jersey contested election, when every member elect of the 26th Congress was in the city of Washington, and, therefore, we united with the Administration party in demanding that the question be taken. Nor was it considered proper to risk the health of a fellow-member by bringing him to the House, when his vote was not indispensable. The House proceeded to take the question on the resolution that J. B. AYCRIGG, &c. are entitled to their seats; when it was ascertained that Mr. KEMPSHALL, of New York, had not arrived—that one, if not two, of the members who have pledged themselves to vote for the New Jersey claimants, who had the regular certificates of the Governor, contrary to their declaration, voted in the negative. Thus, by a palpable deception, the New Jersey members were excluded from their seats, when, had there been a fair expression of the voice of the House, there would have been a majority of two, if not four, in their favor. Notwithstanding which, gentlemen propose to go into the election of a Speaker at this hour of the night, and to effect, by stratagem, that which they cannot do by a fair and full vote of the House. And yet they proclaim here that they are actuated by conscientious motives!

[Here Mr. J. at the suggestion of Mr. GRAVES, yielded the floor for a motion to adjourn, which being decided in the negative, Mr. J. was about to proceed, when Mr. SMITH, of Maine, moved the previous question.

Mr. J. contended that his having given way for the motion to adjourn did not deprive him of his right to the floor.

Mr. SMITH insisted that the floor having been yielded, he had the right to move the previous question.

After some further remarks from Mr. GRAVES and Mr. WISE upon the point of order]—

Mr. JENIFER resumed, and said that he was not surprised that the member from Maine was unwilling for him to proceed; he could not but be restive under an exposition of such facts as these under this floor. The member has said that our object is to consume time. Mr. J. said we intend to take time to expose to this House and the country the means which have been resorted to deprive the State of New Jersey of her Representatives in this House. The truth must and will out, however unpalatable to the member of his friends. The call to order and for the previous question comes with an ill grace from that member, for it cannot have escaped notice that he has consumed more time, and been more disorderly, with, perhaps, the exception of one other near him, than any member on this floor. And his repeated calls for the previous question, after having spoken at length himself, show that he fears to afford an opportunity for reply. Mr. J. said it would be well to review the proceeding of the last ten days, for the purpose of seeing who have delayed the organization of the House, as well as to test the consistency of those who have taken the lead in the Administration ranks.

On the first day of the session, the Clerk commenced, as usual, to call over the names of the members elect from the different States, commencing with the State of Maine; and after progressing as far as New Jersey, and calling Mr. RANDOLPH, from that State, immediately stopped the call, read the certificate of J. B. AYCRIGG, and stated that there were four others of precisely the same tenor, and refused to proceed unless directed by the members present. Notwithstanding which, the official organ of the Government (the Globe) led off with a statement that the Clerk was interrupted in the call of the roll, and was not permitted to proceed; which statement although endorsed here upon this floor, every gentleman present knows not to be true. The Clerk had declined to call either of the members from New Jersey except Mr. RANDOLPH, and persisted in refusing, or to put any question to the House save that of adjournment. Days having been spent in this unprecedented state of things, the House, to relieve themselves from their embarrassed condition, indignant at the arrogance of the Clerk in taking his seat at the desk, calling such members as he deemed proper, and refusing to call the gentlemen from New Jersey who had regular certificates from the Governor, you, Mr. Chairman, were unanimously called on to preside. This step was hailed with general acclamation, and the surrounding galleries audibly proclaimed their gratification at a move which seemed to disembarrass us from the disgraceful position to which we had too long submitted. You had just avowed your opinion that it was the duty of the Clerk to call the names of such members as produced regular credentials, according to the laws of their State and the Constitution of the United States. You had, by an argument which was irresistible, awakened the members to a sense of their situation, and of their duty to organize the House of Representatives according to the uniform practice of our predecessors, and by giving proper credence to the constituted authorities and laws of their respective States. You had scarcely entered upon the duties assigned to you as Chairman, when you are called on by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. DROM-GOOLE) to instruct him which of the members from New Jersey were to be permitted to vote in the organization of the House. And upon your replying "that the Chair conceived the rule to be that such persons as possessed commissions in conformity with the Constitution and laws of New Jersey were entitled to vote as members of this House, and that none others were entitled;" for thus having responded to a call made on by one of the tellers, you were instantly charged by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL,] with having committed an "act of gross usurpation," and by my colleague [Mr. F. THOMAS] "of a monstrous usurpation," with similar denunciations from various quarters, equally at war with decorum and delicacy. Those gentlemen seem to have imagined that you, Mr. Chairman, had been placed there to act accordingly to their dictation; to obey their will; to further their illegal, unprecedented measures; that you were to be an automaton, to nod your head whichever way they thought proper to pull the wires. They have been disappointed. They have not found in you so pious a Clerk as to be too conscientious to discharge your duty.

[It was here proposed by several members to adjourn, it being past 8 o'clock at night]

Mr. J said, in obedience to the wishes of his friends around him, he would move an adjournment, and would conclude what we had to say in the morning; in doing which he would occupy the attention of the House but a few moments, or, if gentlemen were sincere in their professions in desiring the question to be taken on the resolution, he would waive his right to the floor, and permit it to be put at 12 or 1 o'clock to-morrow, when the members who were sick might be present, as also all others who desired to vote.

[The motion to adjourn being lost]—

Mr. JENIFER continued and said, it was now apparent that the object was not that the question should be taken speedily, but that it should be taken in the absence of members who could not vote to night in consequence of the dispensation of Providence. This is the consistency of gentlemen who express a desire that there should be a fair and full expression of the Representatives of the people.

Mr. J. said he would further test the consistency of some gentlemen. It has been argued that the New Jersey members should not vote in the organization of the House, because they are interested. What interest have they, not common to other members, in the ordinary transactions of the House? If that be a sufficient ground why a member should not be entitled to vote, let us see if we cannot find some direct interest in former members of Congress in giving their votes upon certain occasions, which were both countenanced and approved by gentlemen now and then present. What was the fact in relation to our present Minister to England? Did he not preside over this House for weeks, perhaps months, with a letter from President Jackson in his pocket, that he intended to appoint him Minister abroad—during which period many exciting and nearly balanced questions, in which the Administration felt deep interest, were decided in this House, and some by the casting vote of the Speaker—at the same time that arrangements were making to elect to the Chair the favorite of the President? Will any gentleman undertake to say, had Mr. Speaker Stevenson given a vote contrary to the wishes of the Administration, or refused to lend his aid in the election of his successor to the Chair, that President Jackson would not have instantly recalled his letter of promise to appoint? Was not here a direct interest? Did not the appointment depend upon the Speaker's vote and action? Had it not the effect of controlling both?

Mr. J. said there was another case in point still more recent, and which has been noticed on a former occasion—he meant that of the present Minister to Austria. At the extra session, Mr. Muhlenberg had evinced symptoms of dissatisfaction with the Administration, and at the meeting of the regular session of the 25th Congress, when this House stood so nearly divided upon certain measures of the Administration, that not a vote could be dispensed with, he kept entirely aloof—waiting to see where he could be most felt. His rival in Pennsylvania, Governor Wolf, had received a lucrative and high appointment in Washington, and his claims had been overlooked. Thus he stood with his arms folded; when the contested election between Claibone and Gholson, and Prentiss and Word, afforded another opportunity of evincing the domestic diplomacy of the Administration. The majority of this House depended upon the issue of that contest, and some two or three members were tantalized with the expectation of receiving this mission. By the casting vote of Mr. Speaker Polk, Prentiss and Word, returned here with a majority of 6,000 of the votes of Mississippi, were driven from their seats and sent back for a third election. Up to the moment the vote was taken in the House, Mr. Muhlenburg remained perfectly quiet; and when he gave his vote against Prentiss and Word, by which a tie was produced, great surprise was expressed by many members present, which, however, was dissipated, when on the next day he was nominated by the President of the United States to the Senate as Minister to Austria! Where could there have been a more direct interest in voting, than that by which a member of this House obtained an appointment of minister abroad? Had Mr Muhlenburg voted to retain Prentiss and Word in their seats, no matter how conscientiously he believed them entitled, no gentleman will undertake to say that he could have received the appointment. It follows then, as an indisputable fact, that it was not his diplomatic qualifications, or his knowledge of the Dutch language, to which he is indebted for his mission, but the penetration of the Executive in finding out his accessible points.

This reference to the Mississippi election calls to mind the ingenious defence which my colleague [Mr. F. THOMAS] had made against a charge of inconsistency as to his course in relation to that contested election and the New Jersey case. At the extra session he delivered a speech in favor of Gholson and Claiborne's right to their seats, and the principal ground upon which he based his argument was the right of the people to elect their Representatives, regardless of forms of interposition of Executive authority. The will of the people was then, as now, urged as paramount to all other considerations. Their voice should be heard and their wishes conclusive, and neither the Governor of the State nor judges of the elections should deprive the dear people of the Representatives of their choice. This was the Democratic doctrine then and now preached. Let us see the practice. At the regular session, after a regular election held in the State of Mississippi according to the laws and Constitution of the State, Prentiss and Word were returning to Congress by a majority of 6,000 votes over Gholson and Claiborne. What was the Democratic doctrine then? "Res adjudicata" was set up as a sufficient plea to deprive the people of Mississippi of their Representatives, and the people's voice was unheard by my colleague or his friends, and Prentiss and Word, with this undisputed majority, were denied their seats. But my colleague says he made no speech upon the case. No, he could not go that; because at the extra session, he had made one in favor of Gholson and Claiborne, which applied so directly to the sustaining of Prentiss and Word at the regular session, that he could not, except by taking directly opposite ground, oppose their right to seats. Yet, with his speech then fresh in his recollection, as it seems to be now, he voted—and how did he vote? To sustain the people of Mississippi in their expressed wishes? To give to their Representatives just chosen by a majority of 6,000 votes their seats upon this floor? To carry out his Democratic doctrine, that the voice of the people was paramount to all other considerations, and should be obeyed? No; he voted to disfranchise the State of Mississippi; he voted to send home Prentiss and Word with this overwhelming majority. And what was the consequence? The Administration party succeeded in their views here. But Prentiss and Word triumphed again at home, and were returned back by the people to take their seats in this hall, to the mortification of those who were accessory to such a flagrant disregard of the people's will. Then it was that the blush of shame should have come over the cheeks of those who had been the principal actors in working this injustice. Deep must have been their mortification to witness this rebuke from the people when these two gentlemen, a second time, came to claim their rights as the Representatives of their State.

Referring to this matter (Mr. J. said) reminded him of an impromptu which was sent him from the ladies' gallery whilst the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] was eloquently denouncing the inconsistent conduct of gentleman who were in the habit of professing one thing and practising another, when he exclaimed,, "Oh, shame! where is thy blush?"—which he was sure the House would pardon him in reading, as is so immediately applied to the present case:

Where is thy blush, oh honest shame!
Permit her then to speak:
Shame would be shamed to find her blush
Upon that member's cheek.

Such were the indignant feelings excited by an exposure of the political morality of members here in the breast of those who are always disposed to extend the utmost charity.

Mr J. said it was truly amusing to witness the ingenuity displayed by gentlemen in shifting their course, evading the true question, and their efforts to produce a false issue. The two gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT and Mr. PICKENS] who had been prominent in this debate, and who have taken directly opposite grounds in argument, come nevertheless to the same conclusion. Both of them advocate State rights and the will of the people; neither of them act, correspondent to his professions. They proposed to elect a Speaker without permitting New Jersey to have her vote, although it is unanimously admitted that she has present here her quota of legally elected Representatives. The first gentleman [Mr. RHETT] believes that Mr. AYCRIGG and his four colleagues are as much entitled to their seats on this floor as he himself from South Carolina is. The other, [Mr. PICKENS,] professing a great regard for the will of the people, repudiating the constituted authority of the State of New Jersey, disregarding the legal credentials furnished by the Governor, insists upon the right of Mr. DICKERSON and his four friends to seats, without any credentials whatever from the proper authorities, but upon a bare allegation that they have a majority of the votes of the State. And now, when a vote has been taken and lost, that Mr. AYCRIGG, &c. are entitled under the certificate of the Governor to participate in the organization of the House, the two gentlemen from South Carolina, one voting that Mr. AYCRIGG, &c. are, the other that Mr. DICKERSON, &c. are, duly elected, now shake hands together, and agree that neither are entitled to seats. The one has, therefore, yielded his principles; the other, with equal rapidity, has compromised his; by which it is expected to elect an Administration Speaker—for it may all be summed up in that irresistible argument. How can the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] reconcile his present position to himself, if he were sincere, of which I will not permit myself to doubt, when he so elegantly defended the rights of the people of New Jersey against Executive interposition, and so strongly urged the claims of Mr. DICKERSON, &c. before the House had voted upon those of Mr. AYCRIGG, &c? How is it that the former were the legal Representatives before the latter were rejected, and now have no claims whatever? Where is the resolution he intended to offer, that Mr. DICKERSON and his colleagues are entitled to seats? Does he still believe them to be entitled. If so, and he and his friends who have a majority in this hall to-night permit a Speaker to be elected without New Jersey participating in the organization of the House, they will do rank justice to that State; they will have mocked the people of it, and have wilfully deceived Mr. DICKERSON and the other four Representatives who stand here prepared to enter upon their duties; or are they willing too to stand off and see New Jersey and their constituents kept at bay until the party have accomplished their object? If the gentlemen from South Carolina and the New Jersey claimants have compromised to waive her right to be represented until a Speaker is elected, then let us hear no more of State rights, and a respect for the will of the people; attempt no longer to dupe them, or deceive us; do not longer "hold the promise to the ear, and break it to the hope." The time was when State rights were respected—when this Executive influence, which has been so vehemently denounced, was warring against those rights—when that gallent State (South Carolina) stood united and almost alone in defence of what she defined as State rights; and however much many of us differed with her in the extent to which she carried her doctrines and mode of redress, still there was a feeling throughout the country of admiration at her moral and political courage, in defending herself against the Union, when she believed herself oppressed. All minor considerations of political differences were merged in the common cause, and the State of South Carolina presented an undivided front. She did not pause to inquire whether the inpending conflict originated in the imprudent zeal of her leaders, or in the abuses of the powers of the Federal Government; it was sufficient for her that her citizens were threatened with the bayonets of the Federal army—that President Jackson, by his proclamation, had denounced them as rebels. She nailed her Palmetto to the mast head, and recreant would have been that son who would not have bared his breast to defend her from such pollution. And can it be that, in so short a space, the advocates of State rights shall now be found enlisting under the banners of consolidation? And that this House in its unorganized condition, shall have the right to disfranchise a sovereign State, deny her Representatives a participation in our measures, and place her emphatically without the Union? If this be the State rights principle for which South Carolina has been contending, then is it indeed a political humbug.

It is however refreshing to look around and see how Georgia stands. Represented here as she is by gentlemen of adverse opinions upon the great political questions in relation to the General Government; coming, too, as some of them do, with their prepossessions in favor of the Administion; still upon a question involving a more vital State rights interests than any ever yet agitated in this body, they cannot consent to abanden those principles, even to elect an Administration Speaker. What a contrast does Georgia present to South Carolina! She goes for the rights of the States, and not for the benefit of a party, when their measures are adverse to those rights; whilst others who appropriate to themselves all the chivalry of the land, and who boast of first unfurling the banner of State rights, and planting themseves under the Palmetto standard, have this day united with the crusaders in trampling down the rights of a sister State.

Mr. Speaker, in this crisis of our affairs, in this House, and in this country, South Carolina has assumed a heavy responsibility. But a short time since, and her talented sons upon this floor, and in another part of this Capitol, were making their voices heard and felt in effective denunciation of Executive patronage, of Executive abuses, of Executive control over the Legislative branches. But now, these voices have been hushed. The tariff, internal improvement, extravagant expenditures, and all those measures which were the groundwork of opposition of the Administration, have ceased to create alarm. The sentinels upon the watch-tower have grounded their arms and demanded a parley. Have those abuses become less odious from long and continued endurance, or has familiarity with them rendered them more palatable? If a closer connection with the actors so effectually strip their measures of their burdensome tendency, it were well to inquire "where the benefit is to enure." The present Administration have ample cause to congratulate themselves. Pursuing, as they have done, the same course which they commenced; going on, step by step, to increase their patronage, and extend their influence, without abating a particle of extravagance, they have made converts of their opponents, and now number them in their ranks.

By what magic process this has been accomplished has not yet been fully developed. Time will demonstrate the means by which that patriotic zeal which spurred on a gallant band, with such fearful odds, to resist the abuses of the Federal Government, has been quenched. Time was when South Carolina needed no aid to assert her principles, or to defend her rights. She could have stood alone against the whole United States. Now so weak as to have fallen in the arms of the Administration!

SPEECH OF MR. PICKENS,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, February 13, 1840—On the two per cent. fund, the Cumberland road, and the power of the Government to make internal improvements.

Mr. PICKENS rose and said:

Mr. SPEAKER: When I moved yesterday that the House adjourn, (the first time I ever made such a motion,) I did it not with a view to protract this debate, or to enter into a lenghty discussion of the subject, but with a desire to present the reasons which influenced me in making the original motion, and the accompanying remarks which I submitted a few days ago. And, sir, I should not now have entered particularly into this debate, if I had not been pointedly alluded to by several gentlemen on both sides, and who have thus made it almost imperious on me to trespass, for a few moments, upon the attention of the House. I confess, Mr. Speaker, that I listened, with pleasure, to the well-turned periods and mellow voice of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOFFMAN,] who always seems to strike those chords which vibrate through this House with more perfect delicacy than any other gentleman on this floor. Yes, I must say that I listened, with great pleasure, to the eloquent gentleman from New York—an ornament to his great and noble city: I mean a noble city, because she is rich in resources, and rich in commercial enterprise. But, in other respects, she presents to my mind a most singular spectacle, producing, probably, the greatest compound of interests of any city on this continent—a collection of novi homines—from the proud and princely merchant, who rolls in his coach and four, to the Loco Foco that sleeps in the market and lives upon bone-soup—presenting a heterogeneous mass of contradictory combinations, which remind me of nothing so strongly as Shapspeare's allusion to

> "Liver of blaspheming Jew, > Nose of Turk, and Tartar's lips,"

All mingled together—

"Chaldron boil and bubble—double, double, toil and trouble."

A most extraordinary, and, upon the whole, interesting city!—and of which I take pleasure in saying, the gentleman is the ornament and the pride.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, I must, at the same time, confess that I listened with regret to some of the partisan remarks in which the gentleman thought proper to indulge. Upon this question, and upon all others connected with the fiscal action of this Government, I have higher objects in view than to stoop to party discussion. I will not even stop to pluck the barbed arrow from the sides of the Executive, even though it should be shot from the "loud-twanging bow" of Achilles himself. I have higher objects in view. The strongest solicitude I now feel on all public questions, is directed to the realization of the firm hope and belief that the Constitution of my country is to be raised from the dust and ashes, where it has too long been trampled upon, and made the sport of party and of party interests.

Sir, we have arrived at a very peculiar juncture in public affairs. It is probably the first time, since the year 1789, that we have had a fair opportunity of placing the Government of our country on a true Republican tack We have been more or less involved, directly or indirectly, with great interests, which rendered it next to impossible that we could place the Government where the framers of the Constitution intended it to be; and in the present juncture of our affairs—with no national debt—with a system of taxation approaching to free trade, and a reasonable hope of peace, there can be no reason, no pretext, why we should not set about this great work at once, and start the Government upon those just and forbearing principles, compatible with the genius of our institutions, and which alone can give quiet and permanent union to a turbulent and excitable people. It is in connection with this view of the subject, that I feel a deep interest in the question now pending before the House; not that I am particularly opposed to the Cumberland road, or to the supposed interest which the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, may happen to have in it; but because it involves great and vital principles; vital to the Constitution; vital to the purity of this Government and the Union of these States. I am opposed to it because it is well calculated to form a precedent which is hereafter to be held up and quoted, as it was quoted yesterday by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOWARD,] in his eloquent speech, as a precedent for future Congresses—a precedent which, in my judgment, rides over the Constitution, and transfers to the majority on this floor the power to make the Constitution what they may suppose that their interests call upon them to make it.

Before I go into the general subject, I beg leave to refer, for a moment, to the remarks submitted a day or two ago by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MASON,] who placed the obligation to make this appropriation on the ground of a specific contract. Yes, sir; that gentleman, whose eloquence, "like mine Uncle Toby's," seems to consist in its pauses, dwelt upon the contract. He claims the bond. He stands up for the bond even stronger than Shylock; and he demands, not only the pound of flesh, but the blood too. He placed the matter on a special contract, and, with great parliamentary courtesy, proclaimed that those who differed from him upon this subject were "ignorant, narrow, contracted," and, to use his own classical expression, "niggardly." Now, let us examine what this contract is; and if it should turn out that there is a special trust fund set aside by the very acts which the gentleman himself has quoted, and that we are made a trustee under those acts, then I say it is sound law that, when the trust fund is faithfully exhausted, you can no longer claim execution of the contract; or, in other words, if you file a bill in chancery for the specific performance of the contract, and it is set forth and proved that the trust fund is exhausted, nay more, exausted five times over, according to that great rule that he who asks equity must first do equity, a decree would be rendered against the complainant, and he would have to refund. If I show this by incontestable record, I humbly submit to the gentleman that his special contract, must of necessity, fall to the ground. I shall demonstrate this before I take my seat, beyond the possibility of refutation or denial.

In the first place, then, and in order to be certain of the terms of the contract, I will refer to it. The first act which we have on the subject, was passed in the year 1802. It was the act by which Ohio was admitted into the Union, and the provision bearing upon this point is in the following words:

SEC. 7. "That one-twentieth part of the nett proceeds of the lands lying within the said State, sold by Congress, from and after the thirtieth of June next, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be applied to the laying out and making public roads, leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio, to the said State, and through the same; such roads to be laid out under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the several States through which the road shall pass."

The next act bearing upon the point, was passed in 1803. By the act I have just read, one-twentieth part of the nett proceeds of the public lands in the State of Ohio, was set apart for purposes of internal improvement. In the year 1803, that provision was somewhat altered by the following:

SEC. 2. "And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, from time to time, and whenever the quarterly accounts of the receivers of public moneys of the several land offices shall be settled, pay three per cent. of the nett proceeds of the lands of the United States, lying within the State of Ohio, which, since the thirtieth day of June last, have been, or hereafter may be, sold by the United States, after deducting all expenses incidental to the same, to such person or persons as may be authorized by the Legislature of the said State to receive the same; which sums, thus paid, shall be applied to the laying out, opening, and making roads within the said State, and to no other purpose whatever; and an annual account of the application of the same shall be transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury by such officer of the State as the Legislature thereof shall direct; and it is hereby declared that the payments thus to be made, as well as the several appropriations for schools, made by the preceding section, are in conformity with, and in consideration of, the conditions agreed on by the State of Ohio, by the ordinance of the convention of said State, bearing date 29th of November last."

It will be seen by this clause, that Congress so far altered the act which set aside one-twentieth part of the proceeds (which is equal to five per cent) as to appropriate three-fifths of the same to the State itself, to be managed and laid out according to its own views of its own local interests, leaving two per cent. of the fund undisposed of. In the year 1806, we had the first act making a specific appropriation to the Cumberland road, and the clause of the act which relates to the point I am now discussing, is in the following words:

SEC. 6. "And be it further enacted, That the sum of thirty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to defray the expense of laying out and making said road [Cumberland road.] And the President is hereby authorized to draw, from time to time, on the Treasury, for such parts, or at any one time, for the whole of said sum, as he shall judge the service requires, which sum of $30,000 shall be paid, first, out of the fund, of two per cent. reserved for laying out and making roads to the State of Ohio, by virtue of the 7th section of an act passed on the 30th day of April, 1802, entitled 'An act to enable the people of the eastern division of the territory northwest of the river Ohio, to form a Constitution and State Government, &c. and for other purposes;' three per cent. of the appropriation contained in said 7th section, being directed by a subsequent law, to the laying out, opening, and making roads within the said State of Ohio: and secondly, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, chargeable upon, and reimbursable at, the Treasury, by said fund of two per cent. as the same shall accrue."

That was the first specific appropriation; an appropriation of $30,000 to the survey and commencement of the road; and if it should be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, provision was made for the reimbursement back to the Treasury, out of the two per cent. fund.

We have thus seen that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MASON] is correct in stating that there was a specific fund. I have quoted the provisionary clauses which bear upon and define it; and to show how remarkably guarded Congress has been, I will now quote two other other acts passed more recently, indicating that Congress did consider this as a trust fund, and intended to appropriate at different periods so much money and no more. And no ground can be raised directly or indirectly upon which to rest the demand for this appropriation, except upon the principles laid down by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOWARD,] who, I must say, put himself upon much higher ground than that of a specific contract; knowing, as he did, that it was too weak to carry him through, he paid little or no attention to it. Sir, the gentleman was right. Rest the case upon that contract, and it must fail before any court of chancery in the civilized world.

But I proceed to show how guarded Congress has been, and with this view, I quote from an act passed June 24, 1834, for the continuation of the Cumberland road:

SEC. 4. "That, as soon as the sum by this act appropriated, or so much thereof as is necessary, shall be expended in the repair of said road, agreeably to the provisions of this act, the same shall be surrendered to the States respectively, through which said road passes: and the United States shall not thereafter be subject to any expense for repairing said road."

I now quote another clause from an act passed March 3, 1835:

SEC. 3. "And be it further enacted, That before any portion of the sum by the second section of this act appropriated, shall be expended in the repair of said road east of the Ohio river, agreeably to the provisions of this act, the same shall be surrendered to, and accepted by, the States respectively, through which said road passes; and the United States shall not thereafter be subject to any expense in relation to said road."

By this it will be seen that it was expressly intended that the Federal Government should not be subject thereafter to any expenses in relation to this road; and here it is to be remarked, that if gentlemen put the appropriation on the ground of contract, they must take the whole contract, as indicated at different times, and not a part of it.

But I proceed now to show, on the authority of documentary evidence, that this trust fund, thus set aside by the first acts which have been referred to, has been exhausted more than five times over. With this view, I will read the estimates of the amount expended on the road, as reported to this House, in document No. 350, from the Treasury Department, April 23, 1838:

1st. The aggregate amount of the three per cent. fund actually paid to the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, is -	$1,459,467 28
This is the three-fifths of the five per cent. fund.
Aggregate amount of two-fifths of five per cent - - -	972,978 20
Aggregate amount of the five per cent. - - -	2,432,445 48

This, then, is the whole of the trust fund, so far as the land is sold. Let us now see what has actually been expended at different times upon this road. The same document will show what has been appropriated for the Cumberland road, its continuance, repairs, &c. to the 31st of December, 1837:

For the Cumberland road, east of the Ohio - - -	$1,657,325 20
For the repairs of the Cumberland road, east of the Ohio -	1,126,686 82
	$2,784,012 02
For the Cumberland road in Ohio -	1,943,461 95
For the Cumberland road in Indiana	985,000 00
For the Cumberland road in Illinois	596,000 00
For the survey of the road from Wheeling to the Mississippi -	10,265 85
Aggregate amount appropriated for the Cumberland road - -	$6,318,739 82
Aggregate amount of two-fifths of 5 per cent on the nett proceeds of land sold in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, up to the 31st of December, 1838 - -	972,978 20
Difference between the two aggregates - - - -	$5,345,761 62

Thus, sir, from the documents, it appears that $,972,978 20 is the trust fund of the two per cent. set aside, according to the acts of 1803 and 1806, by which this Government was made a trustee for the faithful administration of the same. And I have shown you that the fund has been exhausted, and more than exhausted, by $5,345,761 62. With what face, then, can gentlemen now call upon us to appropriate again, at this time, $450,000, and claim it as due from the trust fund? It cannot be maintained. Let us now see what lands remain yet to be sold in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, to which the Indian title has been extinguished, excluding the lands which have been sold and otherwise appropriated:

1. In Ohio - -	2,150,588.07	acres,
2. In Indiana - -	5,629 093.90	"
3. In Illinois - -	21,123,161.64	"
4. In Missouri - -	33,497,055.77	"
Aggregate - -	62,399,899.38	"

I think I can show (if it were necessary now) that our public lands heretofore have not yielded more than twenty-eight cents per acre to the public Treasury, if we deduct all expenses, extinguishment of Indian titles, purchases made by treaties, donations, &c. But suppose that the above sixty-two millions of acres (much of which is refuse lands) should hereafter yield one dollar nett per acre, then this would give us about $62,000,000; and calculate the 2 per cent. fund out of this, and it would be $1,240,000; and the whole 5 per cent. fund would be but $3,100,000. Yet I have shown you, that we have already expended $5,345,761 62 more than the 2 per cent. fund now paid in; and all that, in any probability, can come in hereafter, is $1,240,000. But take the whole 5 per cent. from lands yet to be sold, and, probably, it will be less than $3,100,000; which, taken from the $5,245,761 62 already in excess, will still leave a balance in favor of this Government of $2,245,761 62. Juding from the past, however, it may be safely calculated that the public lands to be sold, will not yield half the sum estimated above, which, of course would reduce the 5 per cent. estimate in like manner. Thus, I trust, I have forever put to rest this flimsy pretext, as to the famous two per cent fund; and that no one will ever again urge upon us this appropriation from the obligations of a special contract. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOWARD] was too good a lawyer to rest upon this; he well knew that he could not carry this appropriation upon any principle of law or equity connected with the 2 per cent. fund. He did not rest it entirely upon this, but took higher grounds of national interest and expediency connected with our public policy.

As for my own part, rather than to be harassed here year after year, as we are, for specific appropriations for this object, to be made out of the National Treasury, and thus making every thing subserve local interests, I would prefer at once, if we are to be compelled to carry on this work, that we should give to each of the States absolutely five out of every 105 sections of land unsold for their own disposal, provided we were never to be asked for an appropriation again upon this subject.

Do you suppose that the men who, in the years 1802, 1803, and 1806, passed the first acts to which I have referred, could have contemplated that six millions of dollars were to be drawn from the Treasury in the short space of thirty-three years for this object? They would have hesitated long before they would have set a precedent which is now appealed to as having the authority of law. The first appropriation, as I have shown, was $30,000; and that sum, no doubt, was thought to be considerable, because we then enjoyed the blessings of an economical Government. But they would not have passed it if they had supposed that, to this amount, they were to add the sum laid down in the estimates upon our tables, and by which it will be seen that a sum approaching to eight millions of dollars, over and above the amounts already appropriated, will be required to finish this road to Jefferson, in Missouri. It will appear from the report from the War Department, communicated to the Senate 27th January, 1840, No. 122, that the estimated cost for the completion of the Cumberland road hereafter, over all expenses heretofore, is as follows: in Ohio, $638,166 26; in Indiana, $3,144,250 21; in Illinois, $2,448,838 52; in Missouri, $1,664,790 45; and the total estimated cost is $7,896,045 44. Are we prepared for this heavy expenditure? This amount, added to what has already been expended, will make $14,214,785 26. Do you suppose that the framers of these first laws would have been prepared to meet such extravagant drafts out of the public funds? Were they prepared to set such a precedent by appropriating at first only $30,000; which appropriation they specially guarded by declaring that the amount should be paid out of the two per cent. fund? Would they have suffered themselves thus to be drawn into a measure which was to lay the foundation for such heavy appropriations? And it is to be remembered that the sum of seven millions eight hundred thousand dollars here mentioned, is only the estimate. We all know the character of these estimates—that they are the mere theoretical estimates of gentlemen in their bureaus—but come to the actual amount and you will find it to be nearer sixteen millions than eight; for, in every such estimate, the amounts actually called for exceed almost double the amount first estimated. Well may the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOWARD] speak of this as a magnificent enterprise. Well may the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] call it the Appian way. It may be the Appian way; it may be a magnificent enterprise—but who is to pay for it? Is it an enterprise within the provisions of the Constitution? Is it an enterprise within the limits of a Republican and economical Government, involving, as it does, in all human probability, appropriations to the amount of twenty or thirty millions of dollars? And if the gentleman from Indiana is right in the bright prospects which he drew of the future; if that road is finally to lead, as he says, to the shores of the Pacific, then two hundred millions of dollars will not cover the expenditures. And this is the species of argument which is employed to induce a Republican Government to adopt measures that are to involve the country in such enormous extravagance!! It may be an Appian way, as the gentleman from New York says, but I would remind him that the Appian way which led from Rome to Brundusium, became the great highway of emperors who marched along it, waving the imperial eagles over prostrate slaves and an oppressed and ruined country. Is the Appian way to be cited here as an example to us? First go and make your Government as splendid and despotic as that of imperial Rome became in the progress of time. What was it that broke down republican Rome? It was this very system of partial, unjust, and corrupting legislation; a system in which conquering generals brought back spoils from sacked cities and devastated provinces, to be divided among "Roman citizens," and to pamper an arrogant and agrarian people.

That was the cause of the downfall of Rome—it struck a deep blow at her purity and freedom. And when the gentleman asks us to follow examples of that kind, let him first go the banks of the Ohio and the Mississippi and establish granaries for the collection of public corn, that it may be given to the people. Let him spread out his banner and call upon his followers to come in and divide the plunder. Make this Government what Rome was, agrarian in all its principles, and bring the country down to the same of ruin, corruption, and prostration, which characterized the Roman republic. You may make this Appian way—you may make this great Government road, but it will be a road that will pass through the very vitals of the Constitution. I say, you may make such a road; you may make another in the South, and another in the North, and you may call them by what names you choose; but rest assured, that the principle upon which you act strikes at that equal justice which should ever be the basis of a republic. It not only strikes at that, but at the Union of these States. There can be no permanent union except by generating those kind and cordial feelings between the various sections of this confederacy, which can alone result from a Government dispensing equal benefits and equal burdens. You cannot preserve twenty-six independent States in union, unless by means of a Government which does actually dispense equal burdens and equal favors. And when it is supposed that we oppose such appropriations from mere sectional prejudices, injustice is done to the people of that persecuted region which stretches from the Patapsco to the Mississippi, and which has been denounced as particularly sectional in its views of public policy. I say it is unjust to that people. In taking the ground which they have taken in opposition to such measures, they have planted themselves on the great principle of the Constituion, and sound national policy. They ask that your Government shall be equal. They do not come and ask at your hands favor or bounty; they ask for a Government that may be just and forbearing in peace, so that it may be strong in war, because strong in the affections of a devoted and loyal people. These views are no Southern views alone, but views affecting deeply the permanent liberties of a Republican people every where, in the North and the South, in the East and the West. We do not ask for particular favors or appropriations to us. Yet we are denounced as sectional, because Southern interests are spoken of. But let us reflect what these Southern interests are. All that we ask is a strict construction of the Constitution as it regards all portions of the Union, and that the local interests of all may remain untouched by Federal legislation. We desire that nothing shall embarrass the free internal intercourse of the States, and that no sectional interests may be touched so as to disturb their harmony. We ask that the Government shall be external in its operations, conducting our intercourse with foreign nations so as to command their respect and regard. These, sir, may be Southern views, but they are views which I hope are not confined to us alone, for they justly belong to a free Republican people in every portion of this Union, who are interested in preserving our Government what it was designed to be—a Government of limited powers, all to be exercised for the benefit of equal and independent States.

This may be any thing but a national view; but I tell the gentleman from Indiana, that the speech which he has made on this occasion, will hereafter be held up to him as containing doctrines by which it is proposed to set up precedents as law; and, in his own language, the mere "beaten track of legislation," as the Constitution of the land. I warn the gentleman that it will be so; and that it is reserved for him, if he expects to remain a Republican, to realize the profound wisdom of that wise man, who exclaimed "Oh, that mine enemy would write a book!" To say the least of it, sir, the gentleman can never again lay claim to the title of a strict constructionist.

Mr. Speaker, I was rejoiced to hear the remarks which fell the other day from the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PARRIS,] and if proof were wanting that this is not a proposition which the South alone opposes, and that our opposition does not rest upon exclusive sectional feelings, we may find it in the argument which that gentleman made. He comes from the extreme North; and I listened to him as if it were to the voice of one from the tomb of the Constitution, proclaiming its life and regeneration, in regions where it has been permitted too long to slumber uncherished and unnoticed. I return the gentleman my most cordial thanks. He has placed this question where it ought to be placed, on the great principles of the Constitution, and he has shown that the North as well as the South were deeply interested in maintaining a limited as well as an economical Government.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOWARD] spoke of making this a National Government. I should be glad to know what the gentleman means by a National Government. If by the term he means that discretion which would give a majority in Congress the right and power, under the broad shield of "the general welfare," to which he had alluded, to make appropriations of money for any and every object that a majority may decide to be within the scope of the general welfare then it is precisely the doctrine of Alexander Hamilton, and comes within the range of those vast constructive powers advanced by Chief Justice Marshall—a man whose name is never to be mentioned save in profound respect and veneration for the purity of his character, and the simple dignity and power of his intellect. Let us see what is meant by the term "general welfare."

The word is first used in the preamble to the Constitution, thus:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare," and so forth.

We next find the term in the clause which declares that "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States."

It is very clear that the term, thus used and twice repeated, was designed as a mere declaration of extreme caution, and that the true intent and meaning of those who used it was, that it should be a limitation to the apparently absolute and uncontrolled power given in the same clause "to lay and collect taxes;" that they should not use this power wantonly or in caprice, but should strictly consult the "general welfare," and carry out the same only by confining its full exercise to objects specially enumerated in that instrument, and which are thereby delared to be national; that it was not intended to apply to sectional objects or local interests in any particular State, but to those great national objects which were specially declared by grants of power to be within the jurisdiction of the Government. It is not contended but that the Government is one of limited powers, and that the Constitution is intended to define those powers. The gentleman [Mr. HOWARD] claims that the Government should be national—I say so too. But it is national only on those objects specifically defined and granted in the Constitution. By merely assuming that it is national, you cannot effect objects not enumerated, or essentially necessary to those that are. The convention has precisely defined the objects or powers that are national, and Congress surely cannot legally undertake to declare that we shall also be national for other purposes. To do so is to do nothing more nor less than claim, that Congress shall set up its own discretion as to the objects of "general welfare," instead of confining its action to the specific, enumerated powers of the Constitution itself. If the "general welfare" be the only limitation to the discretion of Congress, why, then, any enumeration of powers at all? All power was at once given, and the judgment of Congress was thereby declared to be the Constitution of the land. What right have we to set aside the judgment of the convention? They chose, by enumerating the powers, to show what were intended to be national objects; and the very enumeration excludes the idea of legislation upon objects not enumerated. The taxing power is what gave vitality to the Constitution. Under the Confederation, Congress had power to collect revenues from the States, and not from the people of the States. The great object of the Constitution was to change this power, so as to enable this Government to collect directly from individuals instead of States. Congress may have power to "lay and collect taxes" for the "general welfare," as intended to be defined by the enumerated grants; but it can only appropriate money thus raised upon the specific objects defined by the instrument itself. It was wisely agreed upon in convention, that the subjects for legislative action should be specifically settled. Discretion in the powers of Government, whether in one or many, is the law of tyrants. In all civilized countries, the line which limits the power of Government, is the line that defines enlightened liberty.

But the power to make these appropriations has has been claimed under that clause in the Constitution which declares that Congress shall have power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with Indian tribes." Let us examine this for a moment. At first it would seem to be a general and absolute grant of power; but when we reflect as to its nature, we find it is not such. It does not say that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce, but "commerce "with foreign nations." The other part of the clause, "and among the several States," would seem also to be absolute and uncontrolled; but this is not the fact: for I will demonstrate that the instrument itself has two express limitations upon this very power. First, in section 9, it is said, "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State," and "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties, in another." Now it is clear, that that which at first appeared to be absolute, is positively a restricted and limited power; and the wisdom of the instrument can only be appreciated by reading all the parts, and blending them in harmony. The whole scope and meaning of the clause were, that there should be free and unrestricted commerce between the States. It was a limitation upon the power of this Government, and in favor of perfect freedom in trade, and running in the same spirit with that clause which declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." If a State were to monopolize, as a State, any branch of trade, so as to appropriate it to herself under restrictions operating upon others, then Congress would have power to regulate such "commerce." For instance, if Virginia were to monopolize for herself the tobacco trade; or if Pennsylvania were to monopolize her coal mines and control their exportations, then the power of Congress would attach. Barter, trade, intercommunication between citizens of different States, were intended to be free and unembarrassed. Commerce, as a public matter between State and State, might be regulated; but trade private, between individual and individual, was to be beyond the interference of Congress. Yet, under this general power, having a plain and palpable object, it is claimed to create works of internal improvement. Under the limited power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States," you claim a separate, positive, and substantive power. That which is clearly an independent power, you claim as incidental. Under the power to "regulate" one thing, you claim the power to create another. Regulation of commerce does not give the power to create commerce or destroy commerce. To demand that Government shall create internal improvements, and force commerce upon them, under the power to regulate commerce, is the same thing as to claim that Government shall build our steamboats and ships, to transport our produce across the Atlantic. If you can do the thing in the one case, you can in the other. It is the same thing, as to power.

I know that this appropriation has been claimed under the inducement to favor commerce, and the power maintained under the clause to which I have referred. But has not the day passed, when such an argument can have weight? Those who first projected this national road had two great objects in view: the first was, to promote commerce between the States—to promote union and intercourse; the second was, national defence, and the protection of our remote and frontier settlements, which were subject to imminent danger. These, I say, were the great objects which induced Congress to make the first appropriations. Now, I submit to gentlemen, whether the circumstances of the country are not so entirely changed, as to render these great intentions no longer of weight. What was the situation of the West in the year 1802? It was comparatively an unknown region; a region surrounded by Indian tribes, and in imminent danger of invasion from Great Britain. They then looked to the old States for protection and defence. But is such the state of things now? The Western country, which at that time was an infant colony, has now sprung up into national existence; and the talented gentleman from Indiana, spoke to us of the day, when they of the West would dictate their own terms to this Union; when they would have command of this, and of all other great questions affecting the condition and welfare of the Republic. And is it right for us now to say, that this appropriation is to be make to keep up the defence and protection of the West? Suppose a war were to break out with Great Britain to-morrow. The first tocsin that sounded would proclaim the Canadas emancipated from colonial vassalage. Could we be invaded through that section? Have we not already a yeomanry force settled on the Ohio and the Mississippi, capable of meeting the legions of England without any assistance from us? Do they ask this as an appropriation to a weak, infant colony, just in the first stages of its settlement? That great Northwestern Territory, which in the year 1802 had less than one hundred thousand people, has now nearly three millions; a population equal to that of the whole Union, at the commencement of the Revolution. And for them now to come and claim an appropriation, under the origional objects of the first grant, reminds me of a full-grown boy, just stepping into manhood, with ruddy cheeks and joyous eye, asking to be dandled on his mother's knee, and whining to draw milk from his mother's exhausted breast. Such is the state of things. The reason for the original appropriation exists no longer. Instead of being weak, powerless, subject to invasion, the people of the West come here now, and through their Representatives tell you, that after the next census, they will defy your power and trample upon your authority: that they will do it by force of law, and the triumphant power of numbers.

Is this appropriation to be made for the purpose of facilitating commerce? What was the state of the country in the years 1802, 1803, and 1806? They were then a scattered, weak, and remote people, with no means of communication. They had not felt the glorious and quickening influences of the noble invention of steam power—that power which has given life, and wealth, and greatness, to a slumbering wilderness; and for the blessings of which, Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Mississippi, Kentucky, and Tennessee, ought to erect a monument to its inventor. Yes, sir! Columbus may have discovered a continent, but the genius of Rumsey has made it a fit inheritance for freemen. They ought to raise a monument to his memory at the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi, before which, all who pass might bow with respect, in remembrance of the man who subdued the mother of waters.

It is said of an ancient king, that surrounded as he was by servility and flattery, and as if to illustrate its allusion, he attempted to chain the ocean, and said to the waters, "Thus far shalt thou come, and no farther." Vain and idle as this was, in the days of mere physical power, yet, sir, we have literally seen, in our day, the genius of man giving to the world an invention by which intellect has been made to triumph over the waves of the ocean and the winds of heaven.

It is that invention which has changed the whole commerce of the West; which has brought into existence, as it were, a nation from the wilderness, and quickened it with sudden life and vigor. We have seen State after State spring into existence, as powerful and perfect as one divinity sprung from the brain of another, in ancient days. And yet they come in and claim this appropriation, for the purpose of facilitating commerce! and tell us that if we do not grant it, they will be deprived of the advantages to which they are entitled, and will be crippled in their resources! Sir, you might as well attempt to bind down the lion in his strength, by throwing cobwebs over his mane, as to cripple the energies of the West. The journey from Pittsburg to to New Orleans may be performed in as many days, under the operation of the steam power, as, in the year 1806, it took months. And yet the appropriation is claimed to facilitate commerce! Look for a moment at the map of this country. On one side you have the Ohio, running for 500 miles parallel to this road; and on the other you have those great inland seas, furnishing on both sides the finest commercial intercouse of any inland country upon the face of the globe. What more can be done? The puny efforts of this Government sink into contempt before the majestic works that nature herself has thrown around this magnificent country. If you must do something, do it for a country that needs your appropriation. Sir, the great objects for which this appropriation was originally made, of facilitating commerce, binding the Union, and for the purposes of defence, no longer exist. If the Congress of 1806 had good inducements to make these appropriations, the Congress of 1840 have none; and it is the height of folly and of madness to continue to make appropriations originally based on a different state of circumstances in the country, when the whole country itself has changed. Does Ohio, or Indiana, or Illinois, ask this appropriation because the Government has been a hard parent to them, or because we have neglected their interests? We have given them the richest soil on the globe for little or nothing—cheaper than it could be purchased in any part of the civilized world. We have given them all the fostering care of a kind and indulgent Government. I know nothing that they have asked which we have ever refused; and yet they come and demand these extra appropriations. I know they seem to think that what they have paid for land is a naked tax. Has it been a tax wrung from labor? Do they receive nothing in return? Have we not given them a full equivalent? Is the purchase of property a tax? Have we not given them a quid pro quo? Is there a man among them who will now sell his land for the price at which he bought it?

Now it is said that we have forbidden these States to tax our lands within their several limits, and for five years after their purchase from Government. This was done at the solicitation of the States themselves, because it was supposed that it would hold out additional inducements to emigration and settlement, to be exempt from taxes; and what was supposed to be for their interests, is now said to affect their resources. I will repeal the exemption to-morrow, if they will take it as an equivalent. The true resources of a State consist in the income of its citizens—in their capacity to meet public demands upon that income. It is population, labor, income, that give true resources to a State.

The taxing power of the State extends without limit over its citizens. If they have cheap lands, and exempt from taxes, their income ought to be greater. The aggregate income of the people of Ohio constitutes the true resources of the State. And, as far as capacity to bear taxation is concerned, these new States have as complete power and as great resources, according to their population, as has the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, or any other State in the Union. Their capacity to raise taxes is in exact proportion to their income and the number of their citizens. This objection, then, that we have forbidden the exercise of the power of taxation over our own lands, is nothing more than theoretical; and, therefore, the position assumed that we are bound to appropriate this money, because we have crippled the resources of these States, cannot be maintained. It is idle to talk of our cramping the resources of States that have outstripped the Atlantic frontier; that are almost able to purchase out their richest Atlantic sisters. Sir, there is no justice in demanding this appropriation.

I proceed now, Mr. Speaker, to present a few views upon this question, considered merely as a fiscal question, and with reference to the resources of the country at the present time. According to the estimates received from the Treasury Department, it will be seen that our resources for the next year will probably amount to about twenty-two millions of dollars; and, as a part of this estimate, we must take into the calculation a debt of about two and a half millions that will be due from the Bank of the United States, and about one million due from the deposite banks. And then we have the estimate of what appropriations are necessary, and from which it will be seen that, with very great prudence and economy, we will be barely able to meet just demands upon the Treasury. I doubt whether the income will not be, in fact, short of the demands. Now, I put it to those who have rallied themselves upon the late able message of the President in favor of economy and retrenchment—I put it to them, whether it is proper, under the existing circumstances and embarrassments of the country, to vote an appropriation of four hundred and fifty thousand dollars for this road? I put it to them, whether it is proper to vote this amount, with the certainty that you must either borrow money or issue Treasury notes? Is the contry prepared for this? Where will you borrow money? How will you raise the funds? It is reported that there is a universal derangement, a general pressure, in the money market, from one end of the country to the other; and I take it for granted, that the idea is not to be entertained that the Government is to borrow money to meet its exigencies. Well, are you prepared to issue Treasury notes? Here let me say that, last session, I voted against the issue of these notes. I did so on the ground of expediency; not because I had constitutional objections against the measure, but because I regarded it as a dangerous precedent, and because its tendency was to profligacy in expenditures. There ought never to be an issue of such notes, except it be upon ASCERTAINED FUNDS, belonging to the Treasury, but not immediately available at the then, to be done under extreme caution and guards, and only when absolutely necessary. The Government has, undoubtedly, a right to borrow, and to use the form of Treasury notes instead of bonds. moment, although certain at a future time. It ought, But when gentlemen come and ask me to vote four hundred and fifty thousand dollars for an object which I believe to be beyond the Constitution, and unnecessary, and with the certainty that, according to the estimates on our table, we will be called upon to appropriate nearly eight millions more to the same object, I, for one, raise my protest against it; and when gentlemen shall ask me to give them support for Treasury notes, I say to them, that, if they pass such appropriations as this, I will trample upoy the ties of party with contempt, and refuse mn vote. I know my duty to the country and to my constituents better than to submit to the sympathies of party, so far as to give my vote for an issue of Treasury notes to meet appropriations which are both unconstitutional and unnecessary. Are gentlemen prepared to make such disbursements at present? It is probable that the income of the first two quarters of the year will fall behind, and that the Treasury will not be able to meet the appropriate and necessary demands upon it. I very much believe this may be the case; and I believe that the income of the last two quarters, with proper care, will rather exceed the necessary expenditures: that is to say, if Congress is prepared to come down to economical and necessary expenditures only. And if a Treasury note bill is introduced here with a view to render those expenditures commensurate with the income, and to equalize the demands with the revenues for the whole year, and with that view only, placing out of sight all unnecessary or unconstitutional appropriations, I might, under the necessity of the case, give such a bill my support But pass such appropriations as these, sir—pass appropriations in the teeth of the Constitution, and of the pressing interests of the country, and that, too, at a time when we are so deeply embarrassed—embarrassed as individuals—embarrassed as States—embarrassed as a national Government—and I pronounce it here, as I will do every where, the height of profligacy, madness, and tyranny.

Sir, I confess that some of the remarks which fell from the able gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOWARD.] made my blood run warm. I confess that I felt a deeper emotion of the heart, when he spoke of the rising strength of the West—of the numbers they would include under the next census; when he spoke of their power and ascendency; and when he said that they would "remember their friends, and visit their enemies." Sir, this remark of the gentleman may have been full of Christian charity and forgiveness; but if it was, it created different feelings in my bosom. I felt that the gentleman had arrayed these increasing numbers on one side, to show to the ambitious and the aspiring of this House, the temptations which lay in the future. The people of the West would "remember their friends, and visit their enemies!" Sir, I know not how I am to be visited. I know not whether I am to be viewed as a friend or an enemy; but I know my duty to the Constitution; I know my devotion to the great interests of the country—not to the interests of a particular section, or of a few States—but to the interests of the whole country; and, knowing my duty, the language of the gentleman has neither terror nor temptation for me. I have no aspiration higher than that of a conscientious discharge of my duty to the Constitution; and I know of no temptation, either from power on the one hand or flattery on the other, which can ever swerve me from the direct path of honor and independence. I have opposed this appropriation because it is unnecessary, particularly in the present emergency of the country; and because the great objects which induced Congress originally to make the appropriation, exist no longer. It is inexpedient, because it will array against each other sectional interests and feelings. I oppose it, because I believe that the Constitution of our country breathes forth a spirit of just forbearance and equality; and that it was principally intended to give us protection and defence against foreign enemies, and not to create struggles and contests for particular internal works, either in one section or the other. I am aware that these views may be regarded as "narrow, contracted," and, once more to repeat the classical language of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MASON,] "niggardly;" but they are the views which I have been taught from the book of the Constitution itself—from the history of the convention which framed it, and from what I believe to be the true, the solid, the permanent interests of all parts of the Confederacy.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOWARD] asked, significantly, why appropriations are constitutional on the Atlantic frontier, and not in the interior? I do not exactly know what class of appropriations the gentleman may refer to; but if he alludes to that profligate class embraced under the general "harbor bill," by which Congress has appropriated money under the power to regulate commerce where none existed, but to make and create commerce, I hold all such to be against the genius of the Constitution, a gross and profligate perversion. It is a fraudulent perversion of the internal improvement power to make such appropriations under a bill nominally for harbors. Since the famous veto on the Maysville road bill, appropriations for internal improvement have taken that direction; but if the true intention is to protect and "regulate" our commerce, where commerce exists, then such objects come directly within the provision of the Constitution, which declares that "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations." The perversion of this power, of late years, has produced appropriations to dig out and make harbors where there were no towns and no commerce, and where nature never intended there should be any. To protect a harbor connected with national defence is a different thing from this. But the gentleman asks why appropriations "are constitutional upon salt water and not upon fresh?" I will tell the gentleman: it may be because they are connected with the national defence of the country. It is upon salt water that we are to be attacked. The next great contest that is to come—and I believe it will come, sooner or later—will be decided on the ocean, and decided, too, by steam power. But appropriations, under existing circumstances, considering the great change in the world, and the prospect of almost a total change in modern warfare, even to fortifications, which, in the years 1816, 1818, and 1820, were deemed necessary and proper, I consider, at present, useless and inexpedient. Appropriations for fortifications at leading points, where they may be necessary for the protection of the navy, I entirely approve of; these, however, ought to be confined to a few great points. Naval power, connected with steam, will hereafter decide the fate of empire among civilized nations. Appropriations to protect commerce, to prevent the invasion of territory, to defend those places where our battle are to be fought; all these things are included under a general class of appropriations for national defence. But the interior West does not require such appropriations. And why? Because, by the blessings of Nature, they are removed from all danger of invasion; they inhabit a country remote from any foreign nation. That day is passed when Great Britain is to invade us successfully through the lakes. If, unfortunately, a rupture should ever take place between us, Canada could never be retained in colonial subjugation.

There is a bold and hardy population on the lake frontier always capable of defending itself from the remote possibility of any impotent invasion. They are not in a situation to be attacked. But if our country is to be invaded, it will be either in the Northeast or the Southwest. It will be in the gulf of Mexico or in some part of the Southern Atlantic, that you will be called upon to defend the honor and rights of the country. There your coast is extensive and unprotected, and open to the intercourse of the world. There your commerce is richest and presents the greatest temptations to invasion. Appropriations upon such points are strictly national, under enumerated grants of power in the Constitution. And here lies the reason why appropriations are constitutional in one case, and not so for roads or canals in the interior. Surely the people of the interior West want no appropriations for their defence, except upon the Indian frontier.

I know that their proud spirit and independence would repudiate the idea of asking any thing for protection. Do they want a gratuity—a bounty? Are appropriations claimed for the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, because we have been an unkind and hard parent to them, and they need appriations?

Go and see what you have done for Kentucky. How was she settled? By the hardy enterprise and courage of her own citizens, who went on "conquering and to conquer" the wilderness, amid blood and the universal cries of murder. She has made herself a great State without appropriations from this Government; and this is one great cause of her spirit of independence. She does not come here and bend her knee for favor.

But, sir, it is said that Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, need this to facilitate commerce and to give them national defence! On these points what do they differ from Kentucky and Tennessee? There is no justice in this system.

It may be supposed, Mr. Speaker, that I have a particular feeling of opposition in regard to this particular appropriation. The only feeling I have towards it is, that it is connected with a system of measures—with a precedent, which is hereafter to be quoted, as it now is, as being a part of the Constitution—a precedent, upon the strength of which eight millions of dollars are hereafter to be asked, and probably eight millions upon that. You will be asked to run the road into Arkansas; you will be asked to run it into Louisiana. It will be demanded, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOWARD] intimated yesterday, that it shall run to the waves of the Pacific, even at the cost of $100,000,000 It is to avert this thing in its progress—it is on account of the future consequences to the country, that I enter my protest here. Sir, I have no hostility to the particular States interested. On the contrary, I am in favor of a measure that will redeem that whole region of country from its colonial vassalage to this Government. Rather than be harassed year after year—rather than have the whole system of corrupting patronage which is connected with the public lands, through public agencies of all kinds, remain as it now is—rather than see such power and patronage wielded under Executive influence and dictation, I will vote to cede the public lands to the States in which they lie, on certain conditions, reserving a portion of the nett proceeds, at least equal to what they have yielded us heretofore, and let the State incur the expense of sales, &c. and control all the patronage incident to their management—the minimum price to be fixed by this Government. I would do this, because I anticipate the result which the gentleman from Indiana has spoken of, when the overflowing population of the West will come here, asking no favors, but dictating terms by force of habitual legislation. Under the existing system, the Executive chair of this Government is to be put up and bid for every four years. The power is to be conferred on him who will make the greatest promises to local and sectional interests; and the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] presented to my mind conclusive objections against the whole system of Executive influence as connected with internal improvements, and other local objects. But this Executive influence never can be controlled, if you give to him disbursements upon sectional interests—if you give to him power over local objects—if, in short, you divert the Constitution from the great ends which it was intended to accomplish. Under unjust and illegal legislation, the Executive becomes omnipotent. All usurpation of power by Congress over and above the grants of the Constitution, necessarily accrues, in the progress of events, to Executive influence. It is that power which your Executive holds over the new States which has always sustained him, and which will continue to do so as long as a majority here vote such appropriations. I would prefer to make the Executive independent of these things—to place him upon the high grounds of the Constitution, and to make him look to the true and solid interests of his country. He would then be prompted to court fame, rather than power; and it is with that view I would vote to-morrow that the unsold lands should be ceded to the States in which they lie. I believe it is a measure that would regenerate this Government; and I prefer the independence of those States, and the independence and purity of this Government, to any imaginary profit which might accrue by a different course. Besides, the Treasury might, under such a system, receive a greater nett revenue than under the present, with its drawbacks and expenses.

Sir, I am not the opponent of the West. I rejoice in its true prosperity; but I abhor the idea of dragging here, before us, high minded and brave men as annual mendicants upon your Treasury: it is a subservient spectacle at which my mind revolts I desire that their interests should be promoted on proper principles. Fix upon a comprehensive and enlightened system, compatible with the genius of our institutions, and the interests of separate and independent States—not a policy suited to the infancy and weakness of the new States, but suited to their growth, their wealth, and their numbers—a policy which will harmonize the new with the old States, and produce a more perfect and permanent Union—and such a system shall receive my cordial support. Connected with your sectional appropriations, your whole system towards the new States is one of temporary and miserable expedients. Its tendency is to engender ill-will, hostility, and bitter feeling, and is fast destroying the equilibrium of the Confederacy. Stop these sectional appropriations, and pursue a just and liberal policy, and there can be nothing to retard the triumphal progress of this Republic to future greatness and power. I confess I feel my heart glow with a warmer emotion, when I look forward to the day when State after State shall rise from the unknown regions of the "far West," and add star after star to the banner of our Union. I rejoice to think of the day when the cottager upon the banks of the Rio Roxo, and the fisherman who casts his net even upon the waters of Arabasca, shall feel and know that they are brethren—citizens of one common and united Republic. Sir, when that period arrives, we can then, in truth, say that the star of empire casts its blaze westward. Then will the American Eagle exultingly snuff the distant Pacific, and take a higher and a bolder flight, with redoubled vigor in his wing and brighter glory beaming from his eye.

But, pursue a contrary system, and you will reduce this people to heart-burnings, hostility, and jealousy. You never can satisfy them. They will look upon you as a hard and close Government, and, finally, they will defy your power and trample upon your laws.

Our relations to the new States and Territories constitute our quasi colonial system. I would rather adopt a mild and benignant policy towards them, such as the ancient Governments adopted towards their colonies. Their policy was to settle them, to see them prosperous, and to rejoice in their prosperity—to have a fostering care towards them: not to levy taxes, not to make them sources of permanent revenue; but to make them friends in peace and allies in war. This was the wise system of antiquity. Modern nations have substituted a despotic, avaricious, grinding, and base system, in the place of this generous and enlightened policy; and the consequence has been that England, France, Spain, and Portugal, are in a sure way to lose entirely their colonial possessions, simply because they have made them the objects of taxation, the sources of revenue to the mother country. It is this which has deprived them of their colonies, and which must finally result in a loss of all, with engendered feelings of bitterness and hostility.

I am in favor of pursuing an enlightened and generous system, adapted to the condition of the States, and the palpable and pressing emergencies of a rising and powerful country. Be sure, whatever you do, to make them friends in peace and allies in war. Any other course will be fatal. You will lose more than you will gain.

If the public domain is to be used as an object of an eternal revenue, and you are to calculate only how much you can force from a reluctant people, it is vain to disguise it, you will produce ill-will, rivalship, deep and bitter hatred; and all the Cumberland road, or other roads, which you can run from here to the Rocky mountains, will never keep us a united and happy people.

Mr. Speaker: these views, which I have barely glanced at, when the proper time arrives, will give rise to some of the most complicated and beautiful questions of constitutional law that belong to our philosophical system of Government. I may admit that Virginia constructively holds the freehold in the unsold lands northwest of the Ohio. I shall maintain that she has made this Government a trustee of the State, which trust-power is to be exercised for the benefit and permanent interests of all the States. The cession from Virginia, of the 20th of October, 1783, it is true, has the words, "for the use and benefit" of the States, &c. "Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions, in the general charge and expenditure," &c. This was passed under the confederation, when this Government apportioned out to, and collected revenue from, the States as States, when "their usual respective proportions in the general charge" could be known and ascertained. By the ratification of the Federal Constitution, Virginia herself has changed this mode, and given power to this Government to collect revenue directly from the people of the whole Union, instead of States. She has thereby created a general treasury, in common, from all the people. And if there be any change in the powers and duties of this Government, she herself has assented to it. As to the territory purchased by treaty, the freehold is in the States conjointly, and this Government is their common trustee, and there can be no question as to power. There can be no freehold in this Government, and grants run from it as trustee. It has no sovereignty itself, but is used to exercise the conjoined sovereignty of the States. I forbear to open up these great questions. They will form a chapter in the future. The time is coming when they will be pressed for decision. The time is coming when we must pass over these local appropriations of $450,000 this year, and $500,000 the next. The people will no longer bear it. The West itself will demand, and justly demand, a different state of things.

Mr Speaker, as to the instructions moved upon your table, ordering positively the Committee of Ways and Means to bring in a bill appropriating $450,000 for this road, I have only to say, that if they are carried, it will change the mode and manner of doing business in this House. You will have instructions moved upon all other sectional subjects, and the consequence will be, we shall be forced into a vote upon propositions which ought to be moved first in Committee of the Whole. I have moved my amendment with a view to allow the committee merely to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill. And if my amendment prevails over the positive instructions, then I can vote against the proposition even as amended. This course is perfectly parliamentary. It is a mere matter of expediency, and does not commit me to any thing except a preference of mine over positive instructions. I shall vote, finally, against all instructions.

SPEECH OF MR. CALHOUN,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In Senate, Wednesday, February 5, 1840—On Mr. GRUNDY's report in relation to the assumption of the debts of the States by the Federal Government.

Mr. CALHOUN said:

When I have heard it asserted, again and again, in this discussion, that this report was uncalled for; that there was no one in favor of the assumption of State debts, and that the resolutions were mere idle, abstract negatives, of no sort of importance; I could not but ask myself, if all this be so, why this deep excitement? why this ardent zeal to make collateral issues? and, above all, why the great anxiety to avoid a direct vote on the resolutions? To these inquiries I could find but one solution; and that is, disguise it as you may, there is, in reality, at the bottom, a deep and agitating question. Yes, there is such a question. The scheme of assuming the debts of the States is no idle fiction. The evidence of its reality, and that it is now in agitation, burst from every quarter, within and without these walls, on this side and the other side of the Atlantic; not, indeed, a direct assumption, for that would be too absurd; and harmless, because too absurd; but in a form far more plausible and dangerous—an assumption, in effect, by dividing the proceeds of the sales of public lands among the States.

I shall not stop to show that such distribution, under existing circumstances, with the deep indebtedness and embarrassment of many of the States, would be, in reality, an assumption. We all know, that without such indebtedness and embarrassment, the scheme of distribution would not have the least chance for adoption, and that it would be perfectly harmless, and cause no excitement; but plunged, as the States are, in debt, it becomes a question truly formidable, and on which the future politics of the country are destined for years to turn. If, then, the scheme should be adopted, it must be by the votes of the indebted States, in order to aid their credit, and lighten their burden; and who is so blind as not to see that it would be in truth, what I have asserted it be in effect, to that extent, an assumption of their debts.

Here, then, we have the real question at issue, which has caused all this excitement and zeal—a question pregnant with the most important consequences, immediate and remote. What I now propose is, to trace rapidly and briefly some of the more prominent which would result from this scheme, should it ever become a law.

The first, and most immediate, would be to subtract from the Treasury a sum equal to the annual proceeds of the sales of the public lands. I do not intend to examine the constitutional question whether Congress has or has not the right to make the subtraction, and to divide the proceeds among the States. It is not necessary. The committee has conclusively shown that it has no such power; that it holds the public domain in trust for the States in their Federal capacity as members of the Union, in aid of their contribution to the Treasury; and that to denationalize the fund, (if I may use the expression,) by distributing it among the States for their separate and individual uses, would be a manifest violation of the trust, and wholly unwarranted by the Constitution. Passing, then, by the constitutional question, I intend to restrict my inquiry to what would be its fiscal and moneyed effects.

Thus regarded, the first effect of the subtraction would be to cause an equal deficit in the revenue. I need not inform the Senate that there is not a surplus cent in the Treasury; that the most rigid economy will be necessary to meet the demands on it during the current year; that the revenue, so far from being on the increase, must be rapidly reduced, under existing laws, in the next two years; and that every dollar withdrawn, by subtracting the proceeds of the public lands, must make a corresponding deficit. We are thus brought to the question, what would be the probable annual amount of the deficit, and how is it to be supplied?

The receipts from the sales of the public lands, I would suppose, may be safely estimated at five millions of dollars at least, on an average, for the next ten or fifteen years. They were about six millions the last year. The first three quarters gave within a fraction of five and a half millions. The estimate for this year, is three and a half millions; making the average of the two years but little short of five millions. If, with these data, we cast our eyes back on the last ten or fifteen years, we shall come to the conclusion, taking into consideration our great increase of population and wealth, and the vast quantity of public lands held by the Government, that the average I have estimated is not too high. Assuming, then, that the deficit would be five millions, the next inquiry is, how shall it be supplied? There is but one way; a corresponding increase of the duties on imports. We have no other source of revenue, but the Post Office. No one would think of laying it on that, or to raise the amount by internal taxes. The result, then, thus far, would be to withdraw from the Treasury five millions of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, to be distributed among the States, and to impose an equal amount of duty on imports, to make good the deficit. Now I would ask, what is the difference, regarded as a fiscal transaction, between withdrawing that amount for distribution, and imposing a similar amount of duties on the imports, to supply its place, and that of leaving the proceeds of the sales of the land in the Treasury, and imposing an equal amount of duties for distribution? It is clearly the same thing, in effect, to retain the proceeds of the public lands in the Treasury and to impose the duties for distribution, or to distribute the proceeds and thereby force the imposition of the duties to supply the place.

It is, then, in reality, a scheme to impose five millions of additional duties on the importations of the country, to be distributed among the States; and I now ask where is the Senator who will openly avow himself an advocate of such a scheme? I put the question home, solemnly, to those on the opposite side, do you not believe that such a scheme would be unconstitutional, unequal, unjust, and dangerous? And can you, as honest men, do that in effect, by indirect means, which, if done directly, would be clearly liable to every one of those objections?

I have said such would be the case, regarded as a fiscal transaction. In a political point of view, the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the land would be the worst of the two. It would create opposing and hostile relations between the old and new States, in reference to the public domain.

Heretofore the conduct of the Government has been distinguished by the greatest liberality, not to say generosity, towards the new States, in the administration of the public lands. Adopt this scheme, and its conduct will be the reverse. Whatever might be granted to them, would subtract an equal amount from the sum to be distributed. An austere and rigid administration would be the result, followed by hostile feelings on both sides, that would accelerate the conflict between them in reference to the public domain—a conflict advancing but too fast by the natural course of events, and which any one, in the least gifted with foresight, must see, come when it will, would shake the Union to the centre, unless prevented by wise and timely concession.

Having shown that the scheme is, in effect, to impose duties for distribution, the next question is, on whom will they fall? I know that there is a great diversity of opinion as to who, in fact, pays the duties on imports. I do no not intend to discuss that point. We of the staple and exporting States have long settled the question, for ourselves, almost unanimously, from sad experience. We know how ruinously high duties fell on us; how they desolated our cities, and exhausted our section. We also know how rapidly we have been recovering as they have been going off, in spite of all the difficulties of the times, and the distracted and disordered state of the currency. It is now a fixed maxim with us, that there is not a whit of difference, as far as we are concerned, between an export and import duty—between paying toll going out, or returning in—or going down to market, or returning back. If this be true, of which we have no doubt, it is a point of no little importance to us of the staple States to know what portion of the duties will fall to our lot to pay. We furnish about three-fourths of the exports, with about two-fifths of the whole population. Four-fifths of five millions is four millions, which would be the measure of our contribution; and two-fifths of five millions is two millions, which would be our share of the distribution; that is to say, for every two dollars we would receive, under this notable scheme, we would pay four dollars to the fund from which it would be derived.

I now ask, what does it amount to, but making the income of the States to the amount of five millions annually, common property, to be distributed among them according to numbers, or some such ratio, without the least reference to their respective contribution? And what is that but rank agrarianism—agrarianism among the States? To divide the annual income is as much agrarianism as to divide property itself; and would be as much so divided among twenty-six States, as among twenty-six individuals. Let me admonish the members opposite, if they really apprehend the spirit of agrarianism as much as might be inferred from their frequent declarations, not to set the fatal example here, in their legislative capacity. Remember there is but one step between dividing the income of the States, and that of individuals, and between a partial and general distribution.

Proceeding a step farther, in tracing consequences, another question presents itself—on what articles shall the duties be laid? On the free or the dutied articles? Shall they be laid for revenue or for protection? Is it not obvious that so large an amount as five millions, equal to one-third of the present income from that source, and probably not much less than one half what it will be at the end of two years, cannot be raised without rousing from its slumber the tariff question, with all its distraction and danger? Should that, however, not be the case, there is another consequences connected with this, that cannot fail to rouse it, as I shall now proceed to explain.

The act of distributing the sales of the public lands among the States, of itself, as well as the amount to be distributed, will do much to resuscitate their credit. It is the desired result, and the leading motive for the act. Five millions annually, (the amount assumed,) on a pledge of the public domain, would, of itself, be a sufficient basis for a loan of ninety or an hundred millions of dollars, if judiciously managed. But suppose that only one half should be applied, as the means of negotiating loans abroad, in order to complete the old, or to commence new, works of improvement, or other objects. I ask, what would be the effect on our imports, of negotiating a loan in England, or elsewhere in Europe, of forty or fifty millions, in the course of the next year or two? Can any one doubt, from past experience? We all know the process. Very little gold or silver is ever seen in these negotiations. A credit is obtained, and that placed in bank there, or with wealthy bankers. Bills are drawn on this country, and then sold to merchants. These are transmitted to Europe, and the proceeds returned in goods, swelling the tide of imports in proportion to the amount. The crash of our manufacturers follow, and that, in turn, by denunciations against over-importing and over-trading, in which those who have been most active in causing it are sure to join, but will take special care to make not the least allusion to the real source whence it flows. Is not that the case at this moment? And can it be doubted, that with the increase of the cause, the clamor for protecton will increase, until, with united voices, the friends of the system would demand its renewal. If to this we add, that, under the compromise act, the tariff must be revived and remodelled, who can look at such a concurrence of powerful causes without seeing that it would be almost impossible to prevent the revival of the protective system, should the scheme of distribution be adopted? I hazard nothing in asserting that the renewal would certainly follow; and, as this would be one of the most prominent and durable consequences of that scheme, I propose to consider it fully, in its most important bearings.

One of the most striking features of the system is its tendency to increase. Let it be once recognised, and let the most moderate duties be laid for protection; but put the system in motion, and its course would be onward, onward, by an irresistible impulse, as I shall presently show, from past experience; and hence the necessity of vigilance, and a determined resistance to every course of policy that may by possibility lead to its renewal. This tendency to increase, results from causes inherent and inseparable from the system, and has evinced itself by the fact, that every tariff for protection has invariably disappointed its friends in the protection anticipated, and has been followed periodically, after short intervals, by a demand for another tariff with increased duties, to afford the protection vainly anticipated from its predecessor. Such has been the result throughout, from 1816 to 1828, when the first and last protective tariffs were laid, which I propose now to show by a very brief historical sketch of the rise and progress of the system.

The late war, with the embargo, and other restrictive measures that preceded it, almost expelled our commerce from the ocean, and diverted a vast amount of capital, that had been employed in it, to manufactures. Such was the cause that led to the sytem. After the termination of the war, there was, on the part of Congress and the country, the kindest feeling toward the manufacturing interest, accompanied by a strong desire so to adjust the duties (indispensable to meet the expenses of Government, and to pay the public debt) as to afford them ample protection. The manufacturers were consulted, and the act of '16 was modelled to their wishes. They regarded it as affording sufficient and permanent protection, and I, in my then want of experience as to the nature of the system, did not dream that we would hear any more of tariff, till it would become necessary to readjust the duties, after the discharge of the public debt. Vain expectation! Two years had not passed away before the manufacturers were as clamorous as ever for additional protection; and to meet their wishes, new duties were laid, from time to time, with the same result; but the clamor still returned, till 1824, when the tariff of that year passed, which was believed on all sides to be ample, and was considered, like that of '16, to be a final adjustment of the question. It was under this impression that the South acquiesced (reluctantly) in the very high duties it imposed. The late General Hayne, then a distinguished member of this body, took a very active part against it; and I well remember, after its passage, that he consoled himself with the belief that, though oppressive, it would be the last. His expectation proved as vain as mine in '16. Before two years had passed, we were again besieged with the cry of the inadequacy of the protection; and, in the summer of 1827, a large convention of manufacturers from all parts was held at Harrisburg, in Pennsylvania, to devise a new and more ample scheme of protection to be laid before Congress at the next session. That movement ended in the adoption of the tariff of 1828, which, in order to make sure work, went far beyond all its predecessors in the increase of duty. The duties were raised on the leading articles of consumption from forty to fifty per cent. above former duties, as high as they were. I speak conjecturally, without any certain data. In less than three years, even that enormous rise proved to be insufficient, as I shall presently show, and would certainly have been followed by new demands for protection, had not the small, but gallant, State I represent, arrested its further progress—no, that is not strough enough—brought the system to the ground, against the resistance of the Administration and Opposition—never, I trust, to rise again.

The fact disclosed by this brief historical sketch is, that there is a constant tendency to increase in the protective system; and that every increase of duty, however high, requires periodically, after a short interval, an additional increase. This, as I have stated, is not accidental, but is the result of causes inherent in the system itself, in the present condition of our country. It originates in the fact, that every increase of protection is necessarily followed by an expansion of the currency, which expansion must continue to enlarge till the increased price of production in consequence shall become equal to the increased duty, and when the importation of the articles prohibited may again take place with profit. That is the principle; and as it is essential to the peace and prosperity of the country that it should be clearly understood, I intend to establish its truth beyond doubt or cavil; and for that purpose, shall begin with the tariff of '28, the last and by far the boldest of the series, with the view of illustrating, in its case, the operation of the principle. I entreat the Senate to give me its fixed attention. The principle, well understood, will shed a flood of light on the past and present difficulties of the country, and guide us in safety in our future course.

To give a clear conception of the operation of the tariff of 1828, it will be necessary to premise that it comprehended all the leading articles of consumption that could be manufactured in our country; amounting in value to not much less than one-half of the whole of the imports; that the duties on these articles were increased enormously, as has been stated—say not less than forty or fifty per cent; that the average domestic exports at the time was not much short of sixty millions of dollars, and the imports for consumption about the same; that the revenue from the imports was about half that sum; and that of the exports, about three-fourths consisted of the great agricultural staples of the South. What, then, with these facts, must have been its necessary operations on the currency of the manufacturing States? We export to import. It is impossible to continue to export for any considerable length of time, without a corresponding return of imports. It would be to give away our labor for nothing. Our exports, then, continuing at an average of sixty millions, in what, under the operation of the tariff of 1828, must the corresponding imports to the same amount return? Not, certainly, to the same extent as before its passage, in the articles on which it had so greatly increased the duties? Its object in raising them, was to give our manufactures the home market, by excluding the foreign articles of the same description. If it failed in that, it failed in accomplishing any good whatever, and became an unmixed evil, without benefit to any one. The return, then, of imports, must have been principally in articles on which the duties were not raised, as far as the consumption of the country would warrant, and the balance, after paying what was due abroad, in gold and silver. The first effect, then, must have been to turn the foreign exchange in our favor; a most important consequence connected with the increase of gold and silver in relation to the currency. The next must have been to turn the domestic exchanges still more strongly against the staple States, and in favor of the manufacturing. To understand this portion of the operation, I must again repeat that the object of the tariff was to cut off the consumption of the foreign articles, in order that they should be supplied by our own manufactures. The necessary consequence of this must have been to diminish the demand abroad, and to increase it in the manufacturing States, and thereby to turn the influx of gold and silver to that point, in order to purchase the supplies there, which we have been in the habit of obtaining from abroad. These causes combined, must have had the effect of adding greatly to the capacity of the banks in that quarter to extend their discounts and accommodations, and with it the circulation of their notes. With a growing supply of specie, and the exchange favorable in every direction, as must have been the case, there is no limit to the business of banks, nor are they slow to perceive or to act on such favorable circumstances. Nor must we overlook another powerful cause in operation, the fiscal action of the Government, through the operation of which the vast sums collected under such high duties, was transferred to the same quarter, to be applied in discharge of the public debt, and disbursed on the innumerable objects of expenditure there.

Under the operation of such powerful causes, there could not but be a vast and sudden expansion of the currency where they were in such great activity, and with that expansion a corresponding increase of prices and the cost of production. Nor could this state of things cease till the increased cost of production become equal to the duty imposed for protection. At that point, and not before, must specie cease to flow in, and the exchange to be favorable; but when reached, the tide must turn, importations of the protected articles would recommence, specie flow out, and exchanges become adverse. This must be so obvious, that it would only darken to attempt to make it more clear. With the turn of the tide the banks must contract, and pecuniary embarrassment and distress follow. Such, under the operation of the causes assigned, must be the result, for reasons which appear to me irresistible. But, sir, I do not mean to leave so important a point to the mere force of argument, however clear and certain. I intend to prove by incontestable authority of documents, such was, in fact, exactly the result. I intend to place the principle laid down, as I have said, beyond doubt or cavil.

The first authority I shall adduce, is from the* report of a committee of the other House, made in February, 1832, by Campbell P. White, the chairman, then a member from the city of New York. The report is evidently drawn with great care, and by one familiar with the subject; and has the advantage of being on another subject, (the currency,) without any reference to the tariff or protective system, and evidently without any knowledge of its operation. Hear, then, what the report says:

"The recent export of specie has swept away the delusive coloring given to the actual result of production in 1829, 1830, and the early part of 1831. Real estate appreciated greatly; local stocks commanded unheard of prices; warehouses and dwellings were improved and embellished, and money was so abundant, that it could readily be obtained to any amount, upon promissory notes. How changed is the general aspect of things within a few months? All our solid possessions and means of industry remain, land continues to be equally productive, labor is recompensed with its usual reward; the seasons have not been unfriendly. Whence, then, this lamentable change in our affairs? Why this great scarcity of money; depreciation in value of all commodities, and of all property; great commercial distress, and absolute impossibility with many solvent persons to discharge their just debts; so speedily and grieviously succeeded the gratifying and prosperous picture which was so lately presented?"

What a confirmation of the deductions of reason, both in the swelling tide of prosperity, and the turning ebb of adversity. The sketch of the latter is not unsuited to the present time; good seasons, and productive years, and every element, apparently, of plenty and prosperity, and yet deep and wide spread distress; though, at that time, there had been no removal of deposites, nor had the Sub-Treasury been heard of, to which gentlemen are now disposed to attribute all the calamities which afflict the country.

The author of the report could give no satisfactory answer to his question, whence all this sudden and unlooked for calamity; but he has furnished us with the means of tracing it clearly to the tariff of 1828. It went into operation on the 1st of September of that year, and the next year felt the swelling, but delusive tide of an expanding currency; the exchange turned in our favor; gold and silver, following the impulse, flowed in; banks began to enlarge their discounts and circulation. It continued to swell with a stronger and stronger current, through all the subsequent year, and the first part of the next, nearly three years, according to the usual period, when it began to ebb; and then followed the reverse scene, so feelingly described by the author, and which to him appeared so unexpected and unaccountable. It was at this point, had not the movements in the South arrested the farther progress of the system, that there would have been another clamor for additional duties. The distress, as usual, would have been attributed to over-importation, and that to the want of adequate protection, and in 1832, (the usual period of four years having intervened,) another protective tariff would have been inflicted, to be followed by the same train of consequences, and with equal disappointment to its authors.

Now, sir, to show that the flowing in of the precious metals, in consequence of the tariff of '28, is not a mere assumption, I have extracted from the public documents, for the years 1829 and 1830, the imports and exports of gold and silver, which I hold in my hand. The import in '29 was $7,403,612, and the export $4,311,134, making an excess of imports over exports of $3,092,478; and for 1830, $8,155,964 against $1,241,622, making an excess of imports of $6,914,342; making, in the two years, an excess of imports of $10,006,810. By turning to the report already cited, it will be seen that the estimated amount of specie in the country on the first of January, 1830, was but $25,000,000, of which $5,000,000 were in circulation, and $20,000,000 in the vaults of the banks; so that the addition to the specie in the two years was forty per cent. on the whole amount.

It now remains to be shown what was the effect of this great proportional increase of specie, and the favorable state of the exchange which it indicates, had on the banks in the manufacturing States. The report will furnish the information, not fully, but enough to satisfy every reasonable man. It gives the following statement of the amount of bank notes in circulation in 1830 and 1832, respectively, in the States of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New York, and Pennsylvania, including the Bank of the United States, which will show the vast increase in the short space of two years.

Here Mr. C. read the following statement:

	1830.	1832.	Rel. increase of circ'n in two years.
Massachusetts,	$4,730,000	$7,700,000	65 per ct.
Rhode Island,	670,000	1,340,000	100 "
New York,	10,000,000	14,100,000	40 "
Pennsylvania,	7,300,000	8,760,000	20 "
Bank U. States,	15,300,000	24,600,000	67 "
	$38,000,000	$56,500,000

These are, it will be borne in mind, the principal manufacturing States. In the period of two years, we find their bank circulation, taken in the aggregate, expanded from thirty-eight to fifty-six and a half millions of dollars, making an increase of sixteen and a half millions, equal to forty-four per cent. But this falls far short of the actual increase. The year 1829 is not included. It must have been one of great expansion, as the import of specie greatly exceeded its exports; which, with the favorable state of the exchange implied, must have greatly increased the business of the banks and the circulation of their notes. The reverse must have been the case in 1832, which is included, as we know by the report itself, that year and the latter part of the preceding, was a period of severe contraction. If a return could be had of 1829, '30, and the early part of '31, I venture nothing in asserting that we should find the comparison, compared with 1828, the year of the tariff, far greater in proportion.

That there is no mistake in attributing this great expansion to the tariff, might be farther shown, if additional proof were necessary, after such conclusive evidence, from the fact that it is impossible to assign any other adequate cause. As far as can be seen, there was no other cause in operation, political or commercial, that could have produced the results. It was a period of profound peace, and the exports and imports of the country steady to an unusual degree.

Should doubt, however, still remain in the mind of any one after all this accumulation of evidence, I will next call the attention of the Senate to a fact which must be conclusive with all disposed to receive the truth. By turning to the table showing the extent of bank circulation in '30 and '32 in the four States already referred to, it will be seen that the expansion was greater or less, just as the States, respectively, were more or less manufacturing. It will not be doubted that Rhode Island is the most manufacturing of the four, and we accordingly find there the greatest expansion; and that for the simple reason, that there the causes assigned must have been in the state of the greatest activity. Her bank circulation doubled in the short space of two years, as appears by the table. Massachusetts is the next; and we find hers is the next highest, being sixty-five per cent. New York is still less so, and hers is but forty per cent.; and Pennsylvania, the least of the four, had, excluding the Bank of the United States, increased only twenty per cent. If the statement had extended farther South, and taken in the staple States, I venture little in making the assertion that, instead of expansion, their bank circulation would, for the same period, have been found in the opposite state, for the reverse reason. It will be seen the Bank of the United States had expanded sixty-seven per cent. This great increase, compared to the local banks of Pennsylvania, may probably be attributed partly to loans negotiated farther East, and not improbably because her accommodations were somewhat enlarged, from causes connected with her efforts, at the time, to obtain a renewal of her charter.

I trust that I have now established to the entire satisfaction of the Senate, the truth of the great principle which has been laid down—that every increase of protective duties is necessarily followed, in the present condition of our country, by an expansion of the currency, which must continue to increase till the increased price of production, caused by the expansion, shall be equal to the duty imposed, when a new tariff will be required. Assuming, then, the principle as incontrovertible, it follows that the natural tendency of the protective system is to expand, in seeking to accomplish its object, till it terminates in explosion. It would be easy to show, from what has already been stated, that this tendency must continue till the exports shall be so reduced as to be barely sufficient to meet the demands of the country for the articles not included in the protection; as it must be obvious, so long as they exceed that amount, so long must specie continue to be imported, and the exchange to be in our favor, till the protection is broke down by the expansion of the currency.

The consummation, therefore, of the system, must be one of two things: explosion, or the reduction of the exports, so as not to exceed the amount of the unprotected articles; but either termination must prove disastrous to the system; the former by a sudden and violent overthrow, and the latter by the impoverishment of customers and raising up of rivals, as they ceased to be customers. To have a just conception of its operation in this particular, it will be necessary to bear in mind, that the South and the West are the great consumers of the products of the North and East; and that the capacity of the South to consume, depends on her great agricultural staples almost exclusively; and that their sale and consumption depend mainly on the foreign market. What, then, would be the effect of reducing her exports to the point indicated, say to forty or fifty millions of dollars? Most certainly to diminish her capacity to consume the products of the North and East in the same proportion, followed by a corresponding diminution of the revenue, and the commerce and navigation of the country. But the evil would not end there, as great as it would be. It would have an equal or greater effect on the consumption of the West. That great and growing section is the provision portion of the Union. Her wide and fertile region gives her an unlimited capacity to produce grain and stock of every description; and these, for the most part, find their market in the staple States. Cut off their exports, and their market would be destroyed; and with it, the means of the West, to a great extent, for carrying on trade with the Northern and Eastern States. To the same extent, they and the staple States would be compelled to produce their own supplies, and would thus, from consumers, be converted into rivals with the other section.

How much wiser for all would be the opposite system of low duties, with the market of the world opened to our great agricultural staples? The effects would be a vast increase of our exports, with a corresponding increase of the capacity to consume on the part of the South and West, making them rich and contented customers, instead of impoverished and discontented rivals of the other section. It is time that this subject should be regarded in its true light. The protective system is neither more nor less than a war on the exports. I again repeat, if we cannot import, we cannot long export; and just as we cut off or burden the imports, to the same extent do we, in effect, cut off and burden the exports. This I have long seen, and shall now proceed to prove, by reference to the public documents, that my assertion is sustained by facts. The table of exports shows that during the seven years from 1824 to 1831, our domestic exports remained nearly stationary, notwithstanding the great increase of our population during that period. Your statute book will show, that during the same period, the protective system was in its greatest vigor. The first relaxation took place in December, 1830, under the act of the 20th May, of the same year, which made a great deduction in the duties on coffee and tea. I shall now turn to the table, and give the exports of domestic articles for those years, beginning with 1824:

Here Mr. C. read the following statement:

In 1824	the domestic exports were			$50,649,500
1825	"	"	"	66 944 745
1926	"	"	"	53,055,710
1827	"	"	"	58,921,691
1828	"	"	"	56 669,669
1829	"	"	"	55,700,193
1830	"	"	"	59,462,029

If we take the average of the first three and the last of the these yearss, we shall find the former is a million and a-half greater than the latter, showing an actual falling off, instead of an increase, to that extent, in our exports.

With 1831, the reduction of duties commenced on the articles mentioned; and in December, 1833, the first great reduction took place under the compromise act. I shall turn to the same table, beginning with 1831, and read a statement of the exports for the eight years under the approach to the free trade system. It is but an approach. I invite especial attention to the rapid rise, after the great reduction in December, 1833.

In 1831	the domestic exports were			$61,277,057
1832	"	"	"	63,137,470
1833	"	"	"	70,317,698
1834	"	"	"	81,034,162
1835	"	"	"	101,189,082
1836	"	"	"	106,916,680
1837	"	"	"	95,564,414
1838	"	"	"	96,033,821

How rapid the rise just as the weights are removed! The increase, since the great reduction in 1833, has nearly doubled the average exports, compared with the average of the seven tariff years preceeding 1831, and would have quite doubled them, had not the expanded and deranged condition of the currency, and the consequent embarrassment of commerce, prevented it.

But what will appear still more extraordinary to those who have not reflected on the operation of the protective system, is the great increase of the exports of our domestic manufactures, as the duties go off, following, in that respect, the same law that regulates the exports of the great agricultural staples. It is a precious fact, that speaks volumes, and which demands the serious consideration of the manufacturing portion of the Union. I well remember the sanguine expectations of the friends of the system, of the great increase of the exports of domestic manufactures which they believed would follow the tariff of 1823. Well, we now have the result of experience, under that act, and also under that of a partial approach to free trade, and the result is exactly the reverse of the anticipations of the friends and advocates of protection. So far from increasing, under the tariff of 1828, the exports of manufactured articles actually diminished, while they have rapidly increased just as they have gone off.

But the table of exports shall speak for itself. During the four years, under the tariff of '24, that is from that year to '29, when the tariff of '28 went into operation, the exports of domestic manufactures gradually declined from $5,729,797, in the year '25, to $5,548,354 in the year '28. From that time it steadily declined, under the tariff of '28, each succeeding year showing a falling off compared with the preceding, till '33, declining, throughout the period, from $5,412,320 in '29, to $5,050,633 in '32, and showing an aggregate falling off, during the whole tariff regime of eight years, from '25 to '32, of nearly $700,000. At this point, we enter on the relaxation of the system, and there has been an onward move, with but little vibration, throughout the whole period, till the present time. The last year we have is '38, when the exports exceeded any preceding year. They amounted to $8,397,078, being an increase, during the six years of the reduction of duties, of $3,346,445, against a falling off, in the preceding eight years of protection, of $700,000—an increase of 65 per cent. in six years, and this in the midst of all the embarrassment of commerce, and expansion and derangement of the currency, and, let me add, what has been so much dreaded by the friends of manufactures, the mighty increase of the exports of our great agricultural staples, during the same period; a clear proof that, under the free trade system, the one does not interfere with the other. Let no friend of manufactures suppose that this interesting result is accidental. It is the operation of fixed laws, steady, and immutable in their course, as I shall hereafter show.

Now, sir, I feel myself, with these facts, warranted in asserting that if the deranged state of the currency had not interfered, the great manufacturing interest would have gone on in a flourishing condition during the whole period of the reduction under the compromise act, proving thereby, to the satisfaction of all, the fallacy of the protective system. Any supposed loss, from the reduction of duties, would have been much more than made up by the increased ability of the South and West to consume, and the rapidly growing importance of the foreign market.

But I have not yet done with the system. It has additional and heavy sins to answer for. The tariff of '23 is the source in which has originated that very derangement of the currency, which has so greatly embarrasses, at this time, the very interest it was intended to protect, as well as all other branches of industry. Bold as is the assertion, I am prepared to establish it to the letter.

It has already been proved that the great expansion of the currency in '29, '30, and '31, was the immediate effect of the tariff of '28. It remains to be shown that the cause of the still greater and longer continued expansion which has terminated in the overthrow of the banking system, and the deep and almost universal distress of the country, may be clearly traced back to the same source. To do this, we must return to the year '32, and trace the chain of events to this time. In that year, the public debt was finally discharged. The vast revenue which had been poured into the Treasury by the tariff of '28, and which had accelerated the payment of the public debt, could, after its discharge, no longer be absorbed in the ordinary expenditures of the Government, and a surplus began to accumulate in the Treasury. The late Bank of the United States was then the fiscal agent of the Government, and the depository of its revenue. Its growing amount, and prospects of great future increase, began to act on the cupidity of many of the leading State banks and some of the great brokers of New York. Hence their war against that institution; and hence, also, the removal of the deposites. The late President I believe to have been really hostile to the Bank on principle; but there would have been little or no motive to remove them, had it not been for their growing importance, and the hostility which the desire of possessing them had excited. They were removed, and placed in the vaults of certain State banks. To this removal and deposite in the State banks, the members over the way are in the habit of attributing all the disorders of the currency which have since followed. Now I ask, in the first place, is it not certain, if it had not been for the surplus revenue, the deposites would not have been removed? And, in the second, if there would have been a surplus had it not been for the tariff of '28?

Again: is it not equally clear that it was the magnitude of the surplus, and not the removal, of itself, that caused the after derangement and disorder? If the surplus had been but two or three millions, the ordinary sum in deposite, it would have been of little importance where it was kept; whether in the vaults of the Bank of the United States, or those of the States; but involving, as it did, fifty millions and more, it became a question of the highest importance. I again ask, to what is this great surplus to be attributed, but to the same cause? Yes, sir, the tariff of 1828 caused the surplus, and the surplus the removal and all the after disasters in the currency, aggravated, it is true, by being deposited in the State banks; but it may be doubted whether the disaster would have been much less, had they not been removed. Be that, however, as it may, it is not material, as I have shown, that surplus itself was the motive for the removal. We all remember what occurred after the removal. The surplus poured into the Treasury by millions, in the form of bank notes. The withdrawal from circulation, and locking up in the vaults of the deposite banks, so large an amount, created an immense vacuum, to be replenished by repeating the issues which gave to the banks the means of unbounded accommodations. Speculation now commenced on a gigantic scale; prices rose rapidly, and one party, to make the removal acceptable to the people, urged the new depositories to discount freely, while the other side produced the same effect, by censuring them for not affording as extensive accommodations as the Bank of the United States would have done, had the revenue been left with it. Madness ruled the hour. The whole community was intoxicated with imaginary prospects of realizing immense fortunes. With the increased rise of prices began the gigantic speculations in the public domain, the price of which, being fixed by law, could not partake of the general rise. To enlarge the room for their operations, I know not how many millions (fifty, I would suppose, at least, of the public revenue) was sunk in purchasing Indian lands, at their fee simple price nearly, and removing tribe after tribe to the West, at enormous cost; thus subjecting millions on millions of the choicest public lands to be seized on by the keen and greedy speculator. The tide now swelled with irresistible force. From the banks the deposites passed by discounts into the hands of the land speculators; from them into the hands of the receivers, and thence to the banks; and again and again repeating the same circle, and, at every revolution, passing millions of acres of the public domain from the people into the hands of speculators, for worthless rags. Had this state of things continued much longer, every acre of the public lands, worth possessing, would have passed from the Government. At this stage the alarm took place. The revenue was attempted to be squandered by the wildest extravagance; resolutions passed this body, calling on the Departments to know how much they could spend, and much resentment was felt because they could not spend fast enough. The deposite act was passed, and the Treasury circular issued; but, as far as the currency was concerned, in vain. The explosion followed, and the banks fell in convulsions, to be resuscitated for a moment, but to fall again from a more deadly stroke, under which they now lie prostrate.

I have now presented, rapidly, the unbroken chain of events up to the prolific source of our disasters, and down to the present time. In addition to the causes originating directly in the tariff of 1828, there were several collateral powerful ones, which have contributed to the present prostrated condition of the currency and the banks, but which would have been comparatively harmless of themselves. Among these was the important change in the charter of the Bank of England, at the last renewal, about the time our surplus revenue began to accumulate, by which its notes were made a legal tender in all cases, except between the bank and its creditors. The obvious effect of this modification was to diminish the demand for specie in that great mart of the world, and, in consequence, must have tended powerfully to keep the exchange with us in an easy condition, while the tide of circulation was rapidly rising to a dangerous height. But there was another cause which contributed still more powerfully to the same result: I refer to the great loans negotiated abroad by States and corporations. To these I add the operation of the United States Bank of Pennsylvania, the direct object of which, in some of its more prominent transactions, was to prevent the exchange from becoming adverse to us.

By the operation of these causes combined, the exchanges were kept easy for years, notwithstanding the vast expansion which our circulation had attained, from the powerful action of the more direct causes to which I have adverted. The stroke was delayed, but not averted, and fell but the heavier and more fatally, because delayed. And where did it fall, when it came, most heavily? Where the measure which caused it originated; on the heads of its projectors. Behold how error, folly, and vice, in the ways of an inscrutable Providence, turn back on their authors.

It is full time for the North, and more especially for New England, to pause and ponder. If they would hear the voice of one who has ever wished them well, I would say that the renewal of the protective system would be one of the greatest calamities that could befall you. Whatever incidental good could be derived from it, you have already acquired. It would, if renewed, prove a pure, unadulterated evil. The very reverse is your true policy. The great question for you to decide is, how to command the foreign market. The home market, of itself, is too scanty for your skill, your activity, your energy, your unequalled inventive powers, your untiring industry, your vastly increased population, and accumulated capital. Without the foreign market, your unexampled march to wealth and improvement must come to a stand. How, then, are you to obtain command of the foreign market? That is the vital question.

The first and indispensable step is a thorough reformation of the currency. Without a solid, stable, and uniform currency, you never can fully succeed. The present currency is incurably bad. It is impossible to give it solidity or stability. A convertible bank currency, however well regulated, is subject to violent and sudden changes, which must forever unfit it to be the standard of value. It is by far the most sensitive of all to every change, commercial or political, foreign or domestic; as may be readily illustrated by reference to the ordinary action of foreign exchanges on such currency. For this purpose, let us assume that our ordinary circulating medium, when exchanges are easy, amounts to $100,000,000, consisting, as it does, of convertible bank paper. Let us suppose that it is all issued by what are called sound specie paying banks, with a circulation of three dollars of paper for one dollar in specie, which is regarded as constituting safe banking. Next, suppose exchange abroad turns against us, to the amount of $10,000,000. Is it not clear, that instead of reducing the circulation by that amount, that is, to $90,000,000, which it would do if it consisted only of specie, it would be reduced three times the amount; that is, to $70,000,000? Let us now suppose the exchange to turn the other way, from this point of depression, and to be kept flowing in that direction till it came to be $10,000,000 in our favor, instead of that amount against us. The result would be, under the operation of the same law, not to increase our circulation to $110,000,000 only, which would be the case if consisting of specie, but to $130,000,000; making a difference between the extreme points of depression and elevation of $60,000,000—more than equal to one-half of the usual amount of circulation by supposition, with a corresponding increase of prices—instead of $20,000,000, equal only to a fifth, and with but a proportional effect on prices. A change the other way, from the extreme point of elevation to that of extreme depression, would cause the reverse effect. I hold it certain that no honest industry, pursued with the view to moderate and steady profit, can be safe in the midst of such sudden and violent vicissitudes—vicissitudes as if from summer to winter, and from winter to summer, without the intervention of fall or spring. Such great and sudden changes in the standard of value must be particularly fatal with us, with our moderately accumulated capital, compared to the effect on the greater accumulation abroad, in older countries. In stating the case supposed, I have assumed numbers at random, without pretending to accuracy as applied to our country, simply to illustrate the principle. The actual vibration may be greater or less than that supposed, but in every country where bank circulation prevails, it must be greater and greater, just in proportion to the extent of its prevalence.

For this diseased state of your currency, there is but one certain remedy—to return to the currency of the Constitution. Read that instrument, and hear what it says. "Congress shall coin money and regulate the value thereof; no State shall emit bills of credit, or make any thing but gold and silver a legal tender." Here are positive and negative provisions; a grant of power to Congress, and a limitation on the power of the States, in reference to the currency. Can you doubt that the object was to give to Congress the control of the currency? What else is the meaning "to regulate" the value thereof? Can you doubt that the currency was intended to be specie? What else is the meaning "to coin money?" Can you doubt, on the other hand, that it was the intention that the States should not supersede the currency which Congress was authorized to establish? What else is the meaning of the provisions that they shall not issue bills of credit, or make any thing but gold and silver a legal tender? Can we doubt, finally, that the country is not in the condition that the Constitution intended, as far as the currency is concerned? Does Congress, in point of fact, regulate the currency? No. Does it supply a coin circulation? No. Do the States, in fact, regulate it? Yes. Does it consist of paper, issued by the authority of the States? Yes. Is this paper, in effect, a legal tender? Yes; it has expelled the currency of the Constitution, and we are compelled to take it or nothing. Well, then, as the currency is in an unconstitutional condition, the conclusion is irresistible that the Constitution has failed to effect what it intended, as far as the currency is concerned; but whether it has failed by misconstruction, or the want of adequate provisions, is not yet decided. Thus much, however, is clear; that it is through the agency of bank paper that it has failed, and the power intended to be conferred on Congress over the currency has been superseded. But for that, the power of Congress over the currency would have been this day in full force, and the currency itself in a constitutional condition. Nor is it less clear, that the Constitution cannot be restored, while the cause which has superseded it remains; and this presents the great question, how can it be removed? I do not intend to discuss it on this occasion. I shall only say, that the task is one of great delicacy and difficulty, requiring much wisdom and caution, and in the execution of which, precipitation ought to be carefully avoided; but when executed, then, and not till then, shall we have the solid, stable, and uniform currency intended by the Constitution, and which is indispensable, not only to the full success of our manufactures, and all other branches of productive industry, but also to the safety of our free institutions.

The next indispensable step to secure to the manufacturers the foreign market, is low duties and light burdens on productions; yes, as low and light as the wants of the Government will permit. The less the burden—the freer and broader the scope given to the products of our manufactures—the better for them. Above all, avoid the renewal of the protective system. It would be fatal, as far as the foreign market is concerned.

Its hostile effects I have already shown from the table of exports; and shall now, by a few brief remarks, prove that it must be so. Passing by other reasons, I shall present but one, but that one decisive. It has been shown that the effect of the protective system is to expand the currency in the manufacturing sections, until the increased price of production shall become equal to the duty imposed for protection, when the importation of the protected articles must again take place; that is to say, that its effects are to enable foreign manufacturers to meet ours in our own country, under the disadvantage of paying high additional duties. How, then, with that result, would it be possible for our manufacturers to meet the foreign fabrics of the same description abroad, where there can be no duty to protect them? There can be no answer. The reason is decisive.

I do not wish, in what I have said, to be considered the advocate of low wages. I am in favor of high wages; and agree that the higher the wages, the stronger the evidence of prosperity; provided (and that is the important point) they are so naturally, by the effectiveness of industry, and not in consequence of an inflated currency, or any artificial regulation. When I say the effectiveness of industry, I mean to comprehend whatever is calculated to make the labor of one country more productive than that of others. I take into consideration skill, activity, energy, invention, perfection of instruments and means, mechanical and chemical; abundance of capital, natural and acquired; facility of intercourse and exchanges, internal and external, and, in a word, whatever may add to the productiveness of labor. High wages, when attributable to these, is the certain evidence of productiveness, and is, on that account, and that only, the evidence of prosperity. It is easily understood. Just as such labor would command, when compared with the less productive, a greater number of pounds of sugar or tea, a greater quantity of clothing or food, in the same proportion would it command more specie, that is, higher wages, for a day's work. But, sir, here is the important consideration: high wages from such a cause, require no protection—no, not more than the high wages of a man against the low wages of a boy, of man against women, or the skilful and energetic against the awkward and feeble. On the contrary, the higher such wages the less the protection required. Others may demand protection against it—not it against others. The very demand of protection, then, is but a confession of the want of effectiveness of labor (from some cause) on the side that makes it; but, as a general rule, it will turn out that protection, in most cases, is a mere fallacy; certainly so when its effects are an artificial expansion of the currency. So far are high wages from being the evidence of prosperity, in such cases, or, in fact, whenever caused by high protection, high taxes, or any other artificial cause, it is the evidence of the very reverse, and always indicates something wrong, and a tendency to derangement and decay.

Having arrived at this conclusion, I will now hazard the assertion, that in no country on earth is labor, taking it all in all, more effective than ours; and especially in the Northern and Eastern portions. What people can excel our Northern and New England brethren in skill, invention, activity, energy, perseverance, and enterprise? In what portion of the globe will you find a position more favorable to a free ingress and egress, and facility of intercourse, external and internal, through the broad limits of our wide spread country—a region surpassed by none, taking into consideration extent and fertility? Where will you find such an abundant supply of natural capital, the gift of a kind Providence; lands cheap, plenty and fertile; water power unlimited; and the supply of fuel, and the most useful of metals iron, almost without stint. It is true, in accumulated capital, the fruits of past labor, through a long succession of ages, not equal to some other countries, but even in that, far from being deficient, and to whatever extent deficient, would be more than compensated by the absence of all restrictions, and the lightness of the burden imposed on labor, should our Government, State and General, wisely avail itself of the advantages of our situation. If these views be correct, there is no country where labor, if left to itself, free from restriction, would be more effective, and where it would command greater abundance of every necessary and comfort, or higher wages; and where, of course, protection is less needed. Instead of an advantage, it must, in fact, prove an impediment. It is high time, then, that the shackles should be thrown off industry, and its burden lightened, as far as the just wants of the Government may possibly admit. We have arrived at the manhood of our vigor. Open the way—remove all restraints—take off the swaddling cloth that bound the limbs of infancy, and let the hardy, intelligent and enterprising sons of New England, march forth fearlessly to meet the world in competition, and she will prove, in a few years, the successful rival of old England. The foreign market once commanded, all conflicts between the different sections and industry of the country would cease. It is better for us and you, that our cotton should go out in yarn and goods, than in the raw state; and when that is done, the interests of all the parts of this great Confederacy—North, East, South, and West—with every variety of its pursuits, would be harmonized; but not till then.

If the course of policy I advocate be wise as applied to manufactures, how much more strikingly so must it be when to the other two great interests of that section, commerce and navigation? I pass the former, and shall conclude what I intended to say on this point, with a few remarks applicable to the latter. Navigation (I mean that employed in our foreign trade) is essentially our outside interest, exposed to the open competition of all the world. It has met, and met successfully, the competition of the lowest wages, not only without protection, but with heavy burdens on almost every article that enters into the outfit, the rigging, and construction of our noble vessels, the timber excepted. If, with such onerous burdens, it has met in successful rivalry the navigation of all other countries. What an impulse it would receive if the load that bears down its springs were removed! and what immense additions that increased impulse would give, not only to our wealth, but to the means of national influence and safety, where only we can be felt, and in the quarter from which only external danger is to be apprehended!

I have now, Mr. President, concluded what I proposed to say, when I rose to address the Senate. I have limited my remarks to the prominent consequences, in a pecuniary and fiscal view, which would result, should the scheme of assumption be adopted. There are higher, and still more important, consequences, which I have not attempted to trace: I mean the effects, morally and politically, as resulting from those which I have traced, and presented to the Senate. This, I hope, may be done by some other Senator, in the course of the discussion. But I have said enough to show that the scheme which these resolutions are intended to condemn, ought to be avoided as the most fatal poison, and the most deadly pestilence. It is, in reality, but a scheme of plunder. Let blood be lapped, and the apetite will be insatiable.

But the States are deeply in debt, and it may be asked what shall be done? I know that they are in debt—deeply in debt. I deplore it. Yes, in debt, I am not afraid to assert it, in many instances, for the most idle projects, got up and pursued in the most thoughtless manner. Nor am I ignorant how deep pecuniary embarrassments, whether of States or individuals, blunt every feeling of honest pride, and deaden the sense of justice; but, I do trust, that there is not a member of this great and proud Confederacy, so lost to every feeling of self-respect and sense of justice, as to desire to charge its individual debts on the common fund of the Union, or to impose them on the shoulders of its more prudent associates; or, let me add, to dishonor itself, and the name of an American, by refusing to pay the foreigner what it justly owes. Let the indebted States remember in time, that there is but one honest mode of paying its debts; stop all further increase, and impose taxes, to discharge what they owe. There is not a State, even the most indebted, with the smallest resources, that has not ample resources to meet its engagements. For one, I pledge myself; South Carolina is also in debt. She has spent her thousands in wasteful extravagance on one of the most visionary schemes that ever entered into the head of a thinking man. I dare say this even of her; I, who on this floor stood up to defend her almost alone against those who threatened her with fire and sword, but who now are so squeamish about State Rights as to be shocked to hear it asserted that a State is capable of extravagant and wasteful expenditures. Yes, I pledge myself that she will pay punctually every dollar she owes, should it take the last cent, without inquiring whether it was spent wisely or foolishly. Should I in this be by possibility mistaken—should she tarnish her unsullied honor, and bring discredit on our common country, by refusing to redeem her plighted faith, (which I hold impossible,) deep as is my devotion to her, and mother as she is to me, I would disown her.

REPEAL OF THE SALT TAX.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 14, 1840.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the following documents connected with the duties on salt and fishing bounties:

1. Thirty queries on the salt trade, and salt manufacture in the West, addressed to his constituents by Mr. BENTON of Missouri, with their answers thereto, showing the monopoly, adulteration, deficient bushel, districted allowance, stinted quantity, and extortionate price, of salt in Missouri, and the necessity of the free admission of foreign salt.
2. A communication from the Democratic State Convention in Missouri; from the Hon. Mr. Miller of Missouri; from the Hon. Mr. Chapman of Iowa; from Judge King of Missouri, shewing the monopoly, adulteration, extortionate price, and other abuses in the salt trade; and the connection of several banks with the said monopoly and abuses.
3. A general statement of the salt manufactories in the United States and their products, and cost of their salt at their works; with a particular account of the salt works in New England, in New York, at the Konawha, and on the Holston, in Virginia, and of the import of foreign salt at New Orleans.
4. Statistics of salt, showing its localities, diffusion, abundance, and universality; its various forms, both liquid and solid; its different qualities; its manufacture; its cheapness of first cost; its uses in the animal economy, in agriculture, in different branches of rural economy, and in the useful arts; its vast consumption; the tendency of monarchical governments to tax it oppressively, both in ancient and in modern times; the repugnance of the people to the tax in all ages; its final abolition in many countries; compiled from English, French, and American Encyclopedias, and other authentic sources.

Reported the same back to the Senate with a motion that they be printed.

Mr. TAPPAN said that, as the documents appeared to be somewhat voluminous, and as it was almost impossible for Senators to read all the matter that was ordered to be printed, he would like to hear something as to their character and value, before he gave his vote for printing.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said if it was not more valuable than the bundle of trash printed at the last session on the same subject, he should vote against the printing. A more wasteful expenditure of public money had never been made by any legislative body, than was sanctioned by the Senate in ordering that document to be printed.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama expressed his surprise at the opposition made to the motion of the Senator from Missouri. He, as the organ of a standing committee of this body, asks that certain papers, which had been referred to them, might be printed for the use of the Senate. When a committee ask for the printing of matter in relation to a subject which they have before them, it is ordered as a matter of course; and it was very unusual, if not unprecedented, to oppose it. In regard to the salt document which was ordered to be printed at the last session, he considered it as one of great value; one which opened up to a large portion of the community much valuable information, which, before its publication, was beyond their reach. The number of that document which fell to the share of each Senator was about two hundred, and these he had readily distributed among his constituents, and he could have distributed many more with advantage.

Mr. DAVIS made some remarks in opposition to the printing. As to one portion of them—those relating to the fishing bounties—he would, when the subject properly came before the Senate, show that they did not depend on the duty on salt, but rested on other considerations of great public interest.

Mr. BENTON said the object of printing these papers was apparent from a statement of their contents; it was to enable the Senate to act with effect on the great subject of getting rid of the salt monopoly in the West, and reducing the fishing bounties and allowances in proportion to the reduction of the duty on salt on which they were founded. The salt monopoly of the West was the offspring of the salt tax, and was an injury of several millions of dollars per annum to the agriculture and rural economy of the West; the fishing bounties and allowances now amounted to $320,000 per annum, almost the whole of which was unduly drawn from the Treasury, and much of it illegally. He was almost the only—perhaps the only—member of Congress, who had arraigned this abuse, and he begged for a clear stage and fair play. He wanted his facts printed, and he would answer for the result. He said the fishing bounties and allowances had taken seven millions of dollars from the Treasury: they had received forty-six millions of bushels of salt free of duty, while the Western people suffered a cruel monopoly in that article, which led to extortionate prices, false measure, adulterated quality, stinted quantity, and every conceivable abuse; and all this connected with banking. He joined issue with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] on the salt tax and the fishing bounties and allowances; and would show that they were founded upon the salt tax, and ought to fall with it; and that they were not granted as an encouragement to a seaman's nursery.

Mr. TAPPAN said he had long been satisfied with the necessity of a repeal of the duty on salt, and would go as far as any Senator to effect it. His purpose in objecting to the printing of these papers was to get some information as to their character and value, and he was now satisfied that they ought to be printed. No man estimated more highly the services of the Senator from Missouri, not only in relation to this subject, but many others of great importance to the people of this country, than he did, and none felt higher admiration for the talents and energies which he had devoted to their accomplishment.

Mr. ALLEN said that the salt document formerly printed by order of the Senate, undoubtedly contained, as has been stated, some matter which enlarged its size, without a corresponding increase of its value. Yet, it certainly embraced much important information, before unknown to the country. I do not now remember what number of it was allotted to each Senator, but, on my return home, I was astonished to find that it had already so generally excited the attention of the people, and their desire to obtain it, that those received by me were insufficient to supply the demand. I shall, therefore, vote for the printing of these papers, being, as they are, of a kindred character. But, sir, I regret not this opposition to the motion, inasmuch as it has drawn from the mover [Mr. BENTON] a speech fraught with information, extracted, in advance, from the papers, and which will the better prepare the public mind for the papers themselves.

Of two things, sir, no doubt can exist: first, that salt is, to the whole body of the nation, an absolute necessary of life; and secondly, that its production and sale are monopolized by companies of men, in many sections, if not throughout the Union, who stint the quantity produced, in order to enhance the price to the people and the profit to themselves. This results from a double, indeed, a triangular, monopoly. In the first place, these companies enjoy a monopoly of bank facilities which enables them to purchase or rent the whole salt-water region—to close as many of the existing wells as their interest may require, and to prohibit the opening of others. Thus the monopoly of facilities to purchase, gives them a monopoly of the source whence the article is drawn, and to these they add a monopoly of its sale, in the first instance, to the retail merchant, who must pay the price the companies fix, as they alone can supply his demands. In this manner, an article which enters into the daily bread of every man, is taxed to an extent limited only by the rapacious pleasure of heartless combinations. And what, sir, is the character of these monopolies? They are associations formed to suppress, not to develope, the natural resources of the country, formed to rebuke nature for the abundant bounties she offers to necessituous man. What would be thought of the result, if companies of men should band themselves together, obtain exclusive control over the whole iron region of Pennsylvania and of the Union, strike down half the furnaces and forges now in operation, prevent the erection of others, reduce the quantity, monopolize the whole, and increase the price of iron from six to twenty dollars per hundred? Would this state of things be endured by the people? And would they justify Congress in keeping up a tariff to exclude this article from abroad, and to foster its ruinous monopoly at home? No; and yet, so stands the fact, with regard to salt.

Sir, if there be in our language one word which, better than any other, describes the exact idea of despotism, that word is monopoly. Within itself are contained all the essential elements of oppression. When, during her reign, the English Queen Elizabeth, had granted to her courtiers monopolies of almost every branch and article of commerce, the just complaints of her plundered subjects roused the House of Commons to revolt against the cruel extortions thus practised upon them. Her authority was absolute over Parliament, and Parliament was obsequious to her will. But to all authority, and to all obedience, necessity prescribes a limit. These monopolies were no longer to be borne, and when the Minister, being called upon in the House, read over the list of the articles monopolized, a member indignantly exclaimed: "Is not bread among the number?" So palpable were these outrages upon the people, that the minister was required and compelled to give the royal pledge that they should be diminished; and diminished they were.

Well, sir, how stands the matter with us? A Senator presents documents from citizens of his own and other States, containing evidence of this salt monopoly, of the injustice and oppression it inflicts upon the people. He asks the printing of these papers preparatory to the repeal of the duty on foreign salt, by which these grievances are fostered. And how is he met? The monopoly stated in the papers, no Senator denies; the injustice of the burden thus imposed upon the people, all must admit; yet this motion, which looks to the remedy of an evil so great, is resisted on the plea of expense, so small as it is known that expense must be. And by whom? With what propriety is this resistance made? It is made by Senators who, on former occasions, themselves moved and voted the printing of large and numerous volumes of documents, and that, though each document was but the duplicate of the other, and all but little else than the mere registers of names. They were printed at a cost fiftyfold greater than this now proposed, and at a time, too, when we were told by the same Senators that bankrupcy and despair, both individual and national, were alone to be found in the land. But these, sir, were bank documents, bank petitions, bank memorials, not asking relief for the people against monopolies, but demanding the people's public treasure, the deposites, for the benefit of banks, and with them a renewal of charters, to enable these corporations still longer to prey upon the people. It was to print such documents as these, for such objects as these, at such an expense, that those Senators, at such a time as that, one and all, from day to day, moved, spoke, and voted. But now the case is changed. It is proposed to print papers with a view, not to increase the powers and profits of monopolists, but to relieve the people, the farmers, the mechanics, the laborers, against their rapacity: and to this it is answered, that these grievances, great though they be, must nevertheless be borne, because it will cost some dollars to remove them. Sir, the truth is, and it shall be told, that Congress has become so habituated to receive and obey the dictates of banks and monopolies—so little accustomed to hear or to heed the suggestions and grievances of the farmers, the mechanics, and the laborers of the land—the real people of this country—they whose toil constitutes its prosperity in peace, whose valor its defence in war—that whenever they complain of wrong and injustice, as but seldom they do, their complaints are received with utter indifference, the very evidence of their truth being denied the favor of printed publicity; yet let but a bank stalk into their chamber, and Senators spring to their feet, and hurry to embrace it, as if, with a monopoly of the currency, it enjoyed likewise a monopoly of all their affections.

I look, sir, upon this move of the Senator from Missouri, as a measure of relief for the real people of this country—the great agricultural and working community; and as such, I will vote for the printing of these papers, to any reasonable number.

Mr, CLAY of Kentucky replied to Mr. ALLEN with much animation. He said he rose to mark the Senator from Ohio, who had just taken his seat. He rose to mark the disorganising and revolutionary tendency of his remarks. All this about monopoly was but a new form of attacking the rights of property. A man may not use his property in what form he pleases, even if sanctioned by the laws of the community in which he lives, without being denounced as a monopolist. If this company in the western part of Virginia are great monopolists, is not the State of New York, with her extensive salt works, a still greater monopolist? He had for the last few years purchased salt for his own use which had been manufactured at the New York works, and he had got a good article at what he considered a fair price. Suppose such charges as were contained in these papers were made against that State, would her regresentatives on this floor sit quietly under them, and permit their publication to the world? But we are told that the object is to effect a repeal of the duty on salt—a repeal of this miserable duty of six cents per bushel! And how will that prevent the manufacturers from getting, what every man has a right to get, the highest price for his productions? But, sir, the whole tenor of the gentleman's remarks were in conformity with that agrarian spirit, which I regret to be compelled to say has of late years been so prevalent, and which is rapidly increasing: that levelling spirit which is at war with the institutions of the country: which first attacked the United States Bank, then the local banks, and now it is endeavoring to lay violent hands on the fishing bounties. But, he would ask, what right have you to interfere with the citizens of a sovereign State, and denounce them as monopolists, who are pursuing their avocations under the protection of the laws of the State? If this company has transcended its charter, and abused the powers conferred upon it by the Legislature of Virginia, send your complaints to Richmond, and they will be investigated, and, if there is any truth in them, they will be redressed. What right have you to arraign the Old Commonwealth at the bar of this Senate? If the Senator wishes to complain of monopolies, let him go home to his own State. Go to Columbus with your levelling sentiments, and see how they will be tolerated. He protested against the doctrines of the speech of the Senator from Ohio, as detestable in their nature and abominable in their consequences.

Mr. ALLEN replied. I am, Mr. President, by no means surprised at the inflamed feelings, so inflammably expressed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY.] No, sir; for I was well aware that no man could here lift his finger against the abuses practised by privileged monopolies, however obvious those abuses or ruinous their effects upon the people, without incurring the prompt displeasure of Senators on the other side of this chamber. And why? Is the existence of these monopolies disputed? Are the evils resulting to the community denied? Not at all; neither the one or the other. Their existence is justified, and the evils excused, on the sole pretence that both are beyond our reach, and within the exclusive jurisdiction of the States. We are, therefore, forbidden to speak of these things as burdens upon the people, although our avowed object in doing so is to show that these monopolies are fostered by an existing law of this Government, which it is proposed to repeal. If the facts exist—if they are the resulting consequences of our law, should not the law be repealed? Should we not give some reason for the repeal? And, if so, how can the reason be given without speaking of the facts, which themselves constitute that reason?

But, sir, monopolies are in question, and monopolies will never want friends and defenders. If their abuses cannot be openly justified, they will nevertheless be slyly drawn under the protection of some general principle, broad and terrible enough to afford them impunity, and to affright the timid, who might otherwise be inclined to expose them. Thus it is in the present instance. The production and sale of one of the common necessaries of life are, throughout the country, monopolized by combinations of men, who, aided by an existing law of this Government, are enabled to extort the most unreasonable prices from the people. Well, sir, I spoke of this public evil as a reason for repealing the law by which it is aggravated; and this it is that the Senator from Kentucky denounces as an attack upon property; as if these companies had the right of property in a public law, that rendered it intangible to the law-making and law-revising power. It is this that he declares an assault upon private rights; and it is for having thus complained of these abuses, and proposed a remedy, that the Senator rose, as he said, to mark me—to mark the principle I advanced, as tending to the destruction of property, to a system of levelling and public confusion. And what, sir, is this principle of levelling? Does it consist in defending the rights of the people, and the proceeds of their toil, against the insatiate rapacity of these monopolies—monopolies which have already taken every form and shape—which subsist upon taxes drawn from the people, against their will—which have utterly destroyed the political equality of men, in a Government designed to render all politically equal, and which, in every part of the land, now lift themselves above the surrounding multitude, as the numberless mounds upon the plains of the West, rise above the uniform level? If, sir, an honest resistance to this prevailing tendency of every thing, in our age and country, towards monopoly—towards the concentration of all business, of all property, and of all power, in the hands of chartered combinations—towards the extinction of the individual man and the erection of privileged orders, as the sole constituent elements of the political system—in a word, towards the establishment of an aristocracy founded in fraud and nurtured by pillage—if, sir, resistance to this tendency of things—if a defence of the rights of men, as sincere as it is fearless, against every effort to plunder and oppress them—if a deep and a generous sympathy with my countrymen in all their sufferings and in all their joys—if a desire to see all happy, no mortal miserable, and if a firm determination to do the duty of a good citizen to effect these ends—if these things constitute a leveller, then a leveller am I.

Sir, every law of nature is a law of equality. Upon that basis was this Government formed. By its fundamental law each citizen stands upon a political level. From that level he starts, alike unaided and unrestrained by Government, to rise or to sink in the social scale, to whatever point his virtues, his abilities, his industry, his economy, or the want of these qualities, may fix as the mark of his merit. Protected in all the rights he posresses, restricted only by the rights of others, he is left to determine for himself his own social rank and fortune in life. But whatever this rank or fortune may be, politically, he never leaves that level. And, sir, it is because, in the nature of things, law cannot discriminate in favor of one man, without, by the same act, discriminating to the prejudice of another, that free institutions refuse to discriminate at all. Thus it is, that political equality, by making the gratification of each man's hopes depend alone upon himself, stimulates every faculty, discourages every vice, and produces, in the end, a greater aggregate of virtue and of happiness, than any other form of Government allows. These, sir, are the reasons of nature; they were the reasons of those who founded our institutions; and these are the sentiments which the Senator from Kentucky denounces, as an assault upon property; as tending to level society. Yes; level, leveller—these were his words; and now sir, I demand to know by what authority in this Government that Senator presumes to lift himself above the common level of his countrymen? Leveller! What friend of liberty—what man of justice and magnanimity desires to be otherwise. Sir, it becomes not me to speak of myself; but since the Senator from Kentucky rose, as he said, "to mark the Senator from Ohio," I, in my turn, rise to tell that Senator that I would utterly disdain to accept any political discrimination in my favor, over the humblest, the poorest citizen, who lives by my side. No; I would spurn it, if for no other reason, because the pride of my soul would never acknowledge a natural inferiority, requiring such discrimination to render me the equal of any man.

But again: these sentiments, it seems, assault private rights—tend to public distraction. For this argument, the Senator merits not the glory of originality. No: It is as old as the world. It was the first, it is the last, the only argument of despotism against popular government. Every defence of the rights of man, every effort for civil liberty has ever been, and ever will be, denounced as tending to the insecurity of property, and, by consequence, to public anarchy. The jure divino right of kings to rule, in absolute despotism, over mankind, is claimed as a resulting necessity from the danger to which, it is alleged, private rights and public order are exposed by free institutions. This principle of absolute, irresponsible power, so revolting as it is to human reason, so odious to human justice, has long been scouted out from the southwestern portion of Europe. It flourishes in full maturity only in the oriental world, whilst in the North, and in a part of central Europe, it lives in a form now so modified as to indicate its approaching total decay. But wherever it is found, and in whatever form, it stands upon the same inveterate argument. And, sir, if Prince Metternich, its ablest defender in Europe, at this day, were now asked the question, "Can popular institutions permanently exist?" his answer would be, No. In support of this answer, he could but repeat the reasoning of the Senator from Kentucky. He would tell you property is insecure; the unbridled will of an unbridled people, tends to reduce men and things to an uniform level, and must, therefore, result in anarchy and ruin. Such ever has been, ever will be, the argument of its enemies, against civil liberty. Sir, the sentiments we have heard, the efforts we have seen this session, in the Senate, portend to this country a gloomy future, if these sentiments and efforts prevail. Public grievances exist, yet the people are to be told, told by the Senate, their own Senate, that they are not allowed to see the evidence of these facts. Such is the case, not only in the present instance, but such was likewise the course, but a day or two ago, in relation to the committee's report on the debts of the States. Then, as now, an effort was made to withhold from the people the facts and the reasons upon a subject of the most vital importance to every man in the Republic. But, sir, I regret not this course of Senators. Their hostility to the publication of that report, and of these documents, will whet the public curiosity to see them; and thousands who might otherwise have remained indifferent, will now seek them with avidity. For, sir, there is in our nature a principle esistance to restraint, which prompts us to do whatever we have a right to do, for no other reason than that we are forbidden, by those who have no right to forbid.

A word more. The Senator from Kentucky tells me, if I wish to complain of these salt monopolies, to go home to Columbus, to the Legislature. That Senator, on a former occasion, told me to go home. I did so—not at his bidding, but at my own volition. There, sir, I saw the sovereign people face to face; we talked to each other; I speak not of results. But, sir, I shall not retort this command on that Senator, and tell him to go home. No, not I; I want him here. I would not that he should leave this body for any amount of the best coin my friend from Missouri ever proposed to circulate. So long as that Senator continues here, the people will understand the principles of his party, and that is all we desire. Long, therefore, may he remain; and, as an individual, long may he enjoy health and happiness.

Mr. PRESTON said he was in favor of a repeal of this duty; and when the question came before the Senate, he should vote for the repeal. It was one of the absolute necessaries of life, and he was in favor of so raising our revenue, as to make it fall principally on articles of luxury. But he could not permit the remarks of some Senators who had participated in this debate, to pass without notice. He thought their tendency was mischievous in the highest degree. He thought these appeals to the passions of the people, which were becoming so frequent of late, should not receive the countenance of the body. Such appeals had been the means used by demagogues, in all ages, to enslave the people, whose name they invoked in their inflammatory appeals. The atrocities of Danton, of Marat, and of Robespierre, were all perpetrated in the name of the people, who were massacred in myriads, and whose blood was shed upon a thousand scaffolds, under the orders of these monsters in human shape. Gentlemen, by their remarks, would lead us to believe they intended to advance the position that this was a Government of the people, which would be entirely subversive of the principles upon which it is based. This was a confederate Government, composed of sovereign States. We are the representatives of sovereign States, and the representative of a State with one hundred thousand inhabitants is equal, on this floor, to him who represents a State with a million of inhabitants.

He regretted to see the prevalence of such disorganising and levelling doctrines, which were of the Fanny Wright school of politicians, and were as destructive of the rights of property as they were contrary to the principles and spirit of our institutions.

Mr. BENTON was well pleased that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] would vote for the abolition of the salt tax; it would be a good vote, and would offset his speech against printing. He was sorry to hear the old monarchical cry against attacks on property. It was an old cry, beginning with the origin of monopolies, and continued down to the present day. There were but two parties in politics, and never had been, and never would be. They had existed always, and might be seen in the Bible—in first Samuel—as well as in all profane history. One of these parties, after getting undue advantages, formerly by force, now by corporations and monopolies, always raise the cry of attacks on property when any of their undue acquisitions were in danger. This old cry had long been worn out. It was actually used up by the Federalists about forty years ago. And with what face invoked now? A parcel of salt monopolizers who rent furnaces and wells to be idle—who hire owners of salt water not to dig for it—who poison their salt by adulteration—who stint the supply to the community—who district the country and allowance it, and allow it not half enough; these monopolizers, by their defenders on this floor, cry out that their property is attacked when we propose to prove their monopoly, and its abuses, and to repeal the salt duty which, by impeding the importation of foreign salt, enables them to monopolize all that is made at home.

Mr. B. said, who objects to the printing of this testimony, showing the salt monopoly in the West? Who objects to the printing? The very party, and the very persons, who printed six large volumes of panic memorials and petitions for the Bank of the United States, during the panic session of Congress! These are the gentlemen who object to this printing. We have evidence, drawn from nearly thirty counties in Missouri, signed by several hundred citizens of known character; and objection is made to printing their testimony, and made by those who printed six volumes of panic petitions for the Bank of the United States, signed by the retainers of the Bank, and by unknown persons, and, as was said at the time, by the dead! for it was said that the names of the dead were upon them, and that many of the petitions looked like they had got their names from the tomb stones.

Mr. B. said, here was a new attempt at a panic; but it could not succeed. The attempt now is to make people believe that property was attacked! It was a weak attempt, and would end ridiculously. The time had gone by for these successful assaults on the nerves. Without the aid of the Bank of the United States, no panic could be made in this country; and that institution had now got too weak and too low to be able to make alarm and distress. Far from attacking property, it was monopoly which was attacked; and the only effort was to prove the salt monopoly and abuses, and to withdraw from it the aid and support of the Federal Government. The Government aided this abuse by its tax on foreign salt; and the only application was to withdraw the aid, by abolishing the tax.

Gentlemen said the tax was a trifle—only six or eight cents. Did these gentlemen know that that was a tax of near one hundred per centum on Turks Island salt; and upwards of one hundred on Portuguese and Spanish salt; and near two hundred per centum on Italian and Adriatic salt? If they knew this, they should not call the tax a trifle; if they did not, let them vote for printing the papers presented, and they would learn it. They would learn that the price of alum salt, the import price, was from eight or nine cents a bushel down to two and a half and three cents a bushel.

Mr. B. said, if the tax was nothing, why did the monopolizers wish it to be kept up? If it answered them no purpose, why object to its suppression? Their language was one thing, and their conduct another. They know that a duty of one cent is just as good for them as a duty of twenty cents. All they want is a duty—no matter how small—any thing that will compel the importer to go to the custom-house, and procure American security for the payment of the tax. The credit on the salt duty is nine months; but American security must be given; two American citizens must be got for security. This throws the foreign salt into the hands of those who make it a business to furnish this security. This creates a barrier to the free importation of salt, and enables the monopolizers and their associates to get possession of the foreign salt at New Orleans; and possession is all they want. One cent duty is as good to them as twenty; and, therefore, they struggle as hard to keep up a duty of six or eight cents, as they did to keep up a duty of twenty cents. Any duty will answer their purpose; and, therefore, they struggle as hard for the smallest duty as for the largest. In this they were like the Bank of the United States, which struggled as hard for a six years' charter, or for a twelve years' charter, or for an elongated charter, as it had done for the full term of twenty years: and why? Because any charter which prolonged it a few years would prolong it forever! This it knew, and, therefore, worked violently for the shortest term—no matter how short. So of these salt monopolizers. Any duty which throws the importer of salt upon their agents or accomplices, for American security, will answer their purpose. They will be satisfied with one cent duty.

Mr. B. scouted the charge of attack upon property as being equally stale and unfounded, and said that no false issues should go from the chamber. The attack was upon an odious, infamous, and diabolical monopoly; a monopoly which would cover its authors and defenders with blushes, if the papers which he offered could be printed. Mr. B. then read several extracts from the papers to prove the monopoly and its great abuses in suppressing the manufacture of salt—in adulterating it—in raising the price—in giving false measure—and in districting, allowancing, and stinting the Western country.

Mr. B. said that combinations to raise the price of a necessary of life, was a crime by the laws of all civilized countries, and was punished as such; yet here, on the floor of the American Senate, such a combination was not merely defended, but to ask the United States to cease to aid and encourage it, was called an attack upon the property of the monopolizers! Such is the perversion of judgment and feeling which even penetrates this chamber in this age of monopolies and chartered privileges! He said it was nearly as bad now as it was in John Law's time, under the Regent Duke of Orleans—the Mark Anthony of modern times—when monopoly was the order of the day; and when dukes, counts, and marquises, were engaged in monopolies of soap, grease, hay, oats, sugar, spices, coffee, &c. &c. &c.

Mr. B. said it was curious to see the parallel between the present times and those of John Law. He was the father of the credit system, as it is called, that is to say, the system of fictitious and baseless credit—credit which has neither property nor character to rest upon—nothing but the impudence of the creditee and the credulity of the creditor—and the success of the creditee in multiplying his funds by ten. This was the whole credit system of Law. Decupler was his word. Multiply by ten was his game. With a capital of a hundred thousand, do business for a million, and draw profit upon the million; this was his plan, and it is the plan now followed in the United States; and with the same results in all things, and especially in the business of monopolies. Every thing is now a subject of monopoly in the United States, all aided and engendered by the bank monopolies. Beef, bacon, pork, butter, eggs, flour, salt; all, all, fall into the vortex of monopoly; and the most odious of these, that of the salt monopoly, is aided and fostered by our duty on foreign salt.

Mr. B. said he never felt more hearty in any cause than in this attack upon the salt tax, its monopoly and abuses. Not even in the case of the most glorious expunging resolution, did his feelings and judgment go more ardently together. He was an enemy to a salt tax by itself, and to a monopoly by itself; but here both the tax and the monopoly went together; the two abuses were united, and produced unmeasured mischief to the community; and he pledged himself to the Senate and the people to make battle against these abuses until they were abolished, or until his capacity for battle ceased. What he now said was nothing. When he got the papers printed, he should bring out the facts, which would be worthy of the public attention. In this nineteenth century, the facts and the reasons were all that was wanted. Regular built orations were now nothing.

Mr. B. returned to the question before the Senate, which was—not the repeal of the salt tax—but the printing of the papers to show that it ought to be repealed. One thing at a time was enough. When the question of repeal came on he would go into it with a spirit to go through it, and would thank the friends of the tax for their custom. For the present, he wanted the information printed, which would show the injury done to the country by the duty on foreign salt, and the injury done to the Treasury by the fishing bounties and allowances. The Salt Document printed last spring had done great good; it had killed the salt tax as far as it went! He believed no one read it without being convinced that the tax ought to be repealed. The wrath of the friends of the tax against this document, showes its value to the country. They denounce it for the harm it does their cause, and the good it does ours. So of the present papers; they oppose the printing, because it will complete the work which the other document began. They oppose these papers for the same cause they opposed the others.

Mr. WRIGHT said he rose to ask what was the question before the Senate? The debate had taken so wide a range, that the real question was likely to be lost sight of. What was it? Simply to print the papers referred to in the motion of the Senator from Missouri. Those papers had been presented by that honorable Senator to the Senate; had been, on his motion, referred to the Committee on Finance, and were now reported back by that member of the committee, with instructions to ask for their printing. The motion to print was now before the body, and was the only question presented for its action. Would any one who had listened to this debate, without a knowledge of these facts, have supposed this to be the question under discussion? Would they not rather have supposed that the bill for the repeal of the duty on salt, or some measure having for its object the punishment of monopolies and frauds in the dealers in salt, was now before the Senate, and about to receive its action? It seemed to him that no other conclusion could have been formed by the impartial listener to the discussion. Yet no such proposition as either of these had been presented by the Committee on Finance.

It was true, a bill had been introduced by the honorable Senator from Missouri, proposing to repeal the duty on salt, and that bill had been referred to the Committee on Finance; but it was also true that the committee had not yet even taken up that measure for consideration, much less made any report upon it. It remained in the hands and possession of the committee, wholly unacted upon, and was not in the possession or within the reach of the Senate for its action. Still the debate would have compelled a hearer to suppose that the committee had reported back that bill, had recommended its passage, and were now urging the Senate to final action upon it. Not only so, but the further impression would be produced that the Committee on Finance of the Senate had originated and presented to the Senate penal enactments against those who had attempted to govern the price of salt in various parts of the country, by associated monopolies.

It was his duty, standing as he did, in relation to that committee, to correct impressions so erroneous, and so certain to follow wherever a report of this debate should go. The committee, as he had already said, had not even considered the bill to repeal the duty upon salt. They had not, so far as he knew, formed any opinion in regard to that measure. Certainly they had not, as a committee, expressed any opinion upon it. Much less had they attempted to assert the right in Congress, to punish monopolies and mischievous associations in the States of the Union, of any character. They had simply recommended the printing of certain papers referred to them by an express order of the Senate, touching the subject of the salt bill, and the fishing bounties, though he did not himself consider a portion of the papers as relating very directly to any of the provisions of the bill before the committee. Yet that portion of the papers was, as he thought, and as the committee thought, well worthy of publication. They disclosed facts deeply interesting to every inhabitant of the whole country, to every interest connected with the essential article of salt.

He was not very familiar with the contents of the papers. They were voluminous, and the committee had not thought it necessary to detain them for minute examination, in their manuscript form, after they had seen enough of their contents to render the printing, in their judgments, proper. He could not, therefore, speak particularly of the information proposed to be furnished to the Senate and the country by the printing. He would make one or two general references to parts of it, and to those parts less relating to the salt bill, and he would make the practices at the Kanawha salt works the basis of his statements, because he thought he recollected more particularly the history given in the papers of the fraudulent and mischevous practices there. He would be corrected by the honorable Senator from Missouri, who was perfectly familiar with the whole testimony, if he should err in his facts.

One of the practices to which he alluded, was that of forming an association to monopolize the whole of those extensive works in the hands, and under the control, of a single company; then to limit the supply of salt for the country depending upon those manufactories for the article, and thus to raise the price most exorbitantly to the consumers. The process was to possess themselves of a small number of the manufactories for actual use, and to pay a stipulated annual rent to all the others to remain idle, and make no salt; then to district the country to be supplied with salt; to appoint a selling agent for each district; to send all the salt for each district to that agent, and to him only; and to give him, from time to time, a limit, or minimum of price, below which no salt should be sold in his district. To such an extent had this system been carried, that of some hundred and sixty manufactories at Kanawha, but forty had been worked for the year, the remaining one hundred and twenty being hired to remain closed, while salt to the consumers, dependent upon these works for their supply, had been raised to the enormous price of three dollars; and he believed sometimes even much higher, for the bushel of fifty pounds weight.

Another practice was also disclosed, not less reprehensible, and perhaps infinitely more injurious to the public. This was the practice of adulterating, by system and design, the small quantity of salt made, and thus sparingly dealt out to the community under the arrangements for extortion before described. The adulteration was effected by using chemical agents to retain in the salt impurities held in solution in the water, and which, without being thus retained, would be principally, if not entirely, separated and excluded by the simple process of boiling. Tallow was said to be the principal agent thus employed, and such was the effect described to be, that, while the salt made would have a more rich and white and beautiful appearance to the uninstructed eye, one hundred pounds of tallow was considered equivalent to the ordinary rent of a manufactory for a season, or about five thousand bushels of salt.
